Gordon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action shows, in substance: (1) That on November 17, 1890, the respondents sold to appellant Kate Decker two adjoining tracts of land in Spokane for $5,500; giving their deed containing a covenant that they were owners in fee, and with covenants of general warranty, and receiving from appellant Kate Decker part payment of the purchase price in cash, and appellants' mortgage on said land to secure the remainder. (2) That thereafter appellants made payments on said remainder, the last one on December 18, 1891, and that they paid the taxes on said land regularly for three years. (3) That the respondents were not "seised in fee, or possessed of the right to sell and convey, the last-described portion of said property [being a strip lying at the north end of the entire premises] in manner and form as aforesaid." (4) That the remainder of the premises, without the strip, was useless for appellants' purpose. (5) That, prior to bringing suit, appellants tendered deed of said land to respondents, which would have placed them in statu quo, and demanded back the purchase money paid, all of which was refused by the respondents. Appellants ask for a rescission of the sale, for the return of the purchase money paid, and for a vendees' lien on said land to secure said purchase money. The complaint is very voluminous, and to set it out in full would occupy too much space. The foregoing statement is sufficient, however, to give a proper understanding of it. Respondents interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the lower court; and, appellants electing to stand on their complaint, judgment of dismissal was entered, and from such order and judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellants, for a reversal of the judgment, rely upon the cases of Sears v. Stinson, 8 Wash. 615, and Moody v. Spokane & U. H. Street R. Co. 5 Wash. 699. In Sears v. Stinson the land was sold, and a deed with full covenants given. The purchaser paid the purchase price, and the title failed to a strip. The purchaser in that case brought his action for damages on the breach of the covenant for seisin (strictly an action at law), while in the case at bar the appellants brought this action to rescind the sale (purely an action in equity). In Sears v. Stinson the question for determination was whether an action for damages was the proper action, while in the case at bar the question is whether equity will rescind on the facts stated. This court, in the Sears Case, held that an action at law for damages on the breach of covenant was properly maintainable, and was not called upon to decide any other question in the case; and the language of the court, "There is no doubt but that the plaintiff would be entitled to the equitable relief of a rescission of the contract, if he desire it,"—found on page 616, 3 Wash., was merely an unguarded expression, not at all necessary to the decision of the case, and mere obiter dictum. The court, moreover, on page 617, 3 Wash., states forcibly the doctrine upon which the case was decided, viz.: "But in this case the contract, so far as it can be enforced, is already performed, and there is nothing to give a court of equity jurisdiction. Damages for the balance is all that is left." The case of Moody v. Spokane & U. H. Street R. Co., supra, is also wholly inapplicable to the case at bar, both upon the facts and the principle involved. In that case the respondent brought suit upon a contract which he himself had not performed. The court said: "If the respondent had not performed his part of the contract . . . he could not commence his action. On the other hand, the appellant would have the right to rescind the contract." The opinion in that case further proceeds as follows: "It is not the ordinary case of a breach of a covenant in a deed, where the remedy would be a suit on the warranty, but the respective contracts here are dependent upon each other." We are entirely satisfied with the result reached by this court in each of those cases, but are unable to conclude that either of them is authority in support of appellants' contention here.

The sole allegation of defect or failure of title is alleged in the complaint (par. 9) to be that "they [the grantors] were not seised in fee, or possessed of the right to sell and convey the last-described portion of said property, in manner and form as aforesaid." This is, at most, equivalent merely to a statement that their interest in the granted premises was less than a fee-simple estate, and cannot be held to be equivalent to an allegation that they had no estate or interest in the premises. We think this is wholly insufficient to constitute good pleading at law or in equity. There are two descriptions in the deed. As to one tract, no question of title is raised. As to the other, it is, in effect, said that the grantors had not a fee-simple estate. And without stating how far their actual estate or interest falls short, and without any statement as to the true condition of the title, from which relief could be afforded at law or in equity, appellants, after a lapse of nearly four years, ask a court of equity to rescind the contract. "It is a dangerous and delicate operation for a court to pass upon a title which nobody is asserting, and no one disputing." Key v. Jennings, 66 Mo. 856. For this reason, alone, if no other existed, we would be disposed to affirm the judgment. Assuming the fact to be, however, that title to one of the tracts conveyed has wholly failed, and that it was the design of the pleader to so allege, a very interesting question is presented, concerning which Chief Justice Sharkey, in Parham v. Randolph, 4 27 L. R. A.

How. (Miss.) 435, 35 Am. Dec. 403, says: "The extent to which courts of chancery will go in giving relief to the vendee of land, by preventing the collection of the purchase money, and rescinding the contract, is a question which is much embarrassed by conflicting adjudications. It has been often litigated but the numerous decisions seem to have increased, rather than diminished, the doubts." Appellants, by their complaint, invoke the equity powers of the court to procure a rescission. Respondents concede that appellants have a right of action, but insist that it must be at law, for damages. Here let us remark that a court of equity is not an appropriate tribunal for the trial of title to land. As is said by Chancellor Kent in Abbott v. Allen, infra: "This court may perhaps try title to land, when it arises incidentally; but it is understood not to be within its province when the case depends upon a simple legal title, and is brought up directly by the bill. The power is only to be exercised in difficult and complicated cases, affording peculiar grounds for equitable interference."

The plaintiff has the means of bringing the legal title to a test whenever he pleases, by an action at law on his covenants of seisin." The complaint in this action nowhere alleges any fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation on the part of the respondents concerning the title to the premises conveyed, unless fraud is to be inferred from their covenant of ownership, coupled with failure of title to a portion of the premises conveyed. It is nowhere charged that they had knowledge of any fact affecting the title which was concealed from appellants, nor is it asserted that the respondents are either insolvent, or nonresidents of this state. It concedes that at all times since the deed was given the appellants have been in possession of the premises, and have paid taxes thereon for years; and neither alleges eviction, nor that they are threatened with suit on the part of any one holding or claiming an older or superior title thereto. And if, as has been sometimes asserted, a covenant in a deed that the grantor is the "owner in fee" differs from the covenants of quiet possession, warranty of title, and the like, and that a breach occurs at once if ownership in fee does not in fact exist, and that the vendee is not required to await eviction before maintaining his action, we are nevertheless unable to conclude that equity has any jurisdiction to afford the relief here prayed. It is fundamental that equity will not interfere where the law affords a plain, adequate, and complete remedy. "The remedy must be plain, for, if it be doubtful and obscure at law, equity will assert a jurisdiction. It must be adequate, for, if it falls short of what the party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity. And it must be complete; that is, it must attain its full end at law. It must reach the whole mischief, and secure the whole right of party." Mitford, Ch. Pl. (6th Am. ed.) note, p. 2. "Covenants for title, like all other covenants, are, of course, mere contracts."

For a breach of contract the common law provided a single remedy,—a recompense in damages." Rawle, Covenants, § 354. Here is a contract which has been fully executed. Nothing remains to be performed. The consideration has been paid, the conveyance executed, and full covenants have been given and accepted. There is no suggestion of insolvency or nonresidence, or that the plaintiff's remedy at law would not be adequate. Hence, we do not find any good reason for interference by a court of equity.

It seems to us that much of the apparent conflict that is found in the adjudicated cases on this subject is due to a failure to observe the distinction which obtains between the rules applicable to a contract still executory and one actually executed. "The distinctions between the rules which govern the relation of vendor and purchaser before and after the execution of the deed—while the contract is still executory, and after it is executed—are broad and familiar. Although the general principles of the contract of sale of real estate, especially in this country and in England, exact less of a vendor than the rules of the civil law demand, yet, while the contract is still executory, they recognize and enforce the right of the purchaser to a title clear of defects and incumbrances; and this right does not depend upon the terms of the contract, but is given by the law, and is not, except in particular cases, affected by the nature and extent of the covenants for title which the purchaser is to receive." Rawle, Covenants, § 819. "Generally speaking, a purchaser, after a conveyance, has no remedy except upon the covenants he has obtained, although evicted for want of title; and, however fatal the defect of title may be, if there is no fraudulent concealment on the part of the seller, the purchaser's only remedy is under the covenants." 1 Sugden, Vendors, p. 383; Rawlins v. Timberlake, 6 T. B. Mon. 225; James v. McKernon, 6 Johns. 548; Bumpus v. Platner, 1 Johns. Ch. 218, 1 L. ed. 116. And Lord Campbell, in Wilde v. Gibson, 1 H. L. Cas. 605, 1 Clark & F. N. S. 605, says of this distinction: "If there be, in any way whatever, misrepresentation or concealment which is material to the purchaser, a court of equity will not compel him to complete the purchase; but, where the conveyance has been executed, I apprehend that a court of equity will set aside the conveyance only on the ground of actual fraud." In Thompson v. Jackson, 8 Rand. (Va.) 504, 15 Am. Dec. 721, Justice Carr says: "Executory contracts for real property, and some other subjects, offer to the party the alternative of either suing at law for damages, or asking the aid of equity to obtain the specific thing. . . . Very different is the question where a party asks the court to rescind a contract, and especially an executed contract. In the first case, the court merely decides which of two remedies a party shall pursue. In the second, it annihilates a solemn contract, rendered still more solemn by the fact that the parties have carried it into execution. . . . The vendor has parted with the title and possession of his land, and has taken his money, bonds, or other equivalent. The vendee has entered into possession, . . . and, for security of his title, has taken a deed with such covenants and warranty as his contract called for. To undo all this is a strong-handed measure, and none but a clear and strong case will justify it. Accordingly, we find it laid down in all the equity books that the court is in the daily habit of refusing the specific execution of contracts, which at the same time it just as promptly refuses to rescind. . . . When the application is to rescind an executed contract for land, the English books lay it down as a general rule (admitting of but few exceptions) that, to justify such decree, fraud must appear, and this fraud must be distinctly put in issue by the pleadings. If the charge be a mere failure of consideration, arising from the sale of the defective legal title, unmingled with fraud or malis fides of any kind, it is generally laid down that the vendee would be left to the covenants and warranty in his deed." "Where a contract for the sale of land has been executed by the giving of a conveyance, the court of equity will not rescind the contract upon the ground of a mere defect of title, where there has been no fraud on the part of the vendor, but will leave the purchaser to his remedy upon the covenants in his deed." Woodruff v. Bunce, 9 Paige, 448, 4 L. ed. 768. In Denston v. Morris, 2 Edw. Ch. 87, 6 L. ed. 299, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule of this court that a grantee, to whom possession has been delivered, under covenants of title and warranty, can have no relief in equity against his grantor for a return of the purchase money or security on account of defect or failure of title, because he has taken care to secure himself by covenants, and if evicted, can have an adequate remedy at law. . . . But if fraud is shown, either in making the contract of sale, or in executing it, and whether there be covenants inserted in the deed to secure the title or not, the purchaser, in case of eviction or disturbance of his possession, or whenever it is ascertained that the title is defective, may come into this court to be relieved from his purchase, or to obtain indemnity against the consequences of the fraud. Imposition and fraud upon the purchaser, by any willful misrepresentation or concealment, take the case out of the general rule, and entitle him to be redressed in equity, in addition to and beyond the covenants in the deed." And in Wiley v. Fitzpatrick, 8 J. J. Marsh. 584, it is said: "The remedy which a court of law can offer in such cases, unless some extraneous circumstances intervene to prevent it, is fully adequate to all the demands of justice, and that is a sufficient reason why a court of chancery will not interpose." "A purchaser of land, who has paid part of the purchase money, and given a bond and mortgage for the residue, and is in undisturbed possession, will not be relieved against the payment of the bond, or proceedings on the mortgage, on the mere ground of a defect of title, there being no allegation of fraud in the sale, nor any eviction, but must seek his remedy at law upon the covenants in his deed." "If the purchaser was imposed on by any intentional misrepresentation or concealment, he may have redress [in equity] in addition to and beyond his covenants." Abbott v. Allen, 2 Johns. Ch. 519, 1 L. ed. 473, 7 Am. Dec. 554. "It is requisite that the charge of fraud should be made a distinct ground of allegation by the party in his pleading; otherwise, it is not to be deemed in issue, and cannot affect the contract in question." Gouverneur v. Elmendorf, 5 Johns. Ch. 79, 1 L. ed. 1016. In that case, Chancellor Kent says: "A vendor selling in good faith is not responsible for the goodness of his title, beyond the extent of the covenants in his deed." In Patton v. Taylor, 48 U. S. 7 How. 150, 12 L. ed. 646, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Nelson, says: "A purchaser in the undisturbed possession of the land will not be relieved against the payment of the purchase money on the mere ground of the defect of title, there being no fraud or misrepresentation, and that in such a case he must seek his remedy at law, on the covenants in his deed." In Simpson v. Hawkins, 1 Dana, 808, it is said that: "A contract for the sale of land, unaffected by fraud, cannot be rescinded in chancery after it has been carried into effect by a conveyance. . . . If the grantee in possession loses part of the land, he may recover, on the warranty, damages commensurate with the loss, but it is not cause for rescinding the whole contract. . . . I regard it [says Judge Underwood in that case] as immaterial whether the vendors had any title at all. If they conveyed with warranty, and put the vendee in possession, I hold that there can be no rescission of the contract, where there has been no fraud, no eviction, and no assertion of an adverse claim." This case is cited approvingly by the Supreme Court of the United States in Patton v. Taylor, supra. "Where a conveyance of land has been made by a deed executed with covenants of warranty, and a note has been received in consideration of the conveyance, a partial failure of title will not constitute a defense to the note, but the remedy of the party must be by suit on the covenants of his deed." Chase v. Western, 13 N. H. 418. In Knapp v. Lee, 8 Pick. 453, it is said to be in dispute in Massachusetts whether a total failure of covenants of warranty of land would constitute a defense to a note, but no doubt exists that a partial failure of title is not permissible as a defense. In Maine it has been held that the total failure of title constitutes no defense to a note given for consideration money. Lloyd v. Jewell, 1 Me. 352, 10 Am. Dec. 73; Jenness v. Parker, 24 Me. 289. In the case of English v. Thomasson, 82 Ky. 281, the court says: "It has been repeatedly held by this court that in the absence of fraud, or insolvency or nonresidency of the vendor, that the vendee in the peaceable possession of the granted premises, by virtue of a conveyance containing a covenant of general warranty, is not entitled to a rescission of the contract, when sued for the purchase money, although the vendor may at the time of the sale have represented his title as perfect, when in fact it was not, and that in such a case the vendee must pay the money, and rely upon the covenant of warranty in case of an eviction. . . . A mere mistake or error of opinion as to the validity of his title would not constitute a fraud. The warranty which the appellant chose to accept was designed to protect him against such a misrepresentation, and is effective for that purpose; and he must await eviction, if it ever occur, and then look to his remedy at law on the covenant in his deed."

We have already suggested in this opinion that a covenant on the part of a grantor that he is the "owner in fee" of premises conveyed, when in fact his title fails or is defective, might give an immediate right of action to his grantee, and unlike covenants of quiet possession, warranty of title, and the like, the grantee would not be obliged to await eviction; but for a breach in either case, in the absence of strong equitable considerations, not disclosed by the bill in this case, we hold that his remedy is at law for the damages sustained. In Edwards v. McLeay, 10 Eng. Ch. 307, the bill charged, and the court found the fact to be, that the vendor knew and concealed a fact material to the validity of his title, and that the defect could not have been ascertained from the abstract. A rescission was decreed, the learned master of the rolls holding that if the vendor knows and conceals a fact material to the validity of his title, of which fact the vendee is ignorant, relief in equity is to be afforded to the purchaser. This case has been often cited in support of a view of the law contrary to that we have taken, but it will be observed that the facts there charged and found differ very materially from those alleged in this bill. It was there asserted that the vendor knew at the time of the sale that a large portion of the granted premises was claimed by the parish as a public common. This fact he concealed from the purchaser, and the abstract did not disclose it. The court granted a rescission, holding that the vendor's silence concerning it, when he knew of the assertion of such adverse claim, constituted such fraud as warranted the interposition of equity. And Lord Eldon, in affirming the judgment of the master of the rolls, upon appeal, said "that if one party makes a representation which he knows to be false, but the falsity of which the other party has no means of knowing, this court will rescind the contract." 2 Swanst. 802. It will be observed that the chancellor, in affirming, placed it upon the assumption that the seller knew the representation to be false.

There are cases wherein the jurisdiction of equity has been asserted upon facts similar to those alleged in the complaint in this case. Among the leading cases so holding is Parham v. Randolph, supra, in which the learned chief justice of Mississippi, in support of the position there taken, quotes Chancellor Kent, as follows: "The good sense and equity of the law on the subject is that if a defect of title, whether of land or of chattels, be so great as to render the thing sold unfit for the use intended, and not within the inducement to the purchaser, the purchaser should not be held to the contract, but be at liberty to rescind it altogether. 2 Kent, Com. § 475." An examination of the entire section, and particularly that part immediately preceding the language above quoted, makes it manifest, however, that the learned chancellor was there referring to contracts that are executory merely. The views of that distinguished jurist upon the questions involved in the determination of this case are, to our better satisfaction, found in the cases of Abbott v. Allen and Gouverneur v. Elmendorf, supra. And it seems to us that the reference by the learned judge in Parham v. Randolph to the case of Greenleaf v. Cook, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 18, 4 L. ed. 172, is equally unfortunate. Defendant in that case, in an action on a promissory note given for the purchase price of real property, set up by way of defense a prior outstanding mortgage and a decree of foreclosure, of which mortgage it was shown that he had no knowledge at the time of purchase. Upon these facts the court, speaking through Chief Justice Marshall, says: "The note was given with full knowledge of the case. Acquainted with the extent of the incumbrance, and its probable consequences, the defendant consents to receive the title which the plaintiff was able to make, and, on receiving it, executes his note for the purchase money. To the payment of the note given under such circumstances, the existence of the incumbrance can certainly furnish no legal objection." This was the sole question determined in that case. Woods v. North, 6 Humph. 309, 44 Am. Dec. 312, is another case frequently cited in support of the contrary doctrine. The court there says: "In this deed there is a covenant of seisin, in which the defendant asserts that he has a right to sell and convey the land. Here is an express misrepresentation." In that case the sole representation of title was confined to that expressed in the covenant contained in the deed. There being a superior outstanding title, a rescission was decreed. We think the misrepresentation which will entitle a party to rescind an executed contract must be something more than the statement of the vendor of what he innocently and in good faith believes to be true, without knowledge or notice of any fact affecting his title, and especially where the vendor is not insolvent or a nonresident, and where the vendee has exacted and accepted full covenants. In a note found on page 639 of his work on Covenants for Title, Mr. Rawle says of this case of Woods v. North, that "it is believed that there is no well-considered class of cases which give such an interpretation to a covenant." Nor will equity take jurisdiction in this case on the ground of mutual mistake, although there is some authority for the assertion of such jurisdiction. In the case of Leal v. Terbach, 52 Mich. 100, the plaintiff purchased of the defendant a parcel of land which had belonged to defendant's husband, and to which she had no title, excepting a life estate under the will; and a deed was given by her, with the usual covenants. The court held that the vendee could not rescind on the ground of mistake as to the vendor's title, as the mistake did not go to the entire consideration; the vendee, supposing the vendor had title in fee, simply accepted a mere life estate. In the opinion, Judge Cooley says: "He [plaintiff] appears to have provided against the contingency of her title falling short of the complete fee by requiring of her covenants for his protection. . . . It is certain that the parties took into consideration possible defects in the title, and bargained in respect to them. . . . The conveyance purports to be in fee, and the assurances, we must suppose, are to him, his heirs and assigns. The plaintiff has therefore received value for the money paid, and, if not to the full extent of the payment, the deficiency is uncertain, and dependent on contingencies, and does not go to the entire consideration. If this contract can be rescinded on the ground of mistakes of fact, then every purchase of land, the title to which proves in any respect defective, must be subject to rescission also, unless the parties have expressly bargained with mutual knowledge that defects existed. If this were the law, covenants would be of little importance."

We deem it unnecessary to multiply authorities in support of this position. The complaint in this action does not allege that the respondents knowingly conveyed what they did not own, or that they concealed any fact affecting the title which was within their knowledge, and which they were bound to disclose; and while it is true that the "arm of equity is long and powerful," it is also true, as is tersely said by Lord Nottingham, that the "chancery mends no man's bargain." Willful misrepresentation or concealment is nowhere charged, nor can it be ascertained in what respect or to what extent the title conveyed by the respondents has failed. They may, for aught that appears to the contrary, well have conceived that they were "seised in fee" of the premises, and have acted in good faith in executing the conveyance; and if, in so doing, they have erred in estimating their estate, and the damages flowing from such error are susceptible of definite ascertainment, and the respondents solvent and residents of the state, what occasion is there for the interposition of equity? There are many expressions to be found in the reported cases and in text-books that are seemingly antagonistic to the conclusion we have reached in disposing of this case. Of many of them, however, it may be said that they, at most, are merely "loose dicta, without any fullness of illustration," and want that precision which is requisite to give much force to them.

favor of defendant Laura Nudd in an action brought to determine adverse claims to certain real estate which had been purchased at a sale under direction of the court as a part of the proceedings for winding up the affairs of the partnership of Nudd & Holmes. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Hale, Morgan & Montgomery, for appellant:

The suit between the partners Nudd and Holmes was to dissolve the partnership, dispose of its assets, pay its debts, and distribute any surplus that might result.

In such cases real estate owned by a partnership, purchased with partnership funds, as is the case here, is, for the purpose of settling the debts of the partnership and of distributing its effects, treated in equity as partnership stock.

The cases below, in so far as they relate to the general principles of the law regarding dower, are only such as refer to or announce such principles in relation to partnership real estate and are not intended to be exhaustive of the general doctrine.

At common law the widow is entitled to dower of all the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised in fee simple or fee tail, at any time during the coverture, and of which any issue she might have had might by possibility have been heir. Matlock v. Matlock (1854) 5 Ind. 403.

Her interest in lands thus owned and conveyed by the husband, in the conveyance of which she has not joined, becomes consummate on his death. Grissom v. Moore (1886) 106 Ind. 296, 56 Am. Rep. 743. And her right accrues by virtue of the marital relation. Ibid.

But she does not take as heir, in lands so conveyed. Ibid.; Rank v. Hanna (1854) 6 Ind. 20; Verry no question is made, it follows that the receiver appointed took, by virtue of his appointment, the entire legal and equitable title to the property belonging to the firm of Nudd & Holmes.

The necessity and propriety of ordering sale of the partnership property in the winding-up suit at the instance of Nudd was a matter addressed solely to the judgment of the court trying that issue.

It is, the right of the partner, in whose favor the right of action for dissolution accrues, to insist upon a sale of the assets of the firm in order to ascertain their value and the amount of the surplus to be divided in accordance with the right of the partners under the articles.

Story, Partn. § 350.

The fact that there are no debts does not make the parties tenants in common so that a partition of real estate will be ordered, instead of a sale, but the whole will be disposed of if any one insists upon it.

Bates, Partn. §§ 974-976; Wild v. Milne, 26 Beav. 504.

Partnership real estate is in equity subjected to all the incidents of partnership property generally.

The interest of Mrs. Nudd in the partnership real estate owned by the firm, of which her husband was a member, would in any case be confined to what might remain her husband's interest after the final adjustment of the affairs of the partnership, and, if in such adjustment the real estate was sold, there is nothing left to which her inchoate right could attach.

Grissom v. Moore, 106 Ind. 296, 55 Am. Rep. 742.

To the extent to which real estate is converted into partnership stock, all the incidents attach to it which belong to any other stock.

Messrs. Young, Fish & Dickinson, for respondent:

The lots in question are prima facie real estate and not personality.

The fact that the grantees were partners in business could not work a conversion of the lots from real estate into personality.

The fact that the grantees acquired the lots for the uses of the firm in its business did not transform them into personality.

Being in fact real estate the legal title is in

Sale of the husband during coverture is essential, and where the husband was never seised there can be no dower; so held where the husband took only a right in equity to compel a conveyance from his joint owner of his interest, which he never did but declined to take a conveyance when offered, the court in such case declining the widow's right to dower. Bowman v. Bailey (1884) 20 S. C. 550.

And a mere technical seisin of the husband without any beneficial interest in the estate will not entitle the wife to dower. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 18 Am. Dec. 642.

The inchoate right of the wife attaching as an incident to the seisin of the husband during marriage. Grissom v. Moore, supra.

The right is governed by the law which is in force at the time of the husband's death, and not by that which is in force at the time of the marriage, or which may have been during its continuance. Ware v. Owens (1868) 42 Ala. 212, 94 Am. Dec. 642, following Boyd v. Harrison (1860) 36 Ala. 533.

Under the Mississippi Dower Act of 1837, the widow is entitled to dower out of the lands of which the husband died seised and possessed. Sykes v. Sykes (1873) 49 Miss. 190.

And under section 2440 of the Iowa Code a wife is endowable in all legal or equitable estates, in real property possessed by the husband at any time during the marriage which may have been sold on execution or any other judicial sale, and to which the wife has made no relinquishment of her right.

Before the revised statutes of New York there was no dower in a mere equitable estate. Re Ransom (1883) 17 Fed. Rep. 831.

But a widow is now entitled to equitable dower under the New York statutes. Hawley v. James (1885) 5 Paige, 313, 8 L. ed. 734; Tabele v. Tabele (1814) 1 Johns. Ch. 45, 1 L. ed. 63.

Dower is an incident of partnership real estate. Wilcox v. Wilcox (1866) 13 Allen, 252; Lenow v. Fones (1886) 48 Ark. 557.

The estate of inheritance of the husband in which alone the widow can claim dower is what remains after satisfying the partnership debts. Dawson v. Parsons (1894) 63 N. Y. S. R. 320. Greenwood v. Marvin (1888) 111 N. Y. 438.

Upon the question whether the widow of a deceased partner took her dower in the real estate assets of the firm absolutely, as in personal property, or for life as in real estate, it has been held that, in the absence of an agreement between the partners for the conversion and sale of such real estate up to settlement of the partnership affairs, such widow takes her dower as in real estate, except in leasehold property in which she takes it absolutely as in personal estate. Lenow v. Fones, supra.

Yet it has been held that when lands are purchased by partners with partnership funds for partnership purposes, the policy of the law and principles of justice are against the right of the wife to dower in partnership lands when required for payment of the firm debts. Duhring v. Duhring (1854) 20 Mo. 174; Willet v. Brown (1877) 65 the grantees and all the incidents of such estate follow.

The wife's interest having thus vested, it cannot be destroyed except by her consent or by the decree of a competent court by which she is concluded.

Respondent's interest in these lands cannot be cut off in this action.

Barron v. Mullin, 23 Minn. 374.

The doctrine of "absolute conversion" has been held in England, but never in this country.

But the doctrine is much questioned even in England.

Story, Partn. 7th ed. § 95, cases cited in note §, par. 7; 1 Bates, Partn. § 297; 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 952.

The result of all American cases is simply this: When a partnership invests its funds in land, the title which it takes passes to the grantee or grantees named in the deed subject to the right of present or future creditors of the firm to have it reconverted into money, if necessary, in order to satisfy their demands. No change whatever is wrought in the legal estate or in the nature of the property, but the land represents the money of the firm, and it is held in trust as a sort of security that such money shall be forthcoming in case it is needed to pay firm debts.

Re Codding & Russell, 9 Fed. Rep. 849.

Why is it to be "treated as personalty?" Simply because, the facts being shown which create the necessity of reconverting the land into the partnership money which it represents, equity considers that as done which ought to be done; certainly not because any actual change has been wrought in the character of the property itself.

See note to Re Codding & Russell, supra; Foster's App. 74 Pa. 391; Story, Partn. § 94, p. 141; Dayton v. Corser, supra.

Where one of the partners dies and the personal property of the firm is insufficient to pay its debts, it is held in New York that "the heirs at law of the deceased partner are necessary parties to the action to secure a conveyance of the title to the land" owned by the partnership.

Boggs v. Bird, 38 N. Y. S. R. 992, and cases cited. See also Galbraith v. Gedge, 16 B. Mon. 631; Carter v. Fleener, 92 Ky. 400; Andrews v. Brown, 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Abernathy v. Moses, 73 Ala. 881; Brewer v. Browne, 63 Ala. 210; Coles v. Coles, 15 Johns. 160, 8 Am. Dec. 230; Mree v. Beasley, 95 Mich. 426; Campbell v. Campbell, 80 N. J. Eq. 415; Smith v. Jackson, 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 295; Collins v. Warren, 29 Mo. 236.

The conversion of real estate into personalty is worked, if at all, for the purpose of adjusting the affairs of the partnership. It would seem, therefore, that the conversion should be made only when and so far as required for that purpose. To require equitable interference to go further, and convert all real estate into personalty, for the mere purpose of division, seems to us to be an unnecessary invasion of the right of the copartners.

Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 107.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The effect of the findings of the trial court is that the real estate which is the subject of this action was formerly the property of a manufacturing copartnership composed of defendant's husband and one Holmes, having

Mo. 138, 27 Am. Rep. 265, where dower was denied the real estate being required to pay the partnership debts.

In the citation of the first-named case in Willet v. Brown, supra, the words "where they are necessary to pay the demands of the firm" are omitted and the opinion there reads as though there was an absolute denial of dower under all circumstances, which was not the point decided in Duhring v. Duhring, supra.

Such property being considered personal estate in equity is not subject to dower in equity. Re Ransom (1883) 17 Fed. Rep. 331.

A widow coming into a court of equity and claiming dower in partnership lands, when it appears that she has no equitable claim thereto, will not be permitted to invoke the aid of a court of conscience, to give her that to which she has no equitable title. Simpson v. Leech (1877) 36 Ill. 286.

It can only be barred by a conveyance in which she joins, or by some proceeding to which all estates are subject, such as the power of eminent domain and the like. Grissom v. Moore (1896) 106 Ind. 296, 55 Am. Rep. 742.

And cannot in Indiana be divested or defeated by any act or charge of the husband, nor of the wife, except in the manner provided by the Indiana revised statutes. Ibid.

No act of the husband can impair the widow's right to legal or equitable dower without her concurrence. Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 295; Titus v. Neilson (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. 452, 1 L. ed. 1130.

Thus, a husband seized of real estate during marriage cannot defeat the inchoate right of his wife to dower by an agreement to devote the property for the purposes of a partnership, nor by any other agreement short of a conveyance in which she joins. Grissom v. Moore, supra.

The Indiana Revised Statutes of 1843, changed the nature and estate of the widow in some respects. By section 80 thereof, page 423, the widow, subject to the provisions and restrictions of law, is endowable of one full and equal third part of all the lands, the legal title to which was in her husband, or in any person to and for his use and benefit, at any time during the coverture, and also of any lands in which, or in any part of which he had an equitable interest at the time of his death, unless her right thereto has been legally barred. Matlock v. Matlock (1864) 5 Ind. 403.

And by section 84 of the same statutes, the widow is not endowable of any estate or interest which the husband has in any trust estate, unless he has a beneficial interest therein, in which case she is endowable in proportion to the extent of the estate or interest, if such estate or interest would go to the heirs. Ibid.

So the Revised Statutes of Indiana of 1881, section 2491, secure to the wife, at the death of her husband, one third in fee simple in all the real estate of which the husband may have been seized during the marriage, in the conveyance of which she may not have joined in due form of law, and section 2499 provides that no act or conveyance performed or executed by the husband without been purchased, paid for, and used by the firm as a site for its manufacturing plant, the title being taken in the individual names of the partners; that, in an action brought by one partner against his copartner to dissolve the partnership and wind up its affairs, the property was ordered sold as one parcel, the proceeds to be applied in payment of the firm debts, and the surplus, if any, divided between the partners according to their respective rights; that at such sale it was sold to plaintiff's grantor for an amount somewhat in excess of the sum required to pay the debts of the firm; that this surplus was distributed between the partners, no part of it being paid to defendant; that defendant was not a party to the action, and has never joined in any conveyance of the property. The defendant, as wife of one of the partners, claimed an inchoate interest in an undivided half of the premises, and this action was brought to determine this adverse claim.

It is well known that the English doctrine was that partnership real estate is considered as personal property for all purposes. The doctrine of the American courts on the subject is more restricted. Some of the earlier decisions in New York and Massachusetts went almost to the length of entirely subverting the equity doctrine prevalent in England; but, as remarked by Chancellor Kent, the other American decisions are not inconsistent with the more correct and improved view of the English law. It is now held with practical unanimity by the American courts that, if partnership capital be invested in land for the benefit of the company, all the incidents attached to it which belong to any other stock, so far as consistent with the statute of frauds and the technical rules of conveyancing, and that it will be treated as personal estate until it has performed all its functions to the partnership, and thereby ceases to be any longer partnership property, and until then it is not subject to either dower or inheritance, but that, after all the purposes of the partnership have been thus accomplished, whatever land remains in specie will be regarded as real estate. The question is, At what precise moment is it reconverted into real estate, or, to speak more accurately, does it resume all the attributes and incidents of real property? We think the answer is, the moment the partnership is terminated and wound up by judgment or agreement, and it is determined that it no longer forms a part of the partnership stock, and is not required for its purposes. When a partnership is dissolved and its affairs wound up and completely ended, and any land remains in specie, unconverted, this must be deemed a determination that it is no longer a part of the copartnership stock, and an election to hold it thereafter, individually, as real estate. During the continuance of the partnership the partners can convey or mortgage it, in the course of their business, whenever they see fit, without their wives joining in the conveyance or mortgage, and the wives would have no dower or other interest in it. This is one of the very objects of treating partnership real estate as personal property; for otherwise the business of the firm might be stopped, and the partners unable to realize on the assets of the firm, by reason of the wife of one of them refusing to join in the conveyance or mortgage. They have the same power of disposition over it for the purposes of a dissolution of the partnership, the payment of its debts, and the distribution or division of the capital among themselves; for until that is done the property has not fulfilled its functions as personality, or ceased to be partnership property.

the assent of his wife evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof, in the manner required by law, shall prejudice or extinguish the right of the wife to her third of his lands. Grisson v. Moore (1886) 106 Ind. 298, 55 Am. Rep. 742.

The mortgage of a wife attaches to the interest of her husband in the land, even by a partition and the dation en paiement to her in satisfaction of her claim for paraphernalia property, received by the husband as authorized by law under sections 2367, 2421, 2402, of the Louisiana Civil Code. Pecot v. Armelin Bros. (1869) 21 La. Ann. 607.

By section 1, volume 1, of the Revised Statutes of New York, p. 740, a widow is endowable of a third part of all lands whereof her husband was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage, and other provisions of the same statute provide for dower in certain equitable interests. 2 Rev. Stat. §§ 63, 64, p. 374, §§ 71, 72, p. 112.

But it must appear that such equitable estate is valid and recognizable. Re Ransom (1888) 17 Fed. Rep. 331.

A claim that the property was bought by the deceased and the survivor as partners the deed being in the firm name, the survivor paying his share as partner and remaining in possession as such, having paid a large amount in improvements, is good as against the widow's claim for dower and parol evidence of the facts is admissible. Thompson v. Eghert (1874) 3 Thomp. & C. 474.

A husband who in his wife's right is a partner in certain real estate, and in the management of its business, and as such shares the profits from the time his wife's interest accrued until her decease is entitled to an estate by the courtesy, the wife's seisin being sufficient. Buckley v. Buckley (1860) 11 Barb. 43.

A widow is entitled to dower out of real estate held in trust for the benefit of the partners and conveyed to others, who subsequently execute a declaration of trust specifying the proportions belonging to each of the cestui que trust, the property being considered as no longer personal estate but as real estate, vesting in the cestui que trust an equitable title. Nicoll v. Ogden (1862) 20 Ill. 323, 31 Am. Dec. 811.

But it has been held that a widow of a deceased partner is not dowerable in real estate purchased with partnership funds and held in the name of the partners, or on their behalf. Richardson v. Wyatt (1807) 2 Desaus. Eq. 471.

b. Must yield to partnership claims, Moneys, and accounts.

Real estate purchased with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes must be applied to the payment of partnership debts and the adjustment of the accounts as between the partners when the personal property of the firm is not sufficient for the discharge of the same, before the right of a widow of a deceased partner to dower can attach thereto. Andrew v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 55 Am. Dec. 232; Espy v. Comer (1864) 70 Ala. 501; Lenow v. Fones (1886) 48 Ark. 557; Drewry v. Montgomery (1861) 28 Ark. 256; Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 618; Loubat v. Nourse (1863) 5 Fla. 350;

And what the partners may thus do voluntarily the court may do for them, in an action brought to dissolve the partnership and wind up its affairs. As the defendant was not a party to the former action, she is, of course, not estopped by it, nor is it evidence against her of anything except of the fact of its own rendition. But the material fact remains that in the process of the dissolution of the firm, and the winding up of its affairs, in an action for that purpose, the land was sold and converted into money, and the money distributed among the creditors and partners according to law. Upon these facts, under the rules already announced, the land in the hands of the purchaser is not subject to any inchoate interest of the wives of the partners. The error which lies at the foundation of the whole argument of defendants' counsel is in the assumption that, at the time of the purchase of this property, it became the individual real estate of the husband, and that the inchoate right of the wife under the statute immediately attached, subject only to a lien for the payment of partnership debts. This is not correct, and none of the authorities that we have found so hold. The fact is that only so much of it becomes the individual real estate of the partner as remains in specie, unconverted, after all the purposes of the partnership have been entirely fulfilled, and it is only to such of it that any inchoate interest of the wife ever attaches. If counsel's contention is correct the partners could never, even during the active life of the copartnership, convey perfect title to partnership land without their wives joining, except to the extent actually necessary to pay existing debts of the firm. This would practically involve, in every case where one of the wives refused to join in a conveyance, the necessity of a suit to which she is made a party, in order to determine whether the sale was necessary to pay debts. Any such rule would hamper the business of the firm to an extent that might practically defeat the purposes of the partnership.

The court below seems to have laid special stress upon the fact that it was not made to appear on the trial that it was necessary to have sold all this property to pay the debts of the firm, but this is immaterial, either under the view of the law which we have taken, or under that urged by counsel. In fact, we understood counsel to frankly concede this on the argument.

Upon the facts found, judgment ought to have been ordered in favor of the plaintiff, adjudging that defendant has no interest, inchoate or otherwise, in the land. Cause remanded, with directions to the court below to render judgment accordingly.

Buck, J., absent, sick, took no part.

The partnership having no beneficial interest in the property distinct from partnership purposes. Trowbridge v. Cross (1886) 117 Ill. 109.

The widow's estate being derived from her husband, and as such subject to all incumbrances existing against it at the acquisition of his title. Sumner v. Hampson (1888) 8 Ohio, 323, 32 Am. Dec. 775.

The derivative right, in equity extending no further in behalf of the wife and children than that of the partner from whom it is derived. Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 532.

The trust reposed in the partners in favor of the firm creditors and the partners themselves, must be fully executed and fulfilled. Bopp v. Fox (1872) 63 Ill. 540; Howard v. Priest, supra; Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 537.

Charges upon partnership real estate, being prior to the claims of the representatives of the deceased partner, override the widow's title to dower. Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252.

A conveyance by a surviving partner of the en-the equitable estate, and also of the legal estate vested in him as trustee for the partnership, for the purpose of payment of the partnership debts and settlement of the partnership accounts, is valid against any claim by the widow or heirs of the deceased partner. Mowry v. Bradley (1876) 11 R. I. 370.

And the wives of surviving partners having no interest in the land are not necessary parties to complete the title, although they united with their husband in a bond for a conveyance. Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 631.

The lands being necessarily taken for the payment of the debts, they have no future interest. Ibid.

And any mode of sale that passes the title to the property for such purposes will bar dower. Simpson v. Lech (1877) 86 Ill. 286; Duhring v. Duhring (1854) 20 Mo. 174.

It is also subservient to the lien of an unpaid vendor. Sherley v. Thomasson (Ky.) Sept. 23, 1886.

And also to the lien existing in favor of a surviving partner on the partnership real estate as against the debts of the firm. Dyer v. Clark (1848) 5 Met. 532, 39 Am. Dec. 697.

Also to his lien for securing moneys due by a deceased partner to the firm, no beneficial interest attaching in favor of the widow and heirs of a deceased partner until such surviving partner is indemnified. Ibid.

The equitable lien attaches to the estate at the moment of its acquisition, and each partner and all claiming their estate as the heir or widow, must take subject thereto, and can have only the interest that the deceased partner had. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 18 Am. Dec. 642.

And so where real estate is so purchased under an agreement that at the termination of the partnership the same shall be sold for payment of debts, and the residue of the partnership effects are insufficient to discharge the same, whether it is conveyed to one or all of the partners, it is not subject to dower. Ibid.

The equitable interference with partnership real estate is exercised as well against the widow claiming dower as against the heirs. Wilcox v. Wilcox (1866) 13 Allen, 253, following Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 637; Dyer v. Clark (1848) 5 Met. 532, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 582.

And as against a partner holding partnership real estate for partnership purposes, and as against his widow and heirs, equity will interpose to secure to his copartners their actual and beneficial interest. Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 93 Mass. 107.

The Illinois statute in regard to homestead was not intended to apply to partnership property. Trowbridge v. Cross (1886) 117 Ill. 109.

The widow of a deceased partner, who has received all such partner's share of the proceeds of partnership real estate in excess of the amount necessary to pay the firm's debts is estopped from claiming any interest in the real estate as against the creditors thereof. Walling v. Burgess (1890) 7 L. R. A. 481, 122 Ind. 299.

The court will sustain the widow's right to a year's allowance, because the law requires it to be made out of specific property to be designated by the commissioners, and that the husband has no right in the partnership assets until the partnership debts are paid. Lyon v. Lyon (1873) 1 Tenn. Ch. 225.

e. When dower attaches.

With respect to the widow's right to dower in real estate purchased with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes the general rule is that a widow of a deceased partner will be entitled to dower in his share of any real estate of the firm not required for the payment of the firm debts and the adjusting of equitable claims as between the partners themselves. Campbell v. Campbell (1879) 80 N. J. Eq. 415; Uhler v. Semple (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 288; Buchan v. Smmner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Shearer v. Shearer, (1867) 108 Mass. 107; Foster's App. (1874) 74 Pa. 391; Galbraith v. Tracy (1894) 163 Ill. 54, post. —; Strong v. Lord (1883) 107 Ill. 25; Walling v. Burgess (1890) 7 L. R. A. 481, 122 Ind. 299; Sykes v. Sykes (1873) 49 Miss. 190; Drewry v. Montgomery (1881) 28 Ark. 256; Espy v. Comer (1894) 76 Ala. 501; Pepper v. Pepper (1887) 24 Ill. App. 316; Cornwall v. Cornwall (1869) 6 Bush, 809; Grisson v. Moore (1886) 106 Ind. 293, 55 Am. Rep. 742; Huston v. Neil (1873) 41 Ind. 504; Cobble v. Tomlinson (1875) 50 Ind. 550; Van Staden v. Kline (1884) 64 Iowa, 318, 60 Am. Rep. 799; Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 417; Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 295; Dawson v. Parsons (1894) 68 N. Y. S. R. 320, 10 Misc. 428; Greenwood v. Marvin (1888) 111 N. Y. 423; Holton v. Guinn (1896) 65 Fed. Rep. 455; Stroud v. Stroud (1898) 61 N. C. 525; Mowry v. Bradley (1876) 11 R. I. 370; Hiscock v. Jaycox (1875) 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 507; and see further cases cited supra, head b.

Where the partners have not, either by an express or implied agreement, indicated an intention to convert their lands into personal estate. Goodburn v. Stevens (1847) 5 Gill, 1.

Such real estate being treated in equity, as at law, according to its real nature. Ibid.

Her interest is confined to what may remain of the husband's interest. Grisson v. Moore, Huston v. Neil, and Cobble v. Tomlinson, supra.

Under section 2 of chapter 43 of the North Carolina Revised Code. Stroud v. Stroud (1898) 61 N. C. 525.

And the widow is entitled to one third of such net proceeds absolutely as a distributee. Cornwall v. Cornwall (1869) 6 Bush, 809.

The residuum after satisfying partnership liabilities and equalizing interests, not being personality but retaining all the attributes of reality. Espy v. Comer (1894) 76 Ala. 501.

And that as against any new firm. Hiscock v. Jaycox (1875) 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 507.

By force of the Ohio statute a widow is only entitled to a share of the beneficial interest of her husband in such lands. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 18 Am. Dec. 642.

It will attach in the case of bonds or contracts for the purchase of real estate fulfilled by the surviving partner or specifically enforced. Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 93 Mass. 107.

Yet her right to dower will remain unaffected by the firm debts, liabilities, and accounts.

Where there is no agreement that lands purchased by the partners shall be sold for the benefit of the partnership, and be regarded as joint stock, and where there is no application of such lands to the purposes of the concern as evidences an original understanding of the parties that they were to be treated as partnership property and stock, the wife of a deceased partner is entitled to dower. Woodbridge v. Wilkins (1890) 8 How. (Miss.) 380.

It also attaches where there is an agreement by the partners that upon dissolution from any cause their respective freehold estates and interests shall not be brought into such accounts and valuation, nor be sold, but shall continue to belong to and remain vested in the said partners, their heirs and assigns, in the shares and proportions in which they were respectively entitled, as such property will not then be converted into personality but it will be considered as real estate. Hughes v. Allen (1894) 65 Vt. 95.

So the mere fact of the partners agreeing with each other to purchase lands, and so purchasing, each paying his proportion of the purchase money, with the agreement to share the profits and losses equally, not constituting the lands partnership assets, nor making the parties partners therein, will not bar nor affect the widow's right to dower therein. Shipp v. Snyder (1894) 121 Mo. 155.

And so where the fee vested in the husband before the partnership, there being no ground for imposing such a trust on the widow and no room for the application of the equitable doctrine of conversion, she is not deprived either in law or in equity of all beneficial dower. She must have released her dower right to the firm. Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 348, 53 Fed. Rep. 86.

In the above case, the husband and wife subsequently to the formation of the partnership conveyed a third of the lands held by the husband prior to the formation of the partnership to the partner, and the court stated that even if conceded that a recital in the deed showed that the transaction was in reality intended between the partners to be a transfer of the land, from such grantor as an individual to himself and his partner as a firm, each partner contributing his share of the consideration, yet there was nothing to infer an intention on his part to treat the real estate as personalty, for the purposes of distribution upon death, the wife being dowerable therein as if no partnership had been formed, as on no principle of law or equity could she be deprived of her beneficial interest. Ibid.

The same doctrine was applied to a mercantile partnership afterwards extended by mutual consent to the purchase and sale of lands in which there was an extensive business, the purchases not being made for the purposes of the firm according to the original design, and not necessary to enable the parties to carry on the mercantile business, there being no evidence that the lands so purchased were by the contract to be considered as personalty, or that they were treated as either personalty or joint stock, being conveyed, not by the partnership name, but as individual tenants in common, with a relinquishment of dower in every instance, the partners considering it as an ordinary conveyance of land, the purchase with the joint fund constituting them tenants in common, the widow being dowerable out of such lands. Markham v. Merrett (1843) 7 How. (Miss.) 497, 40 Am. Dec. 76.

And also to a case in which some of the property was leased by her husband in his lifetime, and a plantation was occupied by the son of the deceased, under an agreement of partnership in planting, which was to continue, notwithstanding the death of the father, and which had then seven years to run, the widow being endowable of a proper proportion of the farm, but not so as to interrupt the partnership arrangement, nor to take effect in possession as admeasured until the occupancy of the son under the articles terminated, she in the meantime to be paid one third of one half of the profits annually; and to be entitled to that proportion of the profits of the farm since the death of her husband, and to one third of the rents of the other real estate from the same date. Sykes v. Sykes (1878) 49 Miss. 190.

It has, however, been stated that although the lands may be partnership property, and the transactions relative to their purchase of a commercial nature, and the proceeds liable to be applied to the satisfaction of the joint debts, yet in the strict sense they are real estate and subject to its incidents, the partners being respectively seised of a legal estate of inheritance as tenants in common, notwithstanding the property is to be treated as partnership property, and therefore the right to dower attaches as an incident to the legal title and seisin. Smith v. Jackson (1838) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 235.

A widow is a proper party to a bill for partition, where the partnership debts have been paid and 37 L. R. A.

all accounts settled, as she has a dower interest in an undivided share of the lands belonging to the dissolved partnership in which her husband was a member. Brewer v. Browne (1880) 68 Ala. 210; Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 319.

So the widow is entitled to an assignment of dower. Loubat v. Nourse (1858) 5 Fla. 350.

Where dower was actually assigned nearly three years prior to the filing of the bill to enforce the lien for partnership debts, the court refused to disturb the assignment. Clay v. Freeman (1886) 118 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 104.

And in Nutt v. Mechanic's Bank (1880) 4 Cranch, C. C. 102, where a bill was filed in equity for dower in partnership lands conveyed in trust to secure debts due to the defendant, and sold by the trustee to the bank, the partners having divided their joint property, without any legal conveyance or deed of partition of the real estate, an assignment of dower was decreed.

A wife who, as a necessary party, unites with her husband in the mortgage of partnership lands, still retains a right of dower in the equity of redemption which is not entirely lost by the foreclosure and sale. Smith v. Jackson (1838) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 235.

And the same is the case as against a purchaser of the deceased husband's share in partnership real estate, where there is no controversy or claim by partnership creditors. Bowman v. Bailey (1884) 20 S. C. 550.

So where, after dissolution, the husband conveyed his interest in real estate purchased and paid for with partnership funds to his copartners under whom the defendant claimed, the widow is entitled to dower in the one half of which her deceased husband has been seised. Reed v. Kennedy (1847) 2 Strobb. L. 67.

Again where partnership real estate is held in trust, a declaration of trust being subsequently executed specifying the proportions belonging to each of the cestui que trust, it will not be considered as personalty, but as realty vesting in each cestui que trust an equitable title out of which the widow is dowerable. Nicoll v. Ogden (1862) 29 Ill. 323, 31 Am. Dec. 311.

In Collins v. Warren (1859) 29 Mo. 236, a house built upon real estate conveyed to two partners and improved with partnership funds was occupied by one partner until his death, his widow afterwards retaining possession, the facts showing a suit for taking the accounts and for a sale of such estate for the payment of the firm debts, alleging that the same was partnership estate, instituted against such partner in his lifetime and revived against his administrator; a purchase of the partner's interest at sheriff's sale prior to his decease, under a mortgage to such purchaser; such purchaser being made a party to the suit upon the ground of notice; that a decree was rendered in the suit by which the mortgagee's interest was postponed until the partnership affairs were settled, the surviving partner being the purchaser at the sale held thereunder who sought to eject the widow, but the widow being no party was held not bound by the decree which was not even evidence against her, and that the surviving purchaser was only entitled to half.

d. In lands purchased for the purpose of resale.

In so far as the cases mentioned under this head relate to the general principles of the law concerning dower, they are not intended to be exhaustive of the doctrine, but are limited to cases of dower in partnership real estate wherein the principles have been set forth as establishing her right to dower in such lands.

The widow of a partner in whose name lands are purchased for a joint undertaking relating to the proceeds of the sale thereof is not entitled to dower. Coster v. Clarke (1841) 3 Edw. Ch. 438, 6 L. ed. 714.

In the above case several persons purchased for their joint benefit, under an agreement that the proceeds and avails of such estate taken in the name of one were for their joint account until the sale and conversion, a bill being filed for partition praying a sale and account, the executors of the deceased partner being joined; an objection taken that the heirs should have been joined was overruled on the ground that the shares lost their quality of land and descended as personal estate, and further that the widow was not a necessary party, having no right of dower. Ibid.

The same conclusion was arrived at where the object of the partnership was the buying and selling of real estate, the interest of the individual members being the proceeds of the sales, the written contract expressly providing therefor and vesting the title in a trustee, with express power to sell and convey the same and to distribute the receipts from the sales to the members in proportion to their interests, the contract rebutting the idea that the persons paying the money became seised of an estate in the land. Mallory v. Russell (1887) 71 Iowa, 63, 60 Am. Rep. 776. Hewitt v. Rankin (1876) 41 Iowa, 35, to the same effect.

e. Effect of an agreement converting real estate into personality.

The equitable doctrine of out and out conversion of partnership real estate into personality, under which the widow is deprived of benefit from her dower estate in the land, is worked out on the theory that the land having been acquired with partnership funds, there is imposed on those on whom the legal title is cast a trust to execute the purposes for which the partners bought it, and that if one of such purposes was out and out conversion into personality it would exclude any beneficial dower interest. Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 348, 58 Fed. Rep. 86.

Partners may by express agreement so convert real estate brought into partnership stock that it will be considered personal property not only as between themselves but as between their heirs, personal representatives, and others. McDermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 438, 10 Am. Dec. 468; Ripley v. Waterworth (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 424.

But the widow's right to dower upon partnership real estate is inchoate in the absence of an agreement expressly changing its character to personality, where such real estate is not required for the payment of the partnership debts and liabilities, and adjusting the accounts of the partners inter se. Hale v. Plummer (1865) 6 Ind. 121.

Yet real estate may be so held for partnership purposes as to exclude the widow's right to dower, and it may also be so held as not to exclude it. Ibid.

A widow of a deceased partner is not dowerable in lands which the firm owned and regarded as partnership stock. Johns v. Johns (1853) 1 Ohio St. 360, 367; Sumner v. Hampson (1838) 8 Ohio, 223, 23 Am. Dec. 722.

Where partnership articles stipulate, inter alia, that on the dissolution of the firm the property (a portion of which consisted of real estate) shall be sold and the proceeds first applied in payment of the firm debts, she is not entitled to dower, her husband being, at no time during coverture seised of such an estate of inheritance in the lands as is contemplated by the Ohio statute giving the widow dower. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 585, 13 Am. Dec. 648.

f. Right to dower in improvements.

The value of land at the time of alienation is the extent to which the widow is endowable. Mark- ham v. Merrett (1845) 7 How. (Miss.) 497, 40 Am. Dec. 76; Woodbridge v. Wilkins (1889) 3 How. (Miss.) 360.

In the improvements, as in all property of a firm, the rights of the widow and heirs are subject to the adjustment of all claims between the partners, and attach only to the surplus which remains when the partnership affairs are wound up. Grisson v. Moore (1890) 106 Ind. 236, 55 Am. Rep. 742; Matlock v. Matlock (1854) 5 Ind. 408; Cobbie v. Tomlinson (1875) 50 Ind. 550; Haas v. Shaw (1888) 91 Ind. 384, 48 Am. Rep. 607.

And so far as regards an improvement in the value of such lands, by the labor or money of the alienee, the widow cannot have the benefit thereof. Woodbridge v. Wilkins, supra.

In Markham v. Merrett, supra, the court approved of the rule as to the allotment of dower in case of improvements, as laid down in Woodbridge v. Wilkins, supra.

Where under the agreement for partnership, lots and buildings and machinery are contributed and brought into the firm as stock or firm property and improved with partnership funds for the purposes of the partnership, the widow of a deceased partner is not entitled to dower out of such improvements but is entitled to her share as heir. Grisson v. Moore, supra.

g. When widow entitled to an equivalent.

If a partnership is insolvent at the date of its dissolution, the widow will be entitled to a proper allowance out of the proceeds of the sale of the partnership lands, as an equivalent for her dower. Goodburn v. Stevens (1847) 5 Gill, 1.

h. Widow's right to retain possession.

Where real estate is owned by two partners as tenants in common, and one dies being in possession of the whole at his death, his widow continuing to reside therein, under the sixteenth section of the Missouri Dower Act of 1845, such widow is not entitled as against the survivor, to continue possession until dower is assigned. Collins v. Warren (1859) 29 Mo. 236.

i. How affected by husband's private debts.

The widow's right to dower in her husband's interest in partnership real estate is not held subject to the payment of his private debts. Shearer v. Shearer (1887) 98 Mass. 107; Lenow v. Fones (1886) 48 Ark. 557.

j. Homestead rights.

The right to a homestead exemption does not place the widow upon any higher ground. Robertshaw v. Hanway (1876) 52 Miss. 713.

And her homestead right will not attach to property conveyed by one partner, with the consent and in the presence of the others. Ferguson v. Hanauer (1892) 56 Ark. 179.

k. Right of widow to join in deed, action or suit affecting such estate.

A widow of the deceased partner has no power as administratrix to join with the survivors in giving a note and mortgage upon partnership real estate, for the debt of the firm. Robertshaw v. Hanway (1876) 52 Miss. 713.

Where there is no surplus in the partnership real estate, a widow is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mortgage thereon. Houston v. Niel (1873) 41 Ind. 504.

The widow of a deceased partner, in her capacity as executrix signing the application of one of the surviving partners for a respite, the schedule embracing as firm property all the immovable property standing in the name of the deceased partner, being told by such partner that it was her interest to do so, she having no appreciation that her signature implied any liability or relinquishment of any right, does not thereby affect her right to dower, or the heirs' interests. Hardin v. Jamison (Minn.) Feb. 23, 1896.

II. The rights of the heirs.

a. The legal estate passes to the heir of a deceased partner.

Land purchased by partners for partnership purposes with partnership funds, used as part of the stock in trade, is considered in equity as partnership property, when the conveyance is made to both partners, and upon the death of one a legal title will pass to his heir. Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 56 Ala. 405; Abernathy v. Moses (1882) 73 Ala. 381; Roulston v. Washington (1886) 79 Ala. 529; Blanchard v. Floyd (1890) 98 Ala. 53; Percefull v. Platt (1890) 86 Ark. 456; Dupuy v. Leavenworth (1861) 17 Cal. 262; Loubat v. Nourse (1853) 5 Fla. 350; Baker v. Middlebrooks (1888) 81 Ga. 491; Galbraith v. Gedge (1865) 16 B. Mon. 631; Cornwall v. Cornwall (1890) 6 Bush, 369; Bank of Louisville v. Hall (1871) 8 Bush, 672; Lowe v. Lowe (1873) 13 Bush, 638; Holmes v. Self (1881) 79 Ky. 207; Caskey v. Caskey (1878) 5 Ky. L. Rep. 775; Flanagan v. Shuck (1885) 23 Ky. 619; Goodburn v. Stevens (1847) 5 Gill, 1; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 582; Wilcox v. Wilcox (1896) 13 Allen, 252; Scruggs v. Blair (1870) 44 Miss. 406; Hanway v. Robertshaw (1874) 49 Miss. 758; Smith v. Jackson (1893) 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 295; Buckley v. Buckley (1860) 11 Barb. 43; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 368, 7 L. ed. 627; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Greene v. Graham (1881) 5 Ohio, 264; Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 22; Summey v. Patton (1864) Winst. Eq. 52, 36 Am. Dec. 451; Yeatman v. Woods (1884) 6 Yerg. 20, 27 Am. Dec. 452; Piper v. Smith (1859) 1 Head, 97; Williamson v. Fountain (1874) 7 Baxt. 212; Griffey v. Northcott (1871) 5 Helsk. 746; Jones v. Sharp (1872) 9 Helsk. 660; McAllister v. Montgomery (1816) 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 94; Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22; Pierce v. Trigg (1839) 10 Leigh, 406; Platt v. Oliver (1842) 8 McLean, 27; Logan v. Greenlaw (1885) 25 Fed. Rep. 299; Clay v. Field (1888) 84 Fed. Rep. 375; Megibben v. Perin (1892) 49 Fed. Rep. 183; Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 348, 53 Fed. Rep. 86; Shanks v. Klein (1881) 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 635.

Such real estate preserving its distinct qualities, the heir holding in common with the survivor. Buckley v. Buckley, supra; Broom v. Broom (1834) 3 Myl. & K. 443; Howard v. Priest, Buchan v. Sumner, Hanway v. Robertshaw, Scruggs v. Blair, and Loubat v. Nourse, supra.

Exactly as it would were the partners tenants in common. Perin v. Megibben and Greene v. Graham, supra.

In equity as well as at law. Summey v. Patton, supra.

Though equity will treat it as personal estate. Buckley v. Buckley, Delmonico v. Guillaume and Roulston v. Washington, supra.

Under the New York statutes relating to joint tenancies, the several copartners to whom a conveyance of land for partnership purposes is made become tenants in common of the legal title; and upon the death of either the undivided portion of the legal title thus vested in the deceased partner descends to his heir-at-law without reference to the equitable rights of the several partners in the land as a part of the property of the firm. Buchan v. Sumner, supra.

It so descends, subject to the payment of the firm debts, under the Tennessee Act of 1784. Griffey v. Northcott, supra.

In Piper v. Smith, supra, it was held that real estate held for partnership purposes descended to the heir-at-law of a deceased partner, as real estate, by virtue of the case. McAllister v. Mont- gomery, supra; Tennessee Act of 1784, chapter 28 of section 6.

And in Yeatman v. Woods (1884) 6 Yerg. 20, 27 Am. Dec. 452, the court followed the ruling of McAllister v. Montgomery, supra, holding that on the death of a partner, the real estate of the firm descended to the heirs and was not distributable as other personal stock.

b. Nature of the title vested in the heirs.

The title, legal or equitable, however, to lands owned by a partnership, which descends to the heir of a deceased partner, devolves upon him subject to be converted into partnership effects and used for certain partnership purposes, such as the payment of the partnership debts and the adjustment of the accounts as between the partners themselves. Abernathy v. Moses (1882) 73 Ala. 381; Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 56 Ala. 405; Blanchard v. Floyd (1890) 98 Ala. 53.

He holds the legal title subservient to or in trust for the surviving partner who is charged with the payment of the debts. Andrews v. Brown, supra; Pugh v. Currie (1843) 5 Ala. 446; Pierce v. Trigg (1839) 10 Leigh, 406; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 368, 7 L. ed. 627; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Ripley v. Waterworth (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 425; Dale v. Hamilton (1846) 5 Hare, 369, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 126, 11 Jur. 163; Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 22; Loubat v. Nourse (1853) 5 Fla. 350.

For the equitable purposes of the firm. Merritt v. Dickey (1878) 86 Mich. 41; Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22.

So as to secure the beneficial interest to the firm until the purposes of the partners are accomplished. Dyer v. Clark, supra; Goodburn v. Stevens (1847) 5 Gill, 1; Cilley v. Huse (1860) 40 N. H. 358.

No matter whether such demands exist in favor of a stranger or a member of the copartnership. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell, supra.

He thus holds, having no beneficial interest in the land as land, but only a remote beneficial interest in the surplus of the whole partnership stock; having no greater right than his ancestor had. Logan v. Greenlaw (1885) 25 Fed. Rep. 299; Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 537; Priest v. Chouteau (1834) 85 Mo. 368, 55 Am. Rep. 377; Rossum v. Sinker (1880) (Ind.) 12 Cent. L. J. 302.

In trust for the purposes of the partnership, first, for the benefit of the creditors; second, for the members of the firm and their representatives, according to their several interests as fixed by the articles of copartnership. Scruggs v. Blair (1870) 44 Miss. 406; Hanway v. Robertshaw (1874) 49 Miss. 758; Megibben v. Perin (1892) 49 Fed. Rep. 183; Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Dupuy v. Leavenworth (1861) 17 Cal. 262.

And if the title is in the deceased partner alone, his heirs will still be considered as trustees for the surviving partner. Little v. Sneedcor (1875) 52 Ala. 167.

As respects a settlement of the partnership debts and accounts it partakes of the nature and incidents of personal property and is treated as such in equity. Roulston v. Washington (1886) 79 Ala. 529; Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22.

Until the debts of the firm are satisfied, neither the personal representative nor the heirs of the deceased partner have any beneficial interest in the real estate of the partnership. Offutt v. Scott (1872) 47 Ala. 104; Way v. Stebbins (1882) 47 Mich. 296; Priest v. Chouteau, supra; Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 616; Burnside v. Merrick, supra; Cilley v. Huse (1860) 40 N. H. 358; Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 307.

The legal estate in the survivor remains as before, that of a deceased going to his heirs and each holding as trustee of the partnership and of each other. Perotfull v. Platt (1880) 38 Ark. 456.

Where, however, land is conveyed to a partnership but not used in the partnership business, the general law of descent will apply and the share of a decedent partner vests in his heirs subject to satisfying the partnership creditors in preference to individual creditors. Baker v. Middlebrooks (1888) 81 Ga. 491; Platt v. Oliver (1842) 3 McLean, 27.

Neither the partners nor the heirs of a deceased partner, can acquire any interest in the partnership property, real or personal, adverse to the trust imposed upon it for the payment of the partnership debts. Robertshaw v. Hanway (1876) 52 Miss. 715.

The infant heirs of a deceased partner will be bound by a decree, divesting their title to real estate, on a bill filed for sale of such estate, and for the application of the proceeds to the payment of partnership liabilities. Creath v. Smith (1854) 20 Mo. 113.

So in the winding up of the affairs of an insolvent partnership, the assignee is entitled to have the partnership real estate vested in him, as against the heirs, widow, and administrator of the deceased partner. Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 537.

In the case of a contract of partnership entered into solely for the purpose of purchasing, improving, and equipping of real estate, the profits of the business to consist of lands and not of money, being converted into realty as rapidly as realized by investing them in the improvement and equipment of the estate, the object of the partnership being the ownership of and improving of an arable plantation, the relation of the parties to each other and to the property is analogous to the case of co-ownership of mines worked by the owners as partners, and upon a dissolution, the mine itself not being partnership property, being divided between its several owners and not sold, so that as between the real and personal representatives of a deceased partner his share is real and not personal estate, the court in such case upon a dissolution appointing a receiver to carry on the mine for the benefit of the parties interested. Berry v. Folkes (1882) 60 Miss. 570.

In such a case the heirs of a deceased partner were entitled to a partition in kind, if such could be made, such right being dependent upon a final settlement of the partnership accounts, until the payment of which there could be no division of the lands, nor withdrawal of them from the possessor of the firm, without the consent of all parties interested. Ibid.

A bill for partition will not lie against a surviving partner during the administration of the partnership estate. Holton v. Guinn (1896) 65 Fed. Rep. 450.

c. The heirs bound to convey the legal title.

In case of the death of one of the partners the survivor can sell real estate so situated, and although he cannot convey the legal title which passes to the heir or devisee of the deceased partner, yet his sale invests the purchaser with the equitable ownership of the real estate and the right to compel a conveyance of the title from the heir or devisee in a court of equity. Shanks v. Klein (1881) 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 636.

The following cases are to the same effect: Shanks v. Klein (1881) 11 Fed. Rep. 707, 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 636; Logan v. Greenlaw (1885) 25 Fed. Rep. 230; Clay v. Field (1888) 34 Fed. Rep. 375; Megibben v. Perin (1892) 49 Fed. Rep. 183; Holladay v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1893) 57 Fed. Rep. 774; Andrews v. Brown (1882) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Davis v. Smith (1887) 32 Ala. 198; Murphy v. Abrams (1874) 50 Ala. 293; Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 583; Houlston v. Washington (1885) 79 Ala. 523; Dupuy v. Leavenworth (1881) 17 Cal. 223; Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 540; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 585; Sullivan v. Smith (1864) 15 Neb. 483, 48 37 L. R. A.

Am. Rep. 358; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 343, 7 L. ed. 627; Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 R. I. 173, 67 Am. Dec. 510; McAllister v. Montgomery (1816) 8 Hayw. (Tenn.) 941; Barton v. Lovejoy (Minn.) Feb. 1, 1894.

Even though he be an infant. Tillinghast v. Champlin, supra.

Equity will compel the heirs of the deceased partner to convey the legal estate, for the purposes of having the land applied to the payment or in compromise of the partnership debts of an insolvent firm. Murphy v. Abrams, supra.

In commenting upon the doctrine laid down by the court in Andrews v. Brown, supra, the court in Lang v. Waring, supra, stated that such doctrine never was intended as establishing the theory that a court of equity would, in all cases of disposition by a surviving partner of the real estate of the firm, however unfair, incapable, or unauthorized such disposition might be, compel the heirs to convey and thus become the minister of injustice.

If the surviving partner has the power to mortgage, subject to the confirmation of the court of equity, and if the sale be fair and bona fide, such as the court would have sanctioned and sustained if made under its direction, the same would be upheld and the legal title decreed to the purchaser. Ibid.

If, however, such sale be for a grossly inadequate consideration, made under circumstances calculated to cause a sale for an almost nominal sum, the court will not lend its aid to perfect such purchase. Ibid.

d. When a necessary party to a suit relating to such lands.

The heirs of the deceased partners are necessary parties to a suit to pass title, and therefore the surviving partner cannot convey such property. Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 631.

So they are necessary parties to a bill in equity, foreclosing a mortgage in order to reduce the security to money and to the individual possession of the surviving partner. Abernathy v. Moses (1882) 73 Ala. 381. Andrews v. Brown (1882) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Caldwell v. Parmer (1876) 56 Ala. 405, followed.

Where part of partnership real estate is sold by the guardian of the heir of the partner in possession, the heir's administrator, in case of his death, is a proper party to the suit relating to such property. McGuire v. Ramsey (1849) 9 Ark. 518.

In the case of a partnership formed for the purpose of acquiring lands, and not for the conversion of them into stock in trade, the administrator and heirs of a deceased partner must be made parties to a bill filed by the continuing partners, for the purpose of enforcing a lien upon the partnership lands, and seeking to charge the personal estate of a deceased partner with the payment thereof. Dilworth v. Mayfield (1859) 36 Miss. 40.

Upon the death of one partner another covenanting to stand in his place cannot, as to the survivor, object, upon an award and decree declaring a sale of the partnership real estate, that the representatives of a deceased partner are not parties to the bill. Waugh v. Mitchell (1837) 21 N. C. 510.

e. When heirs not entitled.

If by the terms of the partnership articles, real estate is purchased with partnership funds, or is otherwise put into partnership stock to be used and held solely for partnership purposes, it is to be regarded as converted out and out into personality so that the heir-at-law takes no beneficial interest therein in any event, but the proceeds not needed for partnership purposes pass to the personal representatives of the partners. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 23.

So in the case of an arrangement by the shareholders of a land syndicate, to contribute a certain amount to the purchase of land, in the name of a trustee, to be improved, with power to sell and distribute the proceeds among them, upon the death of a shareholder his heirs are not entitled to partition, the arrangement never contemplating the shareholders taking an interest in the land, but only an interest in the proceeds of the sale thereof. Kahn v. Central Smelting Co. (1881) 102 U. S. 641, 28 L. ed. 268.

2. As between the surviving partner and the heirs.

Upon the death of a partner, his share is under the control and disposition of the surviving partner, in the winding up of the firm, and does not vest in his heirs. VanAken v. Clark (1891) 82 Iowa 256.

And until the close of such administration the possession of the partnership realty by the surviving partner is adverse to and exclusive of the heirs-at-law and for that reason partition will not lie. Holton v. Guinn (1895) 65 Fed. Rep. 450; Holmes v. McGee (1859) 27 Mo. 597; Priest v. Chouteau (1864) 65 Mo. 407, 55 Am. Rep. 373.

But the surviving member and the heirs are tenants in common, the surviving partner having power to dispose of the realty as other assets belonging to the firm. Jones v. Sharp (1872) 9 Helsk. 600; Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 533; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 56 Ala. 405; Price v. Hicks (1874) 14 Fla. 565; Espy v. Comer (1884) 78 Ala. 501; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Henshaw (1890) 89 Ala. 448; Yeatman v. Woods (1884) 6 Yerg. 20, 27 Am. Dec. 452; McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 191; Clay v. Field (1888) 34 Fed. Rep. 876; Wilson v. Soper (1852), 13 B. Mon. 411, 56 Am. Dec. 573.

Such lands vesting in the surviving partner as against the heir of the deceased partner, in whose name they were purchased, for the payment of debts. Way v. Stebbins (1882) 47 Mich. 206.

In equity a surviving partner is treated as a trustee, with the fiduciary relation of trustee and cestui que trust existing between him and the representative of the deceased partner. Galbraith v. Tracy (1894) 153 Ill. 54, post, 28 L. R. A. 129.

The equitable right and interest are in the survivor. Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 366, 7 L. ed. 627; Clay v. Field, supra.

Who has, for firm purposes, the whole beneficial interest. Pierce v. Trigg (1839) 10 Leigh, 406; Price v. Hicks, supra.

And as against heirs and devisees of the deceased partner, full control of the partnership property. Barton v. Lovejoy (Minn.) Feb. 1, 1894; Priest v. Chouteau (1884) 85 Mo. 396, 55 Am. Rep. 377; Rossum v. Sinker (1890) (Ind.) 12 Cent. L. J. 202.

The heir being a mere trustee of the legal estate. Delmonico v. Guillaume, supra.

For the purpose of executing the trust reposed in him, a surviving partner has a right in equity, as between himself and the heir, to sell the whole beneficial interest in partnership real estate for the payment of the firm debts and adjusting the accounts of the partnership as between the partners. Tillinghast v. Champin (1866) 4 R. I. 173, 67 Am. Dec. 510; Delmonico v. Guillaume, supra; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 576, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 585; Burriside v. Merriok (1842) 4 Met. 540; Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 532; McAlister v. Montgomery (1816) 3 Ray. (Tenn.) 94; Shanks v. Klein (1881) 104 U. S. 23, 26 L. ed. 636; Loubat v. Nourse (1853) 5 Fla. 350; Price v. Hicks (1874) 14 Fla. 565; Clay v. Freeman (1886) 118 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 104; Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207; Holladay v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1893) 57 Fed. Rep. 714.

In the same manner as though it were personal estate. Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22.

The deed of the surviving partner however will only pass the equitable title. Megibben v. Perin 27 L. R. A.

(1892) 49 Fed. Rep. 133; Andrews v. Brown, supra; Du-puy v. Leavenworth (1861) 17 Cal. 262; Walling v. Burgess (1899) 7 L. R. A. 431, 122 Ind. 239; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845); Dyer v. Clark, and Holliday v. Land & River Imp. Co. supra; Shanks v. Klein (1881) 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 635.

And if specific performance of a contract for the sale of such an estate be decreed, the heir must join in the conveyance. Delmonico v. Guillaume, supra.

The surviving partner and all others must join in order to convey the legal title to a purchaser, the surviving partner alone having no capacity to transfer a legal title. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Henshaw (1890) 89 Ala. 448; Espy v. Comer (1884) 76 Ala. 501; Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 533; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 56 Ala. 405; Yeatman v. Woods (1884) 6 Yerg. 20, 27 Am. Dec. 452; McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 191.

The equitable title vesting in the survivor empowers him to sell to pay partnership debts or settle partnership equities, and enables him to compel, by aid of a court of equity, the heirs of the deceased partner to perfect the sale by deeding such legal title. Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 348, 53 Fed. Rep. 86. To the same effect, Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 631; Cornwall v. Cornwall (1869) 6 Bush, 369; Bank of Louisville v. Hall (1871) 8 Bush, 672; Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688; Holmes v. Self (1881) 79 Ky. 207; Caskey v. Caskey, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 775; Flanagan v. Shuck (1885) 82 Ky. 619; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 366, 7 L. ed. 27; Divine v. Mitchum (1844) 4 B. Mon. 438, 41 Am. Dec. 241; Spalding v. Wilson (1883) 80 Ky. 590; Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 20 Ohio St. 53.

It vests beneficially in such survivor in order to compel a sale and disposition of the proceeds, in the same manner as the personal estate of the firm is disposed of. Pierce v. Trigg (1839) 10 Leigh, 406.

And see further, cases cited in note to Galbraith v. Tracy (Ill.) post, 28 L. R. A. 129, head, Position of surviving partner.

The proper disposition of such lands by a surviving partner may be set up as a counterclaim in equity, in answer to an action of ejectment by the heirs or those holding under them. Weld v. Johnson Mfg. Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 552; Blodgett v. Hitt (1871) 29 Wis. 169; Jarvis v. Peck (1865) 19 Wis. 74; Grignon v. Black (1890) 76 Wis. 674; Wilson v. Hooser (1890) 76 Wis. 337; Weeks v. Milwaukee, L. & W. R. Co. (1891) 78 Wis. 501.

Where the articles of partnership contain an express provision that real estate purchased for partnership purposes shall "be considered as part of the joint stock and funds of the firm, and as possessing all the incidents and liabilities of partnership funds and personal property, and hereby fully impressed by the partner with such incidents and liabilities" the articles being duly probated as part of the will of a deceased partner, the deed of the surviving partner, though not executed for the purpose of paying the debts of the partnership, will convey a perfect title as against the heirs of the deceased. Davis v. Smith (1897) 88 Ala. 196.

Where, however, the articles of partnership substitute a new rule and according to their true import, the whole estate, whether real or personal, passes to the surviving partners, they would be bound to surrender to the representatives of the deceased partner his share of the capital and profits, and in such a case equity would decree a conveyance to the surviving partner. Robertson v. Miller (1830) 1 Brook. 466.

Negotiations between the partners for settling of the partnership affairs, carried out by the executor of the deceased partner, and the survivor by conveyance by the former to the latter of the partnership lands, bind the heirs and devisees in the absence of fraud, when twenty-four years have elapsed and all evidence relating to the partnership affairs has disappeared. Holladay v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1896) 57 Fed. Rep. 774.

A surviving partner purchasing outstanding title in order to perfect the firm title, holds as trustee for the heirs upon their paying their proportion of the purchase price. Forrer v. Forrer (1877) 29 Gratt. 184.

But land purchased by a surviving partner under an attachment issued by a surviving partner to secure payment of a debt due to the late firm does not become partnership real estate descendible to the heirs, and such surviving partner could convert it into personalty. Bright v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1890) 42 Fed. Rep. 479.

Where partnership lands held in cotenancy are sold by the survivor, who describes himself as surviving partner, the conveyance passes only his own interest, and severs his relation as cotenant with the heirs, and as survivor he holds the other moiety in trust for the heirs; and such survivor's heirs take the estate charged with the equities in favor of the heirs and of the firm creditors. Gillett v. Gaffney (1877) 3 Colo. 351.

A power given by the heirs of a deceased partner to the surviving partner, constituting him attorney in fact, to "settle up" old firm matters and also the estate of the deceased partner among those entitled thereto, and investing him with authority "to do all acts which might be necessary to accomplish said result," is to be given a strict construction so as to preclude the exercise of all authority not expressly given or necessarily implied, as usual and proper in order to execute the agency, and will not be construed so as to imply that the sale of lands is necessary in order to settle up and divide the estate of the deceased, and therefore a conveyance to a purchaser by the surviving partner is not within the powers of the letter of attorney, and is ineffectual as making no reference to the power and not purporting to be executed under its authority. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Henshaw (1890) 89 Ala. 448. To the same effect Cummins v. Beaumont (1890) 68 Ala. 204; Dearing v. Lightfoot (1849) 16 Ala. 28; Wood v. McCain, 7 Ala. 800, 42 Am. Dec. 612; Scarborough v. Reynolds (1847) 12 Ala. 252; Ashley v. Bird (1836) 1 Mo. 640, 24 Am. Dec. 518; Rosmiter v. Rosmiter (1832) 8 Wend. 494, 14 Am. Dec. 68, 65, 66; Hay v. Mayer (1839) 3 Watts, 205, 34 Am. Dec. 458.

In Colgate v. Colgate (1873) 23 N. J. Eq. 372, it was sought to specifically perform a contract entered into by the executor of a deceased partner in a firm, with the firm, of which firm such executor was himself a partner, for the sale of the testator's real estate, and the court held that such contract would not be so specifically performed if the cestui que trust objected, neither would it be confirmed.

An agreement that at three months after death an account and valuation of the partnership property shall be taken and the shares ascertained according to the capital invested, and one year be allowed to pay over the value of the share of the deceased partner, part of the capital being invested in real estate used in the business, the valuation being made upon death according to such provisions, is sufficient to entitle the survivor claiming the right to take the valuation to specific performance thereof as against the administratrix, widow, and children of the deceased; the agreement for sale of the interest to the survivor working an equitable conversion of such assets as consist of real estate. Maddock v. Astbury (1890) 32 N. J. Eq. 181.

In Pierce v. Trigg (1890) 10 Leigh, 406, the court refused to set aside a sale made by the surviving partner under a decree reserving the right to the infant heirs to show cause against it, even though the fact that the land was originally purchased for partnership purposes and with partnership funds was not the ground of the original decree, and did sufficiently appear at that time, it being then clearly ascertained from the bill, answer, and cross-bill, that such fact, if it had appeared to the court making the decree, would have been sufficient to authorize such decree.

As to the general power of a surviving partner to convey, see note to Galbraith v. Tracy (Ill.) post, 28 L. R. A. 129.

g. Power of the heirs as against the surviving partner.

The heirs may hold the surviving partner to a strict account for the execution of the trust. Weld v. Johnson Mfg. Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 552.

So infant heirs of a deceased partner have power to show cause against a decree made for the sale of partnership real estate, where liberty is reserved to them. Pierce v. Trigg (1890) 10 Leigh, 406.

The court will not enforce a contract for the purchase of partnership lands from the surviving partner by the infant heirs, where such contract is not for their benefit. Derry v. Folks (1882) 60 Minn. 576.

In his character as tenant in common with the heirs of the deceased partner holding the title subject to the demands of the trust, the surviving partner's account must be with his cotenant, in which case the court of probate has no jurisdiction. Hartnett v. Fegan (1876) 8 Mo. App. 1.

Although the surviving partner sell the premises without an order of the court, yet the heirs have no right to come in and defeat the equitable title which passes upon the sale. Barton v. Lovejoy (Minn.) Feb. 1, 1894.

A purchaser with notice from a surviving partner of land procured in the name of one partner cannot affect the rights of the heirs where the rights of the partner do not survive. Hart v. Hawkins (1814) 3 Bibb, 502, 6 Am. Rep. 666.

Bonds and contracts for the purchase of real estate may properly be fulfilled by the surviving partners, and if so fulfilled by a conveyance according to their terms, or if specifically enforced, the right of the widow and heirs in the land thereby acquired attach in the same manner as if the lands had been conveyed in the lifetime of the deceased partner. Shearer v. Shearer (1877) 98 Mass. 107.

The organization of a corporation upon the death of a partner for the purpose of carrying on the partnership business, which includes the whole of the partnership property, real and personal, was held, in a proceeding under section 480 of the Civil Code of Kentucky, on behalf of the infant heirs of a deceased partner, not to divest the beneficial interest of the heirs. Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 848, 53 Fed. Rep. 86.

The continuance of the business by arrangement with the administrator of a deceased partner under a new title and the purchase of real estate and its improvement with partnership moneys, the deeds being taken in the name of one partner, such partnership being afterwards made a corporation, does not upon the insolvency of such a corporation alter the character of the real estate which continues partnership property devolving upon the heirs subject to the equities of the partnership creditors. Sprague Mfg. Co. v. Hoyt (1886) 29 Fed. Rep. 421.

It may be that the purchaser is not bound to ascertain whether as a matter of fact there are debts of the copartnership, for the payment of which it is necessary to sell the real estate, and that the conveyance will transfer to him the equitable ownership of the partnership, even if there are no debts, notwithstanding the general rule that the grantee of an equitable title takes no greater interest than his grantor had the right to convey, and that the remedy of the heir-at-law would be against the surviving partner personally, unless it is shown affirmatively that the purchaser know-or is chargeable with notice that there are no debts. Megibben v. Perin (1892) 49 Fed. Rep. 183.

Where there was no agreement stated as to the mode of disposition of real estate, and no statement of the object of the partnership, beyond that it was "for the purchase of lands," and the bill did not show any agreement or understanding that the lands purchased were to be dealt with as partnership stock in trade, or that they should be sold at all, the bill only showing a partnership for acquisition, it was held that the case did not fall within the rules of conversion, and that therefore the case fell within the rule laid down in Woodridge v. Wilkins (1890) 8 How. (Miss.) 60, that when the articles of partnership did not provide that such lands should be sold, or otherwise manifest an intention to consider them part of the effects of the partnership business, the heir was entitled to them, and that therefore the heirs were necessary parties to any judgment or decree intended to affect their interests. Dilworth v. Mayfield (1858) 36 Miss. 40.

b. As between the heir and personal representatives of such deceased partner.

As between the personal representatives and heirs-at-law of a deceased partner his share of the surplus of the real estate of the copartnership, which remains after paying the debts of the partnership and adjusting all the equitable claims of the different members of the firm as between themselves, is considered and treated as real estate. Lenow v. Fones (1886) 48 Ark. 557; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 199, 5 L. ed. 613, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Foster's App. (1873) 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553; Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 98 Mass. 107; Wilcox v. Wilcox (1866) 18 Allen, 254; Woodridge v. Wilkins (1839) 8 How. (Miss.) 573; Dilworth v. Mayfield (1858) 36 Miss. 52; Scruggs v. Blair (1870) 4 Miss. 406; McGrath v. Sinclair (1877) 55 Miss. 99; Clay v. Freeman (1886) 118 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 104; Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 319, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. Northcutt* (1871) 5 Helsk. 746; Jones v. Sharp (1872) 9 Helsk. 660; Williams v. Fontain (1871) 7 Baxt. 212; Hewitt v. Rankin (1875) 41 Iowa, 39; Bopp v. Fox (1872) 63 Ill. 540; Simpson v. Leech (1877) 96 Ill. 286; Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 631; Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688; Sherley v. Thomasson (Ky.) Sept. 25, 1886; Re Coddling & Russell (1881) 9 Fed. Rep. 849; Logan v. Greenlaw (1885) 26 Fed. Rep. 399; Loubat v. Nourse (1863) 5 Fla. 363; Buckley v. Buckley (1850) 11 Barb. 43; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 478; Willett v. Brown (1877) 45 Mo. 138, 27 Am. Rep. 235; Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 236.

There are no equities between heirs and distributees, which can call into exercise or quicken the powers of the court for the conversion of realty into personalty. Shearer v. Shearer, supra.

If real estate is purchased by partners with partnership means for partnership purposes; if it be so purchased to be dealt with and disposed of as personalty, it should for commercial convenience partake of the character which the partners have thus impressed upon it, and upon a dissolution of the partnership by death, the interest of a deceased partner ought to belong as personalty to his executor or administrator, and not to descend to the heir, and should be treated in all respects as personal estate. Galbraith v. Gedge, supra; Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 236; Davis v. Smith (1897) 82 Ala. 198; Thornton v. Dixon (1791) 3 Bro. Ch. 199; Ludlow v. Cooper (1851) 4 Ohio St. 1.

And the administrator may release the surviving partner. Ludlow v. Cooper, supra.

But rents and profits accruing from partnership real estate subsequent to the decease of a partner are considered as personal property and pass as such to the personal representatives, the heir being entitled only to the real estate, or its surplus, if sold. Griffey v. Northcutt, supra.

l. Powers vested in executors and administrators of a deceased partner.

The joint property of a partnership must first be applied to the payment of the joint debts, and therefore the administrator of a deceased partner is not entitled to any part of the fund in court for the benefit of separate creditors of next of kin, and the right to any balance from such real estate would be in the heir-at-law. Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 236.

When there is an express agreement between the partners, or one which can be clearly implied from the circumstances, to consider and treat such real estate as part of the personal property stock of the partnership, then, though the legal title to the deceased partner's interest descends to the heir under the statute of descents, the equitable title and the full beneficial interest, after the payment of the partnership debts and adjustment of the equities between the partners, vests in the personal representatives of the deceased partner for distribution as personal property, and to this end a court of equity may force a conveyance of the legal title from the heir to the vendee of the personal representatives. Perin v. Megibben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 343, 58 Fed. Rep. 86; Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 511; Cornwall v. Cornwall (1869) 6 Bush, 369; Bank of Louisville v. Hall (1871) 8 Bush, 972; Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688; Holmes v. Self (1881) 79 Ky. 297; Caakey v. Caakey, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 775; Flanagan v. Shuck (1885) 82 Ky. 619.

A bill in equity seeking a settlement of the partnership affairs, should be so framed as to enable a court to take complete cognizance of the subject-matter, and on the theory of a settlement of the accounts between the complainant (the surviving partner) and the intestate, and between them and the creditors, in order that the creditors may have an opportunity of presenting their claims, and that a proper distribution may be made of the moneys arising from a sale of the real estate, the administrator of the intestate and the heirs being joined in the bill. Whitney v. Cotten (1876) 53 Miss. 699.

In a suit relating to property in which the partners had a joint interest, such as real estate, the administrator of a deceased partner must make himself a party, so that the interest of the partner in the property shall come within his administration. Guilbeau Bros. v. Melancon (1876) 23 La. Ann. 627.

A power of sale given by a testator to his executors to sell and convey his interest in partnership, confers on the executors the right to sell real estate as well of the partnership as of the testator individually, both being embraced under the literal terms of the will, and the one being as much within the intent and meaning thereof as the other. Davis v. Christian (1859) 15 Gratt. 11.

A clause in a will authorizing executors to carry on the copartnership business for such length of time as they deem necessary and expedient for the best interests of the estate and partnership business, and giving authority to join with the copartner in the execution of any and all contracts, deeds, mortgages, leases, releases, notes, bonds, and all other papers and instruments necessary for the proper conduct of the business, for the sale or mortgaging of the lands, etc., for the purpose of borrowing money for such business, and renewing and continuing any firm indebtedness that might exist at his decease, and for the doing of such act as they deem necessary and advisable, confers power upon the executor to join with the surviving partner in reconstituting a mortgage already existing over the partnership real estate, such mortgage when so rectified dating back to the time of execution of the original. Brown v. Morrill (1891) 45 Minn. 438.

A will empowering executors to continue deceased's interest in the partnership business, and to turn the same into a joint-stock company with power to hold stock therein, empowers his executors to continue all the testator's property, including real estate owned by him individually, and as a partner which he held in trust for the firm doing such business. Ballantine v. Frelinghuysen (1884), 38 N. J. Eq. 203.

The administrator of a deceased partner has power in his individual capacity to purchase from the surviving partner. Per Justice Turner in Jones v. Sharp (1872) 9 Heisk. 660.

So the executor of a deceased partner has a right to sell to the surviving partner the interest of the deceased in the partnership lands and other estates, the sale being bona fide, and such sale may also include the profits made by the surviving partner, subsequent to the death of the deceased. Kimball v. Lincoln, 99 Ill. 578.

No action will lie against the administrator of a deceased partner for negligence in receiving and accounting for the proceeds of his intestate's share or interest in partnership real estate, required for the purpose of paying the partnership liabilities. Merritt v. Dickey (1878) 38 Mich. 41.

Equity will interfere to prevent the administrator of a deceased partner from selling it for the individual creditors, and will control it so as to give a preference to the joint creditors. Whitney v. Cotten (1876) 53 Miss. 699; Winslow v. Chiffelle (1894) Harp. Eq. 25; Divine v. Mitchum (1844) 4 B. Mon. 483, 41 Am. Dec. 241.

The administratrix of a deceased partner has no power to compel a conveyance of partnership real estate as against surviving partners, and the minor children under facts showing that subsequent to the partnership the deceased and one of the partners purchased real estate for partnership purposes under an understanding treating it as partnership property, and that when the new partner was taken in further real estate was acquired, part in the firm's name and part in the name of one partner, all being paid for by the firm, under an agreement that in case of a sale the proceeds should be paid over to the firm and upon dissolution be divided as other personal property of the firm. Shearer v. Paine (1886) 12 Allen, 389.

Upon a supplemental bill filed against an executrix of a deceased partner the original bill being filed by such executrix, alleging that the land standing in the name of the individual members was purchased with the individual means of the testator and charging fraud and misconduct in the management of the firm's affairs, both before and since the testator's death, and seeking to enjoin such survivor from exercising power or authority over the partnership affairs, and praying a receiver, such surviving partner being appointed receiver with power to collect and receive partnership moneys, and upon the decree directing the payment of debts and also the payment by such survivor of his indebtedness to the firm: the facts showed an agreement between the partners eliminating it from settlement; with power for the survivor to purchase or sell the same and release the mortgage thereon, depositing the amount in court as firm assets for the court's disposal, such contract upon being accepted by the executrix to whom a deed was tendered and refused a counter proposition by such executrix to indemnify the surviving partner against liability for the same and to charge herself with the amount of the purchase money, on account of her share of the surplus assets of the partnership, being also refused, the surviving partner subsequently petitioning the court for fulfillment of the contract, and praying a sale charging the loss against such executrix; the relief being refused by the court personal property was sold by the court and two of the mortgages were foreclosed, the loss occasioned being so thrust upon the executrix,—the court held that where there was no unfairness or imposition, equity might enforce a contract entered into between the personal representatives of a deceased partner and the surviving partner for the purchase of the partnership real estate, and might award compensation where performance was impossible or impracticable where the remedy at law was uncertain, but in cases where the plaintiff's action prevented the performance, relief would be refused. Ludlum v. Buckingham (1882) 38 N. J. Eq. 71.

J. Ultimate position of the heirs.

In the absence of any agreement between the partners, express or implied, to the contrary, both the legal title and the beneficial interest in the surplus of partnership real estate, after the debts and the equities of the partnership are satisfied, descend to the heir-at-law. Perin v. Megibben (1862) 6 U. S. App. 348, 68 Fed. Rep. 83. To the same effect, Houston v. Stanton, 11 Ala. 412; Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 538; *Offutt v. Distributable equally among the surviving partners and heirs. Way v. Stebbins (1832) 47 Mich. 296.

And where the partnership lands, or any part of them, are not absolutely necessary for the payment of the debts of the firm, they should be released from the trust as soon as practicable for the heirs' benefit. Weld v. Johnson Mfg. Co. supra.

In Tennessee real estate of a partnership which is not needed for the payment of its debts descends as realty to the heirs. Williamson v. Fountain (1874) 7 Baxt. 212; Piper v. Smith (1858) 1 Head, 97.

A resulting trust in such cases inuring for the benefit of the members of the firm and the heirs of deceased members, such trust being saved by section 50 of the New York Statute, and the holder of the legal title then becomes a trustee of real estate for the benefit of those interested. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1878) 64 N. Y. 471.

And parties claiming the benefit need not bring themselves within the exception contained in section 53 of the New York Statute. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1878) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun. 407.

The only change made by the Tennessee Act of 1784 upon the common-law doctrine was that the surplus or remainder after discharging the lien in favor of the other partners and creditors goes to the heirs and not to the personal representatives. Solomon v. Fitzgerald (1872) 7 Heisk. 532.

Section 6 of chapter 22 of the Tennessee Act of 1784 provides that estates held in joint tenancy for the purpose of carrying on and promoting trade and commerce, or any other useful work or manufacture, established and pursued with a view of profit to the parties therein concerned, shall be vested in the surviving partner or partners in order to enable him or them to settle and adjust the partnership business, and pay for the debts which may have been contracted in pursuit of such joint business, but as soon as it is effected, the survivor or survivors shall account with the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns respectively, of the deceased partners for all such parts, shares, and moneys as he or they may be entitled to by virtue of the original agreement, if any, or according to his or their share or part in the joint concern, in the same manner as partnership stock is usually settled, between joint merchants or the representatives of their deceased partners.

If a partner died after the payment of the purchase money and before confirmation of the sale, the probate court will direct a conveyance to the heirs of such deceased partner's undivided interest, or the heirs, by application to the court, can obtain the legal title to such interest. Blanchard v. Floyd (1890) 93 Ala. 53.

Where lands owned by a decedent have been sold by an order of the probate court and the purchase money paid, the title which passed by operation of law to the heirs on the death of the decedent is not divested until, under the order of the court, a conveyance is executed to the purchaser. Ibid.; Lanford v. Dunklin (1882) 71 Ala. 604.

Where there is nothing in the facts and circumstances of the case which can take it out of the operation of the principle partnership lands not being required for the payment of the firm's debts and liabilities descended to the heir and are not subject to distribution as personality, and therefore the widow cannot treat them as personality in distributing her deceased husband's estate. Williamson v. Fountain (1874) 7 Baxt. 212.

Land purchased on credit for the purposes of cultivating for the joint benefit of the owners, the profits arising therefrom being converted into realty by improving the property, the partnership to be continued until the object is accomplished, is upon the death of one partner partnership property and bound for the firm debts and can be dealt with by the partners within the scope of their authority, passing to the heirs of the deceased partner and not to the personal representatives. Berry v. Folkes (1882) 60 Miss. 578.

III. English decisions.

a. Relating to dower.

In Smith v. Smith (1800) 5 Ves. Jr. 189, the widow's right to dower was established against the assignees in bankruptcy, upon estates purchased with partnership funds conveyed to one partner, under a specific agreement that such estate should be his and he should be a debtor to the partnership for the money.

Real estate purchased with partnership funds

descends to the heirs against the residuary legatee, and is therefore real estate sufficient to entitle a widow to a reference being made to the master to settle her right of dower. Bell v. Phyn (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 453.

Where the administrator of a deceased partner assigned all the interest of the deceased in the partnership premises, unto or in trust for the parties entitled, it was held that such assignment did not deprive the administratrix of her right to claim, as part of the deceased partner's estate, an estate in a renewed lease which the intestate's copartner had taken after his decease. Clogg v. Fishwick (1849) 1 Macn. & G. 294, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 49, 18 Jur. 993, 1 Hall & T. 390.

In Conger v. Platt (1866) 25 U. C. Q. B. 277, the court held that a plea on equitable grounds that land was partnership property and stock in trade, owned by the deceased and another in partnership together as merchants purchased by them as such, paid for out of partnership moneys used in the partnership, and that therefore the husband was never seized thereof otherwise than as partner, was a good plea and formed a good defense to a claim by the widow for dower.

Where the parties entered into copartnership without articles, purchased real estate for the purposes of trade, borrowing money therefor, the land being conveyed to them in moieties to uses barring dower; mortgaged to secure a loan; and on the death of one partner leaving the other his heir-at-law, the latter took a third party into partnership, each of the firms having erected buildings for trade purposes, paying for them and the insurance on them, and the interest of the mortgage and ultimately the mortgage out of partnership funds, taking the reconveyance to them as general tenants when the surviving partner of the first partnership died, his heir claiming the land, it was held that such real estate had been converted into personality. Houghton v. Houghton (1841) 34 Eng. Ch. 490, 11 Sim. 491, 10 L. J. Ch. N. S. 810, 5 Jur. 522.

b. Position of the heir.

The early English cases relating to the devolution of partnership real estate established the right thereto in favor of the heir-at-law. Thornton v. Dixon (1791) 8 Bro. Ch. 199; Bell v. Phyn (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 453; Balmain v. Shore (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. 500.

And that in order to vary such rule there must be a special agreement. Thornton v. Dixon, supra.

Later cases, however, show that it is the general rule in England that real estate belonging to a copartnership, unless there is something in the partnership articles to give it a different direction, is to be considered in equity as personal property, and upon the death of one of the partners and after the debts of the firm have been paid and the equities have been adjusted between the several members of the firm, it goes to the personal representatives of the deceased partner and not to his heirs. Townsend v. Devaynes, Montague on Partnership, appendix, 97; Seikrig v. Davies (1814) 2 Dow. P. C. 231, 2 Rose, Bankr. Cas. 97; Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Broom v. Broom (1834) 3 Myl. & K. 443; Houghton v. Houghton (1841) 34 Eng. Ch. 490, 11 Sim. 491, 10 L. J. Ch. N. S. 810, 5 Jur. 522; Morris v. Kearley (1896) 2 Younge & C. Exch. 122.

Yet in Rowley v. Adams (1844) 7 Beav. 548, 8 Jur. 994, it was treated as realty after a dissolution of the firm by reason of a lease thereof, and as belonging to the heir-at-law. Randall v. Randall (1836) 7 Sim. 274, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 187.

In a later case, however, it was said that it would be treated as personal estate so far as necessary to carry out the intention of the partners. Baxter v. Brown (1845) 7 Mann. & G. 198, 9 Jur. 829, 1 Dutw. Reg. Cas. 120, note, 8 Scott, N. R. 1019, 14 L. J. C. P. 192.

Real estate purchased out of partnership assets and used for the purposes of the firm is held personal property, both as between the partners and as between the heir and personal representatives of a deceased partner. Holroyd v. Holroyd (1859) 26 L. J. Ch. 902, 7 Week. Rep. 428; Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214.

In an ordinary commercial partnership dissolved by the death of a partner, his heirs have a right to participate with the surviving partners in the liquidation of the partnership affairs till a partition takes place, and if one of the partners sues to recover a debt due to the firm, the others may be made partners for the assurance of their rights. Morris v. Odgen, 11 M. R. 455.

Where merchants became partners in buying and selling real estate, some being conveyed to each and some to them jointly, the executor of the deceased partner claiming the legal title in that conveyed to the deceased, contending that the same should be conveyed to himself and the surviving partner jointly and that the heirs were trustees for the same, the court held that the sole purposes of the purchases being the sale of the land as part of the stock in trade, the same was personality. Wylie v. Wylie, 4 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 378.

Where two parties seized of real estate carry on the business in partnership on the premises for a number of years, and provide that the survivor shall purchase such real estate at a stated price, and such term having expired, enter into a new parol agreement continuing the partnership on the old terms, the stipulation as to purchase is still binding upon the survivor and such real estate is converted into personality and does not pass to the heir. Essex v. Essex (1855) 20 Beav. 442.

In Balmain v. Shore (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. 500, where real estate purchased by partners was conveyed to them and their respective heirs equally as tenants in common, the premises being used in the trade as long as the partnership lasted, with covenants against alienation and partition, it was held that the partners could claim nothing as partners except through the covenants in the deed, subject to which it went as real estate and not as personality, the court distinguishing the case from that of Thornton v. Dixon (1791) 8 Bro. Ch. 100.

Where partners acquired two denominations of real estate purchased out of partnership assets, one partner farming one portion and residing thereon, the farming accounts being entered in the profit and loss of the firm, the other lands being occupied by tenants, and the rents brought into the same account, money being raised on the security of the land for partnership purposes, it was held upon the death of one partner whose share was not taken by the survivors, that his share became personal property passing to his personal representatives and not to his heirs. Murtagh v. Costello, L. R. 7 Ir. Rep. 423. Waterer v. Waterer, L. R. 15 Eq. 408, observed upon and distinguished.

In Townsend v. Devaynes, 1 Montague on Partnership, appendix 97, cited in Darby v. Darby (1856) 3 Drew. 499, 3 Jur. N. S. 271, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 412, partners purchased real estate on which they carried on business, part of the purchase money being paid for out of partnership capital and part being left on mortgage, the value of the premises being treated as part of the partnership stock, and as capital in stating the yearly balances of the partnership, one partner dying, his executors sold his interest to the survivors the heir claimed so much as was the value of his share of the real estate and the master having reported in favor of the heir's claim, an exception was subsequently allowed to his report.

Where certain real estate, partly agricultural and partly a quarry, was vested in several co-owners in undivided shares, the quarry being worked and the land let the rents received by one owner on behalf of the others the yearly rents and profits, after paying all outgoings and expenses being divided between them in proportion to their shares, 37 L. R. A.

part of the profits being laid out in other lands, partly agricultural and partly used in connection with the quarry, such latter lands being conveyed to the managing owner and managed by him in the same way as the lands originally belonging to him and his co-owners, it was held that the share of one of such owners, dying intestate, in such purchased lands, descended to the heir-at-law, and did not pass to the personal representatives. Seward v. Blakeway (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. 479, 16 Week. Rep. 1104.

Where a party carrying on trade upon real estate owned by him took a son into partnership for a specified term and conveyed to him in fee a certain share of the lands, the articles containing covenants that the land should be held as partnership property and be considered and treated as part of the joint stock, and provided for its purchase at a given sum in case of the death or retirement of either partner during the term, the land being improved out of the partnership funds, and the parties continued after the expiration of the term and until the death of the father to carry on the trade without any new agreement the son's right of pre-emption as to his father's share of the stock including the land, expired with the term specified, and the partnership debts having been paid the father's share of the land retained its original character and descended to his heir. Cookson v. Cookson (1837) 8 Sim. 529, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 337, 1 Jur. 621.

Where real estate was purchased by the partners out of partnership capital and for partnership purposes; and one partner died leaving a widow and children; the widow administering his estate and selling her interest in the real estate to the surviving partner, who subsequently became bankrupt without paying the purchase money; portions of the estate being purchased at a sale under the order in bankruptcy by the defendants; upon a bill filed by the widow and administratrix against the heir and the assignee in bankruptcy for a confirmation of the sale and for a declaration that the share of the deceased partner became personal assets to be administered by his administratrix, the court held that it followed from the decision in Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214, that the infant heir was a trustee for the administratrix of the deceased partner. Broom v. Broom (1834) 3 Myl. & K. 443; the court following Fereday v. Wightwick (1829) 1 Russ. & M. 45, Tambl. 250; Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Broom v. Broom, and Cookson v. Cookson, supra; Townsend v. Devaynes, cited in 11 Sim. 496.

In Re Ryan, 8 Ir. Eq. Rep. 222, where real estate was purchased out of partnership funds, the conveyance being made to the partners and their heirs forever; one of the partners dying leaving heirs; the survivor continuing the business under the style of the old firm until his bankruptcy, mortgaging the premises to a creditor and depositing with him title deeds of other property by way of equitable mortgage, the latter property having been held in the name of the mother of the partners, the partnership business being carried on upon the same, the mother having made an assignment to the continuing partner; partnership moneys being expended upon the same during the life of the deceased partner, it was held, the mortgagees seeking to make both properties liable for the debts of the surviving partner, his claim was discharged by a next friend of the infant, who claimed to be entitled in the right of the deceased partner to a moiety to each of the premises, that the parties so discharging the incumbrance were entitled to a moiety of the first premises purchased out of the partnership funds, but that with respect to the other property assigned by the mother, they had no claim as they had not shown that the mortgagees had notice that such property was partnership.

1. The suspension of a sentence already pronounced until further order of the court in case defendant pays the cost that day, is beyond the authority of the court, at least when it is done merely as a matter of leniency to the prisoner.
2. An order committing a defendant to serve out a sentence previously pronounced but suspended, made after the time of imprisonment named in the sentence had expired, is void for want of jurisdiction.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to release petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of Grant County to which he had been committed under a sentence punishing him for adultery of which he had been found guilty. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. L. Cleary, for petitioner:

The court had no jurisdiction after the term to resentence the defendant, as there had been no legal suspension of sentence.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner was convicted of the crime of adultery in the circuit court for Grant county, and on the 16th day of March, 1894, at the request of the attorneys for the state and for the defendant, he was sentenced to pay a fine of $200, and to pay the costs of the prosecution, taxed at $400, and stand committed to the common jail of the county until such fine and costs were paid, the period of imprisonment to be limited to six months; and, in case said costs were paid that day, the court directed "that the sentence of imprisonment be suspended until the further order of the court." The defendant paid the costs accordingly. At a succeeding term, October 12, 1894, the defendant being present in court with his counsel, the court made an order reciting the sentence; that the fine had not been paid; and "that there is good reason why further leniency should not be extended to the defendant, but that he should be required to fully comply with said sentence, or be committed to the common jail until said fine is paid;" ordering and adjudging that the defendant "do forthwith pay said fine of $200, and that he stand committed to the common jail of the county until said fine is paid, the period of imprisonment being limited in accordance with said sentence to the period of six months." A commitment was issued accordingly, under which the defendant was confined in the county jail. These facts appearing by the return of the sheriff to the writ of habeas corpus, the petitioner demurred to the return.

No legal reason appears to have existed to warrant the court in suspending its sentence, in whole or in part, after it had been pronounced, if it be conceded the court had such power. The action of the court seems to have been founded on the joint request of the prosecution and of the defendant, and to have been granted as a matter of leniency to the defendant. While it may be said that the defendant is in no position to complain or take advantage of the clemency of the court, the question at issue is one of power, involving serious considerations of public policy respecting the administration of criminal justice. After the defendant had been convicted, and the sentence of the law in legal and proper form had been pronounced against him, it is difficult to understand upon what principle the court could further interfere in the premises. The right of the court, for cause, within the exercise of a reasonable discretion, to postpone sentence or suspend sentence, as it is said, seems to be clear; but we think, both upon principle and authority, its right to suspend the execution of the sentence after it has been pronounced cannot be sustained, except as incident to a review of the case upon a writ of error, or upon other well-established legal grounds. After sentence given, the matter within these limits would seem to be wholly within the hands of the executive officers of the law. The sole power is vested in the governor "to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons after conviction, for all offenses, except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper." Const. art. 5, § 6. And the action of the court in the premises, after it had regularly pronounced the punishment provided by law for the offense in question, is clearly obnoxious to the objection that it is an attempted exercise of power, not judicial, but vested in the executive. When the sentence was pronounced, the defendant was in custody; and it became eo instanti his duty to pay his fine, and, for failure to do so, the term of his imprisonment at once began. It had fully expired before the order of October 12, 1894, was made, under which he has been committed and is now held in confinement. The sentence had been in part complied with, and the attempted withdrawal indefinitely of the remainder was, we think, without legal warrant and void.

In the case of State v. Grottkau, 78 Wis. 589, before execution of a sentence of imprisonment for one year, a stay of execution was granted pending a writ of error; and, after affirmance of the judgment, it was held that the sentence could be rightly enforced, although the year had in the meantime expired. The stay was for a legal cause. Reinas v. State, 51 Wis. 153. The case of People v. Monroe County Court of Sessions, 141 N. Y. 288, 23 L. R. A. 856, was not a case where execution of a sentence had been suspended, but where sentence had been postponed; and the power of the court to delay sentence, in its discretion, was sustained, and numerous authorities were cited to support it. But the present case involves different considerations. Here the execution of a sentence already pronounced is indefinitely suspended, and it may be the pleasure of the court never to direct execution, so that the suspension has the practical effect of a pardon, or of arrest of judgment indeterminate or final, without the authority of law; and it has been likened to the incorporation into our criminal jurisprudence of the "Ticket of Leave System," without any of its safeguards, leaving the convicted criminal subject to the mere option or caprice of the judge, who may direct the enforcement of the sentence after any lapse of time, however great, or withhold it, to the great detriment, it may be, of the interests of the public,—a power plainly liable to great abuse. We think, therefore, that the circuit court had no authority to make the order of October 12, 1894. As already observed, the 27 L. R. A. period of imprisonment, in contemplation of law, commenced March 16, 1894, when the defendant was in custody and failed to pay the fine imposed against him, and he could not be lawfully imprisoned after it had expired. The order of October 12, 1894, was not merely erroneous; in making it, the court exceeded its jurisdiction.

The petitioner's demurrer to the respondent's return must be sustained, and he is entitled to be discharged from custody. It is ordered accordingly.

1. The mere insolvency of a corporation known to a creditor will not prevent him from obtaining a valid lien by attachment of its property.
2. A charge of fraud and collusion by attaching creditors of a corporation, made by plaintiff in a judgment creditors' action against the corporation and other creditors, having been abandoned by him, a third class of creditors who are among the defendants and who have not attempted to form any issue with their co-defendants cannot litigate that question.

APPEAL by part of the defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to sequester and equally distribute among creditors the property of the J. & E. B. Friend Lacey Importing Company, an insolvent corporation. Reversed in part; affirmed in part.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

Action under section 3216, Rev. Stat., for the sequestration of the property of an insolvent trading corporation, and the distribution of its assets among its creditors. On the 2d of December, 1889, the J. & E. B. Friend Lacey Importing Company, a corporation in Milwaukee, was insolvent, having assets composed of a stock of merchandise worth from $7,000 to $8,000, and accounts of the nominal value of $17,000, and having liabilities considerably in excess of its total assets. On that day the defendants and appellants the Merchants' Exchange Bank and the Kalamazoo Knitting Company (hereafter known as the "first class of creditors") levied attachments on the entire stock of goods of the corporation, upon claims aggregating more than the entire value of the stock; and the same day the corporation, by its officers, made assignments of all said accounts to various other creditors, who are defendants in this action (hereafter known as the "second class of creditors"), and whose claims aggregate over $8,000. On the 8d of December, 1889, the defendants and appellants Mossbacher and others (hereafter known as the "third class of creditors") levied attachments on said stock of goods, on claims aggregating more than $8,000. Afterwards, the plaintiffs in this action obtained judgment against the corporation for $2,048.76, and, upon the return of an execution unsatisfied, commenced this action against the corporation, and all of the said creditors, and the sheriff, who then had possession of the stock of goods under the writ of attachment or under executions issued on the action commenced by the attachment. In their complaint the plaintiffs, after setting forth the facts showing the right to sue, and the insolvency of the corporation, allege, in effect, that all of the said attachments, and the assignments of the accounts, were collusively and fraudulently made, at the instance and request of the officers of the corporation, with knowledge by all parties of its insolvency, and with intent to give and secure unjust preference over other creditors. The plaintiffs prayed for sequestration of the property of the corporation, and for the appointment of a receiver, and that the attached property be turned over to such receiver, and that the defendants who had received assignments of accounts should account for the same to the receiver. Upon this complaint an interlocutory order was made, declaring the corporation insolvent, adjudging sequestration of its property, appointing Morris Speiser receiver thereof; also, requiring the sheriff to surrender to the receiver all the property held by him under the defendants' attachment and executions, and restraining all other proceedings in the attachment actions. This order was appealed from, and affirmed by this court in Balkin v. Loeb, 78 Wis. 404. Thereafter, the receiver, under the order of the court, sold the stock of goods, and realized the sum of $7,225. The answer of the first class of creditors admitted the insolvency of the corporation, but denied all collusion or conspiracy to obtain preference, set forth at length their attachment proceedings, and claimed a first lien by virtue thereof on the fund derived from the sale of the stock of goods. No answer by the second class of creditors appears in the printed case. The third class of creditors, in their answer, denied all collusion or conspiracy, and denied knowledge of the insolvency of the corporation when they attached, and claim their attachment to be a first lien on the stock of goods. They also allege a fraudulent conspiracy and combination between the corporation and the first and second classes of creditors, to give them preference over other creditors, by means of collusive attachments and assignments, in fraud of the other creditors of the corporation. This answer is not in form of a counterclaim or cross-complaint, and was served only on the plaintiffs.

When the action came to trial, the plaintiffs moved for judgment upon the pleadings, and, after having taken the matter under advisement, the trial court made an order providing—First, that there should be an equal and ratable distribution of all the property in the hands of the receiver among all the creditors of the corporation who have proven, or who may prove, their claims; second, that no preference be allowed, and that all other proceedings by the defendants be enjoined until the further order of the court; third, that the action, in so far as it attempts to set aside the assignment of accounts, be dismissed, because the same should be done in a separate action brought by the sheriff; fourth, that the receiver should bring suits against the creditors of the second class to contest the validity of the assignments of accounts, and report the conclusion to the court; fifth, that the distribution to creditors be deferred until the conclusion of such suits, and the filing of the receiver's report. In the reciting clauses of this order, it is said that the plaintiffs "moved the court for judgment upon the pleadings, records, and facts admitted in open court by all parties; that the corporation known as the J. & E. B. Friend Lace Importing Company, at the date mentioned in the amended complaint, was insolvent, and its insolvency was known by the corporation and the defendants." In a subsequent part of the same order, as afterward amended by the court, it is, however, recited that the third class of creditors, represented by Mr. Bloodgood, objected to the rendering of judgment for the plaintiff on the ground "that the final order of distribution to be entered herein should contain a provision that the defendants were entitled to a preference because they had liens by virtue of their attachments set out in their answer herein, and that the insolvency of said defendant company was not known to said defendants, represented by said attorneys Bloodgood, Bloodgood & Kemper, at the time of the issuing and levying of the attachments by said respective defendants." It is further recited in said order that said third class of creditors "offered to prove that the transaction of levying the attachments was a voluntary assignment of the entire property of the corporation defendant, and was brought about by a conspiracy between the attaching creditors and those taking the assignments, and that one feature of the fraud was that those attachments should not be traversed; another, that there was no legal or equitable ground for those attachments; another, that the property, when seized by the sheriff under attachment, was to be immediately sold under an order from the court, to be granted under the statute, in order that the corporation defendant, or its officers, might purchase the same; another, that there was a conspiracy to secure debts or claims in which the officers of the corporation were interested,—which offer was considered immaterial." The first class of creditors, represented by Mr. Flanders, appeal from so much of this order as provides for an equal distribution of property and refuses to allow any preference, and enjoins other proceedings by the defendant. The third class of creditors, represented by Mr. Bloodgood, appeal from the whole order.

Messrs. Winkler, Flanders, Smith, Bottum & Vilas, for appellants:

By the levies of their several attachments and executions, before the commencement of the receivership proceedings, the appellant acquired lawful and valid liens upon the property of said corporation.

The property of an insolvent corporation before proceedings for a sequestration is not a "trust fund" in the ordinary sense of the term.

Hoeses v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. 15 L. R. A. 470, 48 Minn. 174; Fogg v. Blair, 133 U. S. 541, 33 L. ed. 724; Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co. 150 U. Whether solvent or insolvent the capital stock and property of the corporation is a trust fund created for the payment of the debts of the corporation.

The corporation may employ its property in legitimate channels of business without restriction, notwithstanding it is insolvent, so long as no sequestration proceedings are commenced (Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co. 94 N. Y. 384), and this implies the correlative right of creditors to pursue the usual remedies for the collection and security of their claims.

Breene v. Merchants & Mechanics Bank, 11 Colo. 97.

The legal ownership of the assets of the corporation is not altered or impaired by insolvency.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 579.

It is not until sequestration proceedings are commenced that the property becomes impressed with a trust, in the full sense of the term, and the ordinary remedies of creditors are suspended.

The appellants having acquired valid liens upon the property of the corporation by the levies of their attachments and executions, the property in the hands of the receiver is impressed with those liens and they must be recognized in the distribution of said property.

Garden City Bkg. & Trust Co. v. Geiffuss, 86 Wis. 612; Ford v. Plankinton Bank, 87 Wis. 368.

Messrs. Bloodgood, Bloodgood & Kemper also for appellants.

Messrs. Miller, Noyes & Miller, with Mr. Orren T. Williams, for respondent:

Appellants acquired no liens by virtue of their proceedings in attachment and by garnishment and by execution, taken with the knowledge that the corporation was insolvent.

Preferences by insolvents are allowed by statute only to certain classes of creditors—to a laborer, although a stockholder.

Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co. 66 Wis. 481; Rev. Stat. § 1698; Sleeper v. Goodwin, 67 Wis. 578.

But where the relation of contractor and contractee existed a preference was not allowed.

Lang v. Simmons, 64 Wis. 525; Campfield v. Lang, 25 Fed. Rep. 128.

If a creditor could by garnishment or attachment, or by a creditor's bill, obtain a preference, the entire enactment of the statute would be rendered fruitless, because no one would institute proceedings under it. It therefore seems to follow that it was intended to devert all liens of any individual creditors acquired after it became insolvent, and with full knowledge of such insolvency.

Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57; Ballston Spa Bank v. Marine Bank of Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 490; First Nat. Bank of Stevens Point v. Knowles, 67 Wis. 873; Re Waterbury, 3 Paige, 380, 4 L. ed. 470; Ford v. Plankinton Bank, 87 Wis. 371.

The appellants did not acquire liens by said proceedings against the property of the insolvent corporation because the property seized was a trust fund, of which the directors of the corporation were trustees, and to which all the creditors were beneficiaries.

In the event of the insolvency of a corporation its property becomes a trust fund in the hands of its directors to be administered primarily for the benefit of its creditors and then for the benefit of its stockholders, and in the distribution of this trust fund by the directors, as trustees, all creditors are entitled to share ratably.

The doctrine that creditors must share equally is only an example of the well-established rule that equality is equity, and this principle is peculiarly applicable to the assets of a corporation.

No single creditor as cestui que trust can show any reason why his share in the trust fund should be greater than that of his fellows, and thus the only rule a court of equity can adopt is that of equality among all creditors.

Richards v. New Hampshire Ins. Co. 48 N. H. 263; Bradley v. Farwell, Holmes, C. C. 433; 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 8d ed. § 661, p. 938, note 3.

As the defendant corporation, when insolvent, could not by its own act prefer any single creditor, a creditor could not by any act on his part gain a preference.

S. 21 Wall. 609, 22 L. ed. 637.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A creditor of an insolvent corporation, knowing its insolvency, attaches its property, without collusion with the officers of the corporation. Afterwards, and while the attached property is in the hands of the officer, another creditor obtains judgment, and commences an action, under section 3216, Rev. Stat., to close up its affairs and sequester its property, making the attaching creditor and the officer parties to the suit. Can the attaching creditor be deprived of his lien upon the property attached, and be compelled to share equally with all other creditors in the property of the corporation? This is the single question which is sharply presented in this case. The complaint charged a fraudulent and collusive attachment by the first class of creditors; and a preliminary order, based on this complaint, requiring the sheriff to surrender the attached property to the receiver, was affirmed by this court. Ballin v. Loeb, 78 Wis. 404. The ultimate rights of the attaching creditors were not determined on that appeal, however; but it was held that they must come into this action for any share of the proceeds of the property, or for any remedy against it. The effect of that decision was simply to hold that the receiver was entitled to the possession of the property for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the corporation, and that all claims of liens upon property must be litigated in 37 L. R. A.

On the trial the plaintiffs abandoned all charges of collusion and fraud, and rested solely on the ground of the corporation being insolvent, and that the attaching creditors had knowledge of such insolvency when they attached. And thus the question presents itself, as first above stated. Upon this question, the plaintiffs rest their case upon the so-called "trust-fund doctrine," and take a broad ground that from the moment a trading corporation becomes insolvent its assets become a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, and that no creditor, knowing of its insolvency, can obtain a valid lien by attachment of any of the property; and they argue that this doctrine has received the express or implied sanction of this court. It must be admitted that there are authorities in other jurisdictions holding this doctrine to its full extent, but it certainly has not been held by this court that a creditor of an insolvent corporation may not obtain a valid lien by attaching its property in a bona fide attempt to collect his debt. The cases which are principally relied upon by the plaintiffs as having sanctioned the trust-fund doctrine, in this court, are First Nat. Bank of Stevens Point v. Knowles, 67 Wis. 378; Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 64 Wis. 689; Ballin v. Loeb, 78 Wis. 404; Ford v. Plankinton Bank, 87 Wis. 263. A brief review of the questions actually decided in these cases will be useful. In Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co., it was held that directors of an insolvent corporation could not lawfully convey or mortgage the corporate property to themselves, to secure their own claims against the corporation. In First Nat. Bank of Stevens Point v. Knowles, it was held that a trust deed of an insolvent manufacturing corporation, to secure bonds given to certain creditors, some of whom were directors of the corporation, was void, because made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud other creditors, and because it had the effect of a fraudulent preference of certain creditors, to the exclusion of all others. In Ballin v. Loeb, it was held, as previously stated in this opinion, that an attaching creditor of an insolvent corporation, whose attachment was charged to have been fraudulent and collusive, must come into this action, and assert his rights to a lien upon the attached property. The same, in principle, was the holding in Ford v. Plankinton Bank. In the last-named case it was charged that judgments by confession had been collusively and fraudulently obtained, and levies made thereunder; and it was held that the property levied upon must go into the hands of the receiver, and that a creditor must seek and enforce his lien, if any, in the sequestration action. On the other hand, in Garden City Bkg. & Trust Co. v. Geilfuss, 86 Wis. 612, it was distinctly held that where an insolvent corporation had made a valid assignment for the benefit of its creditors, under the statute, such assignment was not superseded or affected by the appointment of a receiver in an action against the corporation, under section 3216, Rev. Stat. We believe the foregoing is a fair statement of the questions actually presented and decided in the cases named, and from this statement it seems very certain that the question here presented has not been foreclosed or decided by this court.

The intangible body known to the law as a "corporation" must necessarily act by its agents, and these agents are its managing officers. An agent who is handling the funds or property of his principal acts in a trust capacity, and is in a sense a trustee. The managing officers of the corporation are therefore at all times trustees for the corporation and its stockholders. It may also be correctly said that the corporate property in the hands of the receiver is a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, in the sense that it is to be applied to the payment of the corporate creditors before it can be applied for the use or benefit of the stockholders. The plaintiff's contention is broader than this, and is to the effect that when a corporation in fact becomes insolvent, though still doing business, the managing directors thereof become "trustees" of the corporate property, in the full and complete sense of the term, and can make no disposition of such property to one creditor to the exclusion of others, nor can a creditor, acting in good faith, acquire a valid lien upon the corporate property by attachment. As to the first branch of this proposition, to the effect that the directors cannot convey or mortgage the corporate property to a creditor, we are not now concerned, because that question does not arise in this case. The sole question here is whether a diligent creditor, knowing of the corporate insolvency, and bringing his attachment proceedings in an honest effort to collect his debt, can acquire a valid lien upon the corporate property, which will be protected upon a subsequent sequestration action. Upon this question we have no hesitation in holding that such a creditor will acquire a valid lien. To hold otherwise is to hold, in effect, that a debt cannot be collected by ordinary processes of law, from an insolvent corporation; that the corporation may buy and sell, make contracts, and transact its ordinary business, but that it enjoys a practical immunity from all the laws for the enforcement of its obligations, until some creditor sees fit to commence an action to wind up its affairs. In other words, it may buy property, but cannot be compelled, by ordinary processes of law, to pay for it; it may contract, but cannot be compelled to perform its contract; it is provided with a shield, which becomes to all intents and purposes, a sword in its hands, against the diligent creditor. Certainly, no such immunity from the ordinary laws governing the rights of creditors is given it by statute. On the contrary, the statute provides (Rev. Stat. § 2729) that any creditor may proceed by attachment against the property of his debtor, "whether a natural person or corporation;" and in vain do we look for any exception in the statute law, such as is claimed here. We shall not attempt to ingraft any such exception on the statute by decision. We see no good reason why a trading corporation, so long, at least, as it deals with others in its ordinary course of business, should not be subject to the ordinary remedies provided by the law for the collection of debts. Its property is certainly not trust property, in the sense that it cannot be relied on by its creditors to respond to the ordinary processes of the law, sued out in good faith. The following authorities fully bear out these views, and we cite them as sustaining the point now decided, without affirming or denying their correctness in other respects. White, Potter & Paige Mfg. Co. v. Henry B. Pettis Importing Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 864; Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. 15 L. R. A. 470, 48 Minn. 174; Fogg v. Blair, 188 U. S. 534, 88 L. ed. 721; Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co. 150 U. S. 371, 37 L. ed. 1118; Roseboom v. Whittaker, 183 Ill. 81.

From these views, it follows that the first class of creditors was, upon the facts before the court, entitled to have their attachment liens adjudged valid, and to be first paid out of the proceeds of the attached property in the hands of the receiver, and hence that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed.

Another question now arises, on the appeal of the third class of creditors. They claim, in the event of reversal, the case should be remanded for a new trial in order that they may litigate the good faith of the attachment levied by the first class of creditors, which they allege in their answer were collusive and fraudulent. The difficulty is that they are not in a position to litigate the question. It is true they allege bad faith and collusion by the first class of creditors, but they only did so by way of answer to the plaintiff's complaint. They did not even allege the facts as a counterclaim, nor was the answer served on the defendants whose rights they seek to attack. They have neither formed nor attempted to form, any issue with their codefendants. Such a question arising between defendants must undoubtedly be raised by an appropriate pleading which the codefendants whose rights are assailed have an opportunity to answer. It would seem to be necessary to do this by cross-complaint as under the old equity practice. Trester v. Sheboygan, 87 Wis. 496; Van Santvoord, Eq. Pr. p. 224. Certainly no such issue having been tendered or raised by the third class of creditors, the first class of creditors is not called upon to meet it. They are only required to meet the plaintiffs' claims, and the plaintiffs having abandoned all claims of fraud and collusion, as they had a perfect right to do, that issue has disappeared from the case so far as the first class of creditors are concerned.

So much of the order appealed from as provides for an equal distribution among creditors of all property in the hands of the receiver, and denies any preference, and enjoins further proceedings by the defendants, is reversed, with costs, upon both appeals, and the remainder of the order is affirmed, and the action is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with law.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an assessment upon an insurance premium note. Affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

It appears from the record that the Milwaukee Mutual Fire Insurance Company was a corporation duly organized and existing under sections 1941a to 1941f, Rev. Stat., inclusive, during all the times herein mentioned, doing a business of insurance upon the mutual plan; that during all of the same time the defendant herein has been a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of Wisconsin, with its headquarters or place of business in this state, and doing a lumber business in this and other states; that December 8, 1888, the defendant was the owner of certain lumber, lath, shingles, sash, doors, blinds, timber, and logs in its yard at Ft. Madison, Iowa, and at that date procured a policy of insurance on the same from said Milwaukee Company for $2,500, to run for a period of five years, mutual in its form, and at the same time gave the Milwaukee Company its premium note for $250, payable in installments at such times as the directors of said company might order or assess for the losses and expenses of said company, pursuant to its charter and by-laws; that April 28, 1888, the defendant was the owner of certain other lumber, lath, shingles, sash, doors, blinds, timber, and logs situate in its yard at St. Louis, Mo., and at that date procured a policy of insurance thereon from said Milwaukee Company for $1,500, to run for the period of five years, mutual in its form, and at the same time gave back a premium note of $120, payable in installments at such times as the directors of said company might order or assess for the losses and expenses of said company, pursuant to its charter and by-laws; that January 8, 1891, the plaintiff was appointed receiver of said Milwaukee Company, and qualified as such; that July 9, 1892, the plaintiff, under the direction of the court, assessed the defendant on said first-named policy $125, and on said second-named policy $60, and the same was confirmed by the superior court for Milwaukee county; that the plaintiff gave due notice of such assessment to the defendant, and demanded payment thereof, as provided by said charter and by-laws of the Milwaukee Company, but the defendant refused to pay the same; that November 14, 1892, the plaintiff commenced this action, alleging the facts mentioned in proper form, and other appropriate facts. The defendant answered said complaint by way of admissions, denials, and allegations to the effect that the policy of $2,500 was made in Iowa, and in violation of the laws of that state, and was, therefore, void, and that the policy of $1,500 was made in Missouri, and contrary to the laws of that state, and was, therefore, void; that the parties thereupon waived a jury, and tried said cause before the court upon a written stipulation of the facts as applicable to the first cause of action, to the effect that at the times mentioned W. E. Smith & Co. were insurance brokers in Chicago, and as such solicited insurance of the defendant at its office in St. Louis, to be written upon the mutual plan or in mutual companies; that the defendant thereupon "consented to take insurance in acceptable companies from said William E. Smith & Co., upon the mutual plan, upon its property located at Fort Madison;" that Smith & Co. then applied by letter to the Milwaukee Company at Milwaukee to write a portion of said insurance, whereupon the Milwaukee Company, at its office in Milwaukee, filled out an application with a note at the bottom thereof, except the answers to the questions therein, a copy of which application and note is annexed to the stipulation and in the record, and made a part thereof, together with the policy of insurance upon the property of the defendant at Ft. Madison, bearing date at Milwaukee, December 8, 1888, insuring said property in the sum of $2,500 for the period of five years, and which policy upon its face states that it was issued in consideration of the assured having paid the cash premium of $50, and having given its premium note for the sum of $250, agreeing thereby to pay all such sums as might be assessed on such note by the board of directors of the Milwaukee Company in accordance with the charter and by-laws of said company; that said application, note, and policy of insurance were mailed by the Milwaukee Company to said Smith & Co., and by them were mailed to the defendant at its office in St. Louis; that thereupon the defendant accepted said policy of insurance, and answered said questions contained in said application, and signed said application and accompanying note, and returned the same to said Smith & Co., together with the cash premium of $50, and that Smith & Co. receipted therefor and that thereupon Smith & Co. mailed said application and premium note to said Milwaukee Company, and remitted to said Milwaukee Company said cash premium of $50, less 20 per cent thereof, allowed by said Milwaukee Company to said Smith & Co. as commission in procuring said insurance; that afterwards all transactions relating to said policy and said risk were conducted and carried on by mail directly between the Milwaukee Company and the defendant; that said Smith & Co. were never the regularly appointed agents of the Milwaukee Company, and never had authority to write policies for that company, and never had in their possession any blank policies of said Milwaukee Company, and were never employed by the Milwaukee Company to solicit insurance for it, but that said Milwaukee Company from time to time issued policies on risks that had been procured by said Smith & Co., upon which the insurance company allowed said Smith & Co. a commission of 20 per cent of the first cash premium collected, as compensation for securing the business; that the stipulation as to the second cause of action was substantially the same as the first, except that the date of the policy was April 23, 1888, and for $1,500, for a period of five years, on property of the same kind, located at St. Louis; and that the Manufacturers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo., acted as broker in procuring said policy, instead of said William E. Smith & Co. At the close of the trial the court found as matters of fact, in effect, that the allegations of the complaint were true; that the facts contained in said written stipulation were true; (8) that the contracts sued upon were both made and completed within the state of Wisconsin, between corporations organized under the laws of Wisconsin and were valid; (4) that the persons who solicited the insurance in the case of each of said policies were insurance brokers residing outside of Wisconsin, and were not the agents of the Milwaukee Company, and in so far as they acted in procuring said insurance were the agents of the assured; (6) that said policies of insurance and the accompanying notes were legal and valid policies and notes, and were issued and made on due and valid consideration; (6) that the Milwaukee Company had never procured a license, or complied with the laws of the state of Missouri or the state of Iowa; that the Milwaukee Company was duly authorized to make said contracts under and according to the laws of Wisconsin. And as conclusions of law the court found, in effect, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon both causes of action alleged as prayed; that the facts alleged in the answer, as shown by the stipulation, did not constitute a defense to either cause of action; and judgment was thereby ordered against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of said assessments with interest, together with costs. From the judgment entered upon said findings accordingly the defendant brings this appeal.

Mr. George E. Sutherland, for respondent:

There was nothing to be done at the place of delivery to complete the contracts of insurance. They were absolutely completed at the home office of the company in Milwaukee.

When they were mailed at Milwaukee they were valid, subsisting contracts of insurance, then in full force and effect. Under such circumstances the place of the contract is the place where the policy is issued.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Milwaukee Company and the defendant corporation were each created and organized under and by virtue of the laws of this state, and exist only by force of the laws of this state. Since such laws, of themselves, have no extraterritorial force, these corporations cannot migrate to other states, but must dwell in the state of their creation. Larson v. Aultman & Taylor Co., 86 Wis. 283, 284, and cases there cited. While these corporations can only live and have their being in this state, yet their residence here creates no insuperable objection to their power to contract and be contracted with in other states, provided they do so in accordance with the laws of such other states. Ibid. One of the policies issued by the Milwaukee Company covered certain personal property of the defendant located in Iowa, and the other covered certain personal property of the defendant located in Missouri. The authority of each of those states to prescribe the conditions upon which each of said corporations would be allowed to make contracts and do business therein must be conceded. State v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn., 67 Wis. 629; Stanhilber v. Mutual Mill Ins., 37 L. R. A.

Co., 76 Wis. 291; State v. Root, 83 Wis. 680. No question is made as to the right of the defendant to make valid contracts and do business in Iowa or Missouri. But it is conceded that the Milwaukee Company never complied with such conditions so prescribed by those states, respectively, and that by the statutes of each of those states any contracts made by that company therein were absolutely void. But each of the contracts for the insurance of such property against loss by fire was a mere contract for indemnity in case of loss. Darrell v. Tibbitts, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 560; Stanhilber v. Mutual Mill Ins. Co., 76 Wis. 291. Although it related to the loss of such property, yet it in no way attached to or affected the title to such property. Ibid. Such being the nature of the contracts sued upon and the residence of the two corporations, there would seem to be no good reason why they could not, within the state of Wisconsin, make valid contracts for indemnity against loss by fire of such properties, notwithstanding the same were located in such other states. This seems to be conceded by counsel for the defendant. The vital question in the case, therefore, is whether these contracts were made in Wisconsin or in the respective states where the properties were located. The negotiation for the insurance upon the Iowa property was commenced by the Chicago brokers, who solicited insurance of the defendant's agent in Missouri, to be written in mutual companies; that the defendant thereupon consented to take insurance in acceptable companies from such brokers upon the mutual plan upon its property located at Ft. Madison, Iowa; that said brokers then, by letter, requested the Milwaukee Company to write a portion of such insurance; that the Milwaukee Company thereupon, at its office in Milwaukee, filled out a blank application for such insurance, with a premium note at the bottom, to be signed by the defendant, and which application contained some twenty questions for the defendant to answer by writing in the several answers; that at the same time, at its office in Milwaukee, that company filled out a policy for such insurance, and which application, note, and policy were each and all dated at Milwaukee, December 8, 1888, and which policy recited that the application and premium note had been given and were on file in the company's office of Milwaukee; that such application was a part of the contract of insurance, and a warranty on the part of the insured; that, if certain conditions existed, the policy should be void; that the charter and by-laws of the company, and the laws of Wisconsin under which it was organized, were thereby declared to be a part of the contract of insurance, and to be resorted to in order to determine the rights and obligations of the parties thereto; that said blank application, blank note, and policy so filled out were thereupon mailed by the Milwaukee Company to the Chicago brokers, and by them mailed to the defendant at its St. Louis office; that the defendant thereupon accepted the policy, answered the several questions contained in the blank application, and signed the same, and signed said blank premium note, and thereupon returned the application and premium note, so signed, together with the cash premium, to the Chicago brokers, who receipted therefor, and thereupon said brokers mailed said application, note, and cash premium, less 20 per cent thereof, to the Milwaukee Company. The contract to insure the property in Missouri was procured substantially in the same way, except that the brokers were located at St. Louis instead of Chicago. We are constrained to hold that the application, premium note, and policy must be taken and construed together as one instrument, constituting the contract of insurance. Herbst v. Lowe, 65 Wis. 320. This being so, we must hold that the policy, blank application, and blank premium note, so made out by the Milwaukee Company, and mailed as mentioned, was a mere proposition by that company to insure the property in case the cash premium should be paid, the premium note should be signed by the defendant, and the several questions propounded in the application should be answered to its satisfaction. Certainly it was possible that these several questions might have been answered in such a way that neither the Milwaukee Company nor any other company would be justified or expected to insure the property. The trial court rightly held that the persons soliciting the insurance were insurance brokers, and in no sense agents of the Milwaukee Company; that, in so far as they were agents for any one, they were agents of the defendant. This being so, it necessarily follows that the contract of insurance did not become complete and absolutely binding upon both parties until the note and application were filled out and signed, and submitted to, and, in effect, approved by, the Milwaukee Company. The contract, therefore, must be deemed to have been made at Milwaukee, where the final assent was given. Whiston v. Stodder, 3 Mart. (La.) 95, 18 Am. Dec. 281; Ford v. Buckeye State Ins. Co. 6 Bush, 183, 99 Am. Dec. 668, and notes; Hamilton v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. 5 Pa. 339; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 263; Millsken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241. "When a contract is made in one country, to be performed wholly or partially in another, prima facie the contract is to be construed and enforced according to the lex loci contractus; but the court will look at all the circumstances, to ascertain by the law of which country the parties intended the contract to be governed, and will enforce the contract accordingly, unless it should contain stipulations contrary to morality or expressly forbidden by positive law." Re Missouri SS. Co. L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 321. The contract in that case was made in Massachusetts between an American citizen and a British company, for the carriage of cattle from Boston to England in a British ship, and contained a clause void as against public policy by the law of Massachusetts, but valid by the law of England, and it was held that the contract itself showed that the parties intended to be governed by the law of England, giving effect to the clause mentioned. This is upon the well-established principle that when a contract is open to two constructions, the one lawful and the other unlawful, the former must be adopted. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 29 L. ed. 940; United States v. Central Pac. R. Co. 118 U. S. 236, 30 L. ed. 174. Much of the seeming conflict in the adjudications upon the subject of the lex loci contractus will disappear by carefully discriminating as to the precise nature of the issue and matter under consideration. Thus it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that: "Matters bearing upon the execution, interpretation, and validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where it is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought." Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank of Chicago, 91 U. S. 406, 23 L. ed. 245. Here the only question presented is as to the validity of the contract, and that is necessarily governed by the law of the place where it was made, which, as observed, is the law of Wisconsin.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in permitting a telephone wire to fall across its trolley wires so as to become dangerous to travelers on the highway. Reversed.

Statement by Newman, J.:

This is an action to recover for personal injuries which the plaintiff claims that he received by accidental contact with a telephone wire which had fallen upon the defendant's trolley wire, and so become heavily charged with electricity. The negligence imputed to the defendant is its omission to place guard wires over its trolley wires, so as to prevent the telephone wire from coming in contact with them. The defendant owns and operates an electric railway along Third street in the city of Milwaukee. Third street runs north and south. Green Bay avenue crosses Third street at an acute angle, running northwest and southeast. The tracks of the defendant's road extend northerly on Third street to a point north of its intersection with Green Bay avenue. On the east side of Third street, opposite to the opening of Green Bay avenue, are the defendant's car barns. At this point the overhead trolley wires are supported by cross wires attached to posts on either side of Third street. Near the southwest corner of the car barn, on the east side of Third street, is a telephone pole. From this pole the telephone wire runs diagonally across Third street to a pole standing in the sharp angle between Third street and Green Bay avenue. Thence it runs diagonally across Green Bay avenue to a pole on the west side of the avenue, about 100 yards north of the pole on the sharp angle. These poles carried the wire about 80 feet above the ground, and about 10 feet above the trolley wires. The telephone wire crosses the trolley wires diagonally. There were no guard wires over the trolley wires. At the time of plaintiff's accident the telephone wire was broken, and had fallen upon and lay in contact with the trolley wire, and had become and was charged with electricity by such contact. It does not appear that the fact that the telephone wire was broken was known to any of the defendant's employes, nor that any negligence on their part had caused the breakage. The end of the telephone wire so charged with electricity passed along Green Bay avenue, in some places lying upon and in the street. It was in the evening, and after dark. The plaintiff was driving along the avenue with his horse and vehicle. His horse came in contact with the wire, received a shock, and fell. The plaintiff was thrown from his vehicle. He is supposed to have received an electric shock both before and after he left the vehicle. He appears to have received considerable injury. The telephone wire carries so small a current of electricity as not to be, of itself, dangerous. The trolley wires carry a much larger current of electricity. By contact with the trolley wire the telephone wire may become so highly charged as to become dangerous. The telephone wire was not owned by, nor in any manner under the control of the defendant. It is unexplained what occasioned the breaking of the telephone wire. It did not break in the span which carried it over and across the trolley wires, but in the next span beyond. It could not have come in contact with the trolley wires had not the fastening of the telephone wire to its pole become so loosened that the wire slipped, and the portion over the trolley wires sagged, so as to bring it in contact with the trolley wires. There was a special verdict, and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals.

Messrs. Miller, Noyes & Miller, for appellant:

The injury of the plaintiff, if it can be said actually to have been caused by the failure of the defendant to erect guard wires, was not such as a reasonably prudent person in the conduct of the defendant's business would have anticipated. The accident was unexplained.

Nor could the defendant have anticipated that the plaintiff, or any one else, would suffer injury by reason of fright caused by a spark of electricity escaping from the wires under such conditions. It has been held that fright alone does not form a basis for an action at law and the award of damages.

The cause of the break was purely accidental.

See Schultz v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 67 Wis. 616, 58 Am. Rep. 881.

The fact of the occurrence of this accident under these unexplained circumstances furnishes no basis in itself for assuming negligence on the part of the defendant.

Newman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Errors are assigned as follows: (1) In the admission of testimony; (2) in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and in refusing to grant a new trial; (3) in refusing to submit to the jury questions proposed by the defendant for special verdict; (4) in the charge to the jury.

The errors complained of in the admission of testimony relate to the testimony of physicians relative to the physical and mental condition of the plaintiff a year and a half after the accident. The accident happened in February, 1892. In August, 1893, the plaintiff became the patient of Dr. Becker. The doctor was permitted to describe the condition in which he found him, giving both subjective and objective symptoms. So far 27 L. R. A.

as this related to the seriousness of the injury, this was competent. Nor was it liable to the objection that it was hearsay. So far as the knowledge of plaintiff's condition was derived from plaintiff's statements to him as a medical man for the purpose of receiving advice and treatment, the testimony was not incompetent for that reason. Quaife v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 48 Wis. 513, 33 Am. Rep. 891; Davidson v. Cornell, 132 N. Y. 228. There is no just ground for claiming that the doctor's relation to the plaintiff was other than as a medical adviser, and not for the purpose of being a witness upon the trial. So the question is not within the principle of Stewart v. Everts, 76 Wis. 35, and Abbot v. Heath, 84 Wis. 314. It is also claimed as error that Dr. Becker was permitted to testify that plaintiff's condition, as he found it, could have been produced by contact with a wire heavily charged with electricity. The plaintiff's theory was that such was the cause of his condition. There was some testimony tending to establish that theory. Surely, testimony showing that such a cause was sufficient to produce such a condition tended also to establish that theory. The testimony was both relevant and competent. The doctor was permitted to give his opinion of the "reasonable probability" of the plaintiff's ultimate recovery from his injuries. While it is true that the whole testimony must establish, in the minds of the jury, more than a mere "reasonable probability," and must amount to proof to a "reasonable certainty," this ultimate fact is susceptible of proof by items of testimony which do not, separately, fully establish it. The phrase "reasonable probability" is equivocal. It was for the jury to give force to the doctor's testimony in accordance with the intention of the words used, rather than with a strict or technical definition of the words. This was not error. The witness Eggert, who was present at the time of the accident, testified that he received a shock. This was probably competent as tending to show that the wire was charged with electricity, and so as bearing upon the question whether the plaintiff's injuries were caused by an electric shock.

The negligence which is alleged and claimed against the defendant is its omission to place guard wires over its trolley wires in such a way as to prevent the telephone wires, in case of their falling from any cause, from falling upon and coming in contact with the trolley wires. It is claimed that the defendant owes the duty to the public to guard it from the effect of accidents which may happen to the telephone wire, which it neither owns nor controls. The employment of electricity to propel cars along railway tracks in cities is of recent institution. It may well be that the dangers attending its use in that function, and the best modes of guarding against accident in its use, are not yet fully known and understood. Many of the phenomena, and the possibilities of danger attendant upon such use are still subjects of question and experiment. But notwithstanding this condition of imperfect knowledge, the law permits this mysterious and dangerous power to be used for locomotion in the streets of cities. It is lawfully there. No doubt it is the duty of the defendant to use such customary and approved appliances as are known and used in the business of operating electric railways. So far as reasonable knowledge, in the present state of the science and the practical use of electricity as a motive power for street railways, and reasonable foresight, can go, it is bound to guard the public against the perils attendant upon this use of electricity. But it is liable only for what is known as "reasonable care." The present state of the science, and the present practical knowledge of the most practical and effectual means and methods of guarding against such perils as are incident to its use, are a most important element in the question of what is reasonable care. In the present condition of the science and of the practical knowledge on this subject, it cannot be said, as matter of law, what method of guarding the wires shall be required, nor whether any guards shall be required; for it is not known to the law that any method now known will prove effective. But it is a question for the jury, under all the facts in the case, to determine whether the method actually used was negligent. The trial court treated this question as one of law. He instructed the jury, in effect, that guard wires placed over the trolley wires is the approved method of protecting the telephone wire, in such places, and refused to submit to the jury, in the special verdict, the following question proposed by the defendant: "Did the defendant, in the construction and operation of the street railway in question, exercise such care and prudence for the safety of persons using the highway as men of ordinary intelligence and prudence engaged in operating the railway in question would have exercised at the place in question?" The instruction virtually took the question of the defendant's negligence from the jury. The refusal to submit the question asked withdrew it altogether from the jury. The question of the defendant's negligence is always for the jury, unless the negligence is so clear upon the evidence that intelligent minds cannot fairly form different conclusions upon it. This question was a proper one to be submitted in a special verdict. It related to a material issue of fact, and one upon which the case, in a large measure, turned. Both the charge upon this point and the refusal to submit this question were error. This is in no way inconsistent with what was decided in State v. Janesville Street R. Co. 87 Wis. 72, 22 L. R. A. 759. That case was on demurrer to the complaint. The action was mandamus to compel the railway company to put guard wires above its trolley wires at crossings. An ordinance of the city required it. The complaint alleged the ordinance, and that guard wires are the proper and approved method of preventing danger from the falling of the telephone wires upon the trolley wires. These facts were admitted by the demurrer. The case in no way involved the decision of the question whether guard wires are the proper method, or whether it is negligence to omit the guard wires.

It is claimed that plaintiff's accident was caused, directly, by contact with a telephone wire, belonging to the telephone company, and neither owned nor controlled by the defendant and in a street to which its system did not extend. More remotely, it is supposed to have been caused by the falling of the telephone wire upon the trolley wires, which became a live wire by such contact. There would be no claim against the defendant unless it could be shown that the telephone wire was alive with electricity communicated to it by the trolley wires. The defendant may be liable for the result, if its omission to guard its wires was negligence, and if that negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damages. The real first cause of the accident is in doubt. The real test of the defendant's liability for the plaintiff's accident is whether the omission to guard its wire, that being found by the jury to be negligence, was the proximate cause of the accident. The negligence is not the proximate cause of the accident, unless, under all the circumstances, the accident might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence. It is not enough to prove that the accident is the natural consequence of the negligence. It must also have been the probable consequence. Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 163, 50 Am. Rep. 353; Barton v. Pepin County Agr. Soc. 83 Wis. 19. This, too, is always a question for the jury, where the evidence is not clear, or the proper inference from undisputed evidence may be in doubt. The defendant asked to have this question submitted in the special verdict. This was refused, and no instruction was given relating to this element in the question of proximate cause. The defendant's proposed question was as follows: "Ought men of ordinary intelligence and prudence, engaged in operating the street railway in question, to have reasonably expected that the telephone wire in question would be likely to come in contact with its trolley wire at the place in question, and occasion injury to persons lawfully using the highway crossed by said telephone wire?" The refusal to submit this question, in a proper case, has been held by this court to be error. Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. supra. These two special questions, which the trial court refused to submit, cover the whole question of the defendant's liability. Was the defendant negligent? Was the negligence the (proximate) cause of the damages? These are material issuable facts, such as a party has the right, under the statute, to require to be submitted in a special verdict. They should have been submitted, at least in substance. The charge of the trial court was long and copious. It contained a long and able disquisition upon the subject of the uses and purposes of highways, and of the rights of travelers to free and unobstructed passage therein. He said: "The public have the right to the free and unmolested and unobstructed use of the streets, and no person has the right to hinder and prevent the use of the streets for the purpose of travel," and much more to the same purpose. It would be all very well in a case where questions of that nature were involved. But in this case it tended really to keep out of sight and obscure the real point in controversy. Both the telephone company and the defendant had a perfect legal right to have their wires over the streets. They were no illegal obstruction of the streets. The point involved in relation to them depended on entirely different considerations. It was whether the defendant was negligent in permitting the telephone wire to fall upon its wires. This part of the charge went upon a mistaken theory of the case, and was very likely to mislead the jury by distracting attention from the point of stress in the case.

Relating to the amount of the damages to which the plaintiff might be entitled, and as affected by the permanency of the plaintiff's injuries, the court charged: "I instruct you, gentlemen, that you cannot take into consideration, as an element of damages, any testimony on the subject of the permanency of the injuries, unless you find from the testimony that there is reasonable probability that the injury that he has sustained, and the suffering and disability he is now under, will be permanent and lasting." The criticism is on the phrase "reasonable probability." Because the phrase is equivocal, it is liable to communicate to the jury an erroneous impression that some degree of proof less than of reasonable certainty may be sufficient. It is settled in this court that the degree of proof must amount to reasonable certainty. White v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 61 Wis. 586, 50 Am. Rep. 154; Hardy v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. (Wis.) decided at this term, but not yet officially reported. The defendant asked for a special instruction to the effect that damages as for permanent injury should not be allowed unless the jury could say from the evidence that it was reasonably certain that the injury would be permanent, and that reasonable probability was not sufficient. This the court refused to give. The instruction given was erroneous, and it was error to refuse the instruction requested. For the errors mentioned, the judgment must be reversed.

The judgment of the Superior Court of Milwaukee County is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL by intervenor from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County refusing to set aside an order authorizing service of summons by publication on defendant in a proceeding brought to enforce payment of certain bonds which had been issued by it. Reversed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

It appears from the record: That for some years prior to June 1, 1858, the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company was duly incorporated by the legislature of Wisconsin, and organized as such to build and operate a railroad from Milwaukee to La Crosse, and was given the right to mortgage its road by divisions. That it accordingly divided the road into two divisions,—the eastern, extending from Milwaukee to Portage City, a distance of ninety-five miles; and the western, extending from Portage City to La Crosse, a distance of 105 miles. That the eastern division was incumbered by three mortgages, to secure bondholders on that division, and the western division was incumbered by two mortgages, to secure bondholders on that division. That the whole road was incumbered by several judgments, one of which was in favor of Newcombe Cleveland, hereinafter mentioned. That June 1, 1858, that company executed a mortgage to William Barnes, as trustee, to secure an issue of bonds which covered the whole road, and August 11, 1858, executed a mortgage supplemental to said last-named mortgage, by way of further assurance. That the Barnes mortgage, though last, was first foreclosed. That sale under it was made May 21, 1859, to said trustee, who became the purchaser for the bondholders, and the bondholders thereupon, and on May 23, 1859, organized a new company under the general statutes of this state, by the name of the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, to which Barnes conveyed the property so purchased by him. That said new com-termination of corporate existence by implication without any formal dissolution.

pany was so organized for the purpose of acquiring title to the railroad formerly owned by the said La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, extending from Milwaukee to Portage City, in the state of Wisconsin, a distance of about ninety-five miles, and for operating said road and paying off said prior incumbrance. That October 24, 1864, for the purpose of raising money to pay off prior incumbrances upon the property of said corporation, and for other purposes of the corporation, the said Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company duly executed, under its corporate seal, a trust deed whereby it conveyed all of its property and franchises to James H. Fonda and G. Hilton Scribner, of New York, to secure certain bonds to be issued by said company to the aggregate amount of $600,000, each bond to be for $1,000, payable July 1, 1884, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semiannually. That October 24, 1864, the defendant, the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, duly executed its bond, under its corporate seal, bearing date on that day, whereby it acknowledged itself indebted to the bearer thereof in the sum of $1,000, which sum it thereby agreed to pay to the bearer thereof on July 1, 1884, at the office of the company in New York, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable at the same place semiannually, on the 1st days of January and July in each year. That said bond was duly registered and countersigned by said trustees November 8, 1864. That annexed to said bond were 39 coupons, for $40, each of which was payable six months after the date of the preceding one. That annexed to the same bond was one coupon for $26.67, payable January 1, 1865. That October 24, 1864, the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company duly executed, under its corporate seal, 331 other bonds, bearing date on that day, and duly registered and countersigned by said trustees, of the same amount, form, tenor, and effect as the bond above described, except that each was designated by a different number, and each had 40 coupons attached, of the tenor and effect of those annexed to said bond so described. That the said 331 bonds were designated by the numbers stated. That December 1, 1864, the said 332 bonds were duly issued by the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, and sold and transferred to various third parties, who paid a valuable consideration therefor. That payment of said first series of coupons, when they fell due, was refused. That, upon the organization of the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, that company claimed to have succeeded to all the rights, property, and franchises of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, subject to all prior mortgages and judgments. That the first mortgage on the western division was subsequently foreclosed, and that division sold. That the purchasers at such sale thereupon organized a new company, by the name of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company, which company went into possession of that division. That subsequently, and on April 18, 1866, Frederick P. James, as the assignee of the said judgment against the La Crosse

Company, in favor of Newcombe Cleveland, mentioned, commenced a suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, against the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, to enforce the lien of said judgment on the said eastern division. That such proceedings were had in that suit that January 11, 1867, a decree was entered adjudging that there was due to said James on the judgment $98,801.51, and ordering a sale of the eastern division, subject to all prior liens, for its payment. That, under that decree, the property was, March 2, 1867, sold and conveyed to the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, for $100,920.94, and from that time the said last-named company, whose name has since been changed to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, has been in the possession of said road from Milwaukee to Portage City, as owner, under such sale and purchase. That since the sale of said road under said judgment and decree, as aforesaid (more than 26 years before the commencement of this action), the said Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company has not conducted any of the ordinary business theretofore conducted by said corporation, or any business. That the law governing the election of the directors of said company, to wit, chapter 28, Private & Local Laws 1863, provided, in effect, that the regular annual meeting of the stockholders of the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, for the election of directors of said company, should be held on the last Wednesday of May, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, in each year, in the city of Milwaukee. That the secretary of said company should give 30 days' notice of the place and time of said election, in at least two newspapers printed in Milwaukee, and the other at Madison. That the governor should annually appoint three inspectors for said election, who should take an oath faithfully and impartially to discharge the duties devolved upon them by said act. That the inspectors should meet at the time and place appointed for said election, and proceed to receive such votes for directors of said company as might legally be offered and received under said act. That the board of directors of said company should consist of nine persons authorized to vote at said election, and such nine persons receiving the highest number of votes at said election should be the board until another election should be held and their successors elected. That the said Dwight W. Keyes was elected secretary of the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company at the time of its organization. That he continued to act as such secretary so long as said company pretended to transact any business in Wisconsin, and was acting as such in 1865 and 1866. That he was never notified of the election of any successor, and never had any knowledge or information that any other person was elected as secretary of said company. That there never was after April, 1867, any meeting of the stockholders of said company, in Wisconsin or elsewhere, for the purpose of electing a board of directors, or for any other purpose. That after that time there never was a meeting of the board of directors. That no inspectors of election have ever been appointed since 1865. That no notice of the time and place of the meeting of stockholders of said defendant for the election of directors, or for any purpose, was ever published in any newspaper in Milwaukee or Madison since 1865. That no such notice has been published since 1865. That said Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company has not, for more than twenty-six years prior to the commencement of this action, owned, possessed, or had any property within Wisconsin, nor has it been engaged in any business whatever. That April 12, 1893, the plaintiff caused a complaint to be made out and verified against the said Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, and, in addition to the issuance of said 833 bonds and the mortgage to secure the same and the nonpayment thereof, in effect alleged that, before the commencement of this action, the said 833 bonds were sold and transferred to this plaintiff for a valuable consideration, and he is now the owner thereof. That no part of the principal or interest thereon has been paid to him, and that there was then due to him from said defendant, the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company upon said bonds, the sum of $332,000, together with interest thereon from December 1, 1864, and also interest upon each of said coupons from the date of its maturity, and demanded judgment against the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company for such amount. That thereupon a summons was issued in this action, and delivered to the sheriff of Milwaukee county, who returned the same, with the following indorsement, to wit: "State of Wisconsin, Milwaukee County—ss.: I hereby certify that, after due diligence, search, and inquiry, I cannot find the within-named defendant, the Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company, within my county; and from information obtained, and I believe the information to be true, no officer or agent of said company upon whom to make service can be found within the state of Wisconsin. Michael Dunn, Sheriff, per Henry J. Holle, Under-sheriff. Date Milwaukee, May 4, 1893." That May 5, 1893, the summons and complaint were filed with the clerk of the circuit court for Milwaukee county, and, upon affidavits of the plaintiff and his attorney subsequently made and filed therein, the plaintiff obtained from a commissioner of said circuit court an order for the service of said summons upon the said Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company by publication, and the records show that said summons was published accordingly. That, upon affidavits showing the facts outside of said complaint stated, the said Dwight W. Keyes obtained an order, September 28, 1893, ordering plaintiff to show cause why said order of publication and such service of said summons should not be set aside and held for naught. From an order dismissing said order to show cause, and denying the relief therein prayed for, the said Keyes brings this appeal.

Section 20 of chapter 148, Rev. Stat. 1858, provided that whenever a corporation shall have suspended its ordinary and lawful business for one year, it shall be deemed to have surrendered its rights, privileges, and franchises, and shall be adjudged to be dissolved.

The state has thereby evinced a willingness and an intent on its part to accept a surrender of the charter of a corporation when it has ceased to do business for one year. It is also strong evidence of an intent, on the part of the corporation or stockholders, to surrender the charter.

Denike v. New York & R. Lime & Cement Co. 80 N. Y. 606; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 2d ed. § 629, note 4.

The franchise of a Wisconsin railway corporation could be sold under foreclosure or execution sale; and on such sale and the operation of the road by the purchasers and a cessation of all corporate business and acts by the old corporation, a surrender of the "franchise of being a corporation," and an acceptance thereof by the state occur.

The Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, having been dissolved as early as 1868, and more than three years having elapsed since the dissolution, it cannot be sued, and if judgment should be entered against it in this action, such judgment would be void.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company was organized, under the General Statutes, May 28, 1859. It thereupon acquired, by conveyance from Barnes, through a foreclosure of the Barnes mortgage and a sale thereon to Barnes, all the rights, property, and franchises of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, subject, however, to three mortgages on the eastern division and two mortgages on the western division, and several judgments on the respective divisions, including one in favor of Newcombe Cleveland. Prior to April 18, 1866, the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company acquired the title and possession of the western division, through the foreclosure of the first mortgage thereon and a sale thereunder. The La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company was expressly authorized by its charter, and the amendments thereto, to mortgage all of its estate, real, personal, or mixed, "together with the functions appertaining to said railroad, and all corporate and other franchises, rights, and privileges" of said company; and hence, by that foreclosure and sale, the same were vested in the Milwaukee & St. Paul Company. March 2, 1867, the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company acquired the title and possession of the eastern division, under and by virtue of a marshal's sale and conveyance to it on a decree entered in the federal court, January 11, 1867, as mentioned, in a suit in equity in favor of the assignee of the Cleveland judgment, and against the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, to enforce that judgment as a lien thereon. Since March 2, 1867, the name of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Company has been changed to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, and the same has ever since been in possession and operated said railroad as owner thereof. Prior to the marshal's sale and conveyance mentioned, the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company had a board of directors, who had severally been elected, at the time and place and in the manner prescribed by the statutes of this state, and such board had elected a president, secretary, and treasurer of that company, who had, respectively, acted as such officers, down to the time of the marshal's sale and conveyance mentioned. Independently of statute, it was the duty of that company, during its existence, to have an office and officers within this state. State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 45 Wis. 579.

It appears that no notice of the election of any such directors for that company was ever given, and no appointment of any inspectors of any such election was ever made as prescribed by statutes, after 1866, and that after April, 1867, there never was any meeting in Wisconsin of the stockholders or directors of said company for any purpose; that since that time said company has neither owned, possessed, nor had any property in this state, nor been engaged in any business therein, and at the time of the commencement of this action it had no agent nor officer therein. The question recurs whether the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company has any legal existence in this state, so as to entitle it to sue and be sued. That company was incorporated and organized under and by virtue of the laws of this state over thirty-five years ago, and existed only by force of the laws of this state. Since such laws, of themselves, had no extraterritorial force, that corporation could not migrate to some other state or country, but during its existence was bound to dwell in this, the state of its creation. Seamans v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company (Wis.; not yet officially reported) ante, 362; Larson v. Aultman & T. Co. 86 Wis. 283, 284; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 589, 10 L. ed. 307; Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 449, 36 L. ed. 771. While it could only live and have its being in this state, yet its residence here created no insuperable objection to its power to contract and be contracted with in other states, and having its legal existence recognized in such other states. Ibid. But any exercise of its corporate franchises in such other states was merely permissible by virtue of the comity of such states. Ibid.; Liverpool & L. L. & N. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 506, 19 L. ed. 1029. Such being the law, it is very manifest that, if the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company had any legal existence at the time of the commencement of this action, such existence was confined within the limits of this state. And yet the sheriff's return is to the effect "that, after due diligence, search and inquiry," he could not find that company within his county, nor any officer or agent of the same within the state. The same condition of things, as to that company in this state, had existed ever since April, 1867. If, during those twenty-six years, it existed in this state at all, such existence was without any definite location, intangible, and unascertainable. The case is not one of a defendant whose "residence is unknown," or who "keeps himself concealed" within the state, with the intent to "avoid the service of a summons," within the meaning of the statute (sec. 2639). The service of the summons by publication in this case is sought to be justified upon the sole ground that the defendant is a "private corporation organized under the laws of the state, and the proper officers on whom to make service cannot be found." Ibid. The statute declares, in effect, that whenever any corporation shall have neglected or refused to pay and discharge its debts, "or shall have suspended its ordinary and lawful business for one whole year, it shall be deemed to have surrendered the rights, privileges, and franchises granted or acquired under any law, and shall be adjudged to be dissolved." Section 1763. But this court has repeatedly held that such neglect, refusal, or suspension "for one whole year" does not ipso facto operate as a dissolution of such corporation, but simply declares an efficient cause for adjudging a dissolution in a proper action. Strong v. McCagg, 55 Wis. 624; Sleeper v. Goodwin, 67 Wis. 577. The statute also prescribes, in effect, that where the existence of a corporation expires by its own limitation, or is voluntarily dissolved in the manner provided by law or by its articles of association, or is annulled by forfeiture or otherwise, nevertheless it shall continue to exist for three years for certain purposes. Section 1764. Sleeper v. Goodwin, 67 Wis. 584. So the statute authorizes the dissolution of a corporation by a written resolution in certain cases. Section 1759.

It must be remembered that the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company acquired the rights, property, and franchises of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company by virtue of the foreclosure and sale of the Barnes mortgage; that it took such rights, property, and franchises subject to the prior mortgages and prior judgments mentioned; that the purpose of its incorporation and organization was to operate the railroad thus acquired between the points mentioned; that prior to April, 1867, it had been completely ousted and dispossessed of the entire railroad, and every part thereof, under and by virtue of the foreclosure and sale and the decree in equity and sale mentioned; that all such rights, property, and franchises thereby and thereupon became vested in the St. Paul Company, which for more than twenty-six years prior to the commencement of this action, and since, has had the possession and control of the entire line of railroad, and every part thereof, and during all that time operated the same as a railroad, with the repeated express or implied sanctions of the legislature of this state; that during the same time the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company has not owned nor possessed any railroad, nor does it appear that it has attempted to construct any. The contention of counsel for the plaintiff seems to be to the effect that while the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company had, by virtue of the sales and conveyances mentioned, been deprived of the entire railroad and its property, and its franchises, as a corporation, to maintain and operate the same, yet that it still possesses a franchise to be a corporation, and hence may still sue and be sued. Conceding that a franchise to be a corporation may, under certain circumstances, and for certain purposes, and for a limited time, exist without any franchise to maintain and operate such corporation, still the question here presented is whether any such franchise, to be a corporation, survived to the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company after the transfers made, under the circumstances mentioned, and for the length of time named. Undoubtedly, a private corporation may dissolve itself and terminate its corporate existence by a voluntary surrender of its franchises to the state. To make the surrender complete, however, it must be accepted by the state. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 296, and cases there cited. It would seem that after such corporation had been stripped of all its property, and for 26 years had failed to exercise any corporate franchise or elect any officer in this state or keep any office therein, such surrender would be presumed. Brandon Iron Co. v. Gleason, 24 Vt. 228. And so it would seem that, where a corporation suffers acts to be done which destroy the end and object for which it was instituted, it is equivalent to a surrender of its rights. Slee v. Bloom, 19 Johns. 456, 10 Am. Dec. 273; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 387, 18 Am. Dec. 454. It has been held that a seizure and sale of the franchises of a corporation effect its dissolution. Vincennes Bank v. State, 1 Blackf. 267, 12 Am. Dec. 284. So it has frequently been held that the consolidation of two or more railway companies, in pursuance of a statute, operates as a dissolution of the old corporations, and the merger of the franchises and privileges of each of them into the new corporation. Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. ed. 357; Green County v. Conness, 109 U. S. 104, 27 L. ed. 872; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 115 U. S. 587, 29 L. ed. 499; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 801, 38 L. ed. 450. It is certainly within the power of a legislature which creates a corporation, and grants franchises to it, to authorize it to sell or mortgage those franchises. Willamette Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Bank of British Columbia, 119 U. S. 191, 30 L. ed. 384. Here the franchises were mortgaged by express legislative authority, and hence were transferred through the foreclosure and sale pursuant to law. Besides, the statute in this state declares, in effect, that any person or association of persons which shall have or may hereafter become the owner or assignee of the rights, powers, privileges, and franchises of any corporation created or organized by or under any law of this state, by purchase under a mortgage sale, sale in bankrupt proceedings, or sale under any judgment, order, decree, or proceedings in any court in this state, including the courts of the United States sitting herein, "may, at any time within two years after such purchase or assignment," organize anew, as provided by the statutes, and shall thereupon have the same rights, privileges, and franchises which such corporation had, or was entitled to have, at the time of such purchase and sale, and such as are provided by the statutes applicable thereto. Rev. Stat. § 1788. That section is in effect the same as chapter 115, Laws 1872. The Milwaukee & St. Paul Company became such purchaser, and so organized anew, within two years after such purchase and assignment, although about five years prior to that enactment. The manifest intention of the act was to ratify and confirm all such prior transfers, and to accept all such prior surrenders of corporate rights. The two years mentioned was merely to limit the time within which any purchasers or assignees, subsequently to the enactment, might so organize anew. After careful consideration, we are constrained to hold, upon the showings made, that, prior to the commencement of this action, the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company had voluntarily surrendered all of its corporate franchises, and that the same had been accepted by the state.

After the dissolution of a corporation, the power to proceed judicially against it in an action is wholly devested, except as especially authorized by statute. "A defunct corporation, like a natural person who dies, cannot be brought into court by process served upon persons who were officers or agents when the corporation was in existence." Waterman, Corp. § 484. "Where, during the pendency of a suit, a corporation surrenders its charter, which is accepted by the legislature, it becomes defunct, and the suit abates, unless the legislature, by some act, saves the right of an action against the corporation." Greely v. Smith, 8 Story, C. C. 657, Fed. Cas. No. 5,748. In Mumma v. Potomac Co. 83 U. S. 8 Pet. 281, 8 L. ed. 945, it was held that "there is no pretense to say that a scire facias can be maintained and a judgment had thereon against a dead corporation, any more than against a dead man." In that case the attorneys of record for the corporation, at the time of the rendition of the original judgment, appeared and suggested the death of the corporation, after the rendition of such judgment, and alleged the same by way of a plea in abatement. The facts being admitted, the trial court gave judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his writ of scire facias, and that judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. From the very nature of things, the dissolution or death of a corporation defendant like the death of a party to a pending action, can only be brought to the attention of the court by some one other than the defunct corporation. This is obvious from the authorities cited. See also Welch v. Ste. Genevieve, 1 Dill. 180, Fed. Cas. No. 17,372; First Nat. Bank of Selma v. Colby, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 609, 611, 614, 22 L. ed. 687, 688; State v. Jefferson Iron Co. 60 Tex. 812.

We think it was competent for Dwight W. Keyes, who had been the secretary of the defunct corporation, to intervene and inform the court of the facts which had worked a dissolution and death of the corporation.

The order of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with direction to set aside the order of publication and the service of the summons; but, as indicated in the Potomac Co. Case, cited, as there is no such corporation in esse as the Milwaukee & Minnesota Railroad Company, there can be no costs awarded in its favor.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages from defendant, county sheriff, for the false return of an execution. Reversed.

Statement by Bailey, J.:

This was an action on the case, brought by George D. Sweetser and others, copartners under the firm name of Sweetser, Pembroke & Company, against Canute R. Matson, sheriff of Cook county, to recover damages for a false return of an execution in favor of the plaintiffs and against the property of Fanton R. Lawlor. At the trial there was little if any controversy as to the material facts, those which the evidence tended to establish being, in substance, as follows:

On the 8th day of January, 1890, nine writs of execution against the property of Lawlor were issued and delivered to the defendant, as sheriff, to execute, viz.: one from the superior court in favor of Nemo Murphy for $1,765.67, and one from the same court in favor of E. W. Price for $5,160.60, and seven from the circuit court in favor of the Hibernian Banking Association, aggregating $28,752.08. On the same day an attachment writ, in favor of James H. Walker and against the property of Lawlor, for $979.16, was also issued and placed in the hands of the defendant, as sheriff, to execute. These nine executions and the writ of attachment were on the same day levied by the defendant upon a stock of goods at 182 and 184 Wabash avenue, Chicago, the value of which, as shown by the invoice, was about $55,000, and also upon a stock of goods on Blue Island avenue, which was involved at something over $7,000. After making these levies, the defendant advertised the property levied on for sale, the sale of the Wabash avenue stock of goods to take place January 22, 1890, and the Blue Island avenue stock one or two days later.

On the 17th day of January, 1890, Lawlor, the execution debtor, prepared and sent to each of his creditors the following circular letter:

"Chicago, January 17, 1890.

"Dear Sir:

"All my effects are now under seizure by the sheriff, upon executions amounting to $41,800. My indebtedness outside of the judgments under which these levies are made amounts to about $30,000. Effects levied on are fairly and reasonably worth $30,000, and ought to bring $70,000 if favorably disposed of.

"It is thought that if the sheriff makes sale under these levies with the usual and ordinary sacrifice attending a sheriff's sale, the proceeds will fall short of satisfying the judgments, and nothing will be left to apply on such other indebtedness.

Execution cannot be used as a cover.

The courts are unanimous in refusing to permit an execution to be used for an ulterior of fraudulent purpose. It cannot be used to aid the debtor in withholding the property from other creditors.

If the first execution was not kept up merely by color and for fraudulent purposes, it will not be postponed to a later one. Casher v. Peterson (1816) 4 N. J. L. 817.

The execution is ineffectual if issued with the intent to use it as security. Baldwin v. Freydenhall (1881) 10 Ill. App. 106.

An execution is not valid which is issued to acquire a lien. Earl's App. (1860) 18 Pa. 468.

Directing a levy simply to retain a priority of lien will not be effectual. Dunderdale v. Sauvestre (1861) 18 Abb. Pr. 116.

Any act evincing an intention not to have a sale of the property but to hold a writ for the purposes of a lien is a waiver of the priority of the execution in favor of a writ subsequently coming into the sheriff's hands. Stroudsburg Bank's App. (1860) 126 Pa. 523.

When the primary design of the plaintiff in issuing execution is to obtain a lien upon defendant's property and not to sell the same except in the contingency of the subsequent execution being issued, the lien of the execution will be postponed, but if there is nothing but a disposition on the part of plaintiff to treat the family of defendant in the execution with due consideration, by not subjecting them to unnecessary inconvenience or annoyance, the execution will not be postponed. Landis v. Evans (1886) 113 Pa. 384.

If the purpose of the levy is to secure a lien it is ineffectual. Com. v. Stremback (1832) 3 Rawle, 341. In that case the court says it is not sufficient for creditors at this day, when the condition of the country is so materially changed, to permit the levy to remain without sale or placing some one in charge so long as it seems to have been authorized by the former cases.

An execution cannot be used to cover property against younger executions. Matthews v. Warne (1890) 11 N. J. L. 320.

Using an execution as a cover will destroy its efficacy. Kellogg v. Griffin (1820) 17 Johns. 274.

But the intention to use the writ merely as a cover must be established in order to affect its priority. Mere leniency towards the execution debtor is not sufficient. Wolf v. Tillinghast (1894) 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 338.

Leaving property in debtor's hands.

Most of the cases have discussed the question from the standpoint of presumptive fraud. When there is no positive rule that the property levied upon must be removed from the possession of the debtor the rule in some states is that merely leaving it in his possession until sale is not sufficient to defeat the priority.

In Levy v. Wallis (1799) 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 167, 1 L. ed. 783, it appeared that after the levy was made the sales were put off at the request of plaintiffs, and it is stated that the question was whether the priority had been lost by permitting the property to remain in the hands of defendants, and that is the question discussed, the court holding that leaving it so in the possession of the defendant furnished no presumption of fraud and does not consider the question of the effect of postponing the sale.

Leaving the property with the debtor until the time of sale will not postpone the execution if there is no direction to delay the sale. Rew v. Barber (1824) 3 Cow. 279. In that case the court says in the cases in which the writ has been held to have been postponed, the creditor had interfered and "On the other hand it is hoped that, if arrangements can be made to dispose of the property levied upon by private sale, enough can be realized over and above the amount of such judgments to enable me to make a fairly good payment upon my other liabilities.

"To accomplish this will require the consent of all my creditors, and it is to obtain such consent I now write you. The sheriff's sale is advertised to commence the 22d inst. and to answer any purpose I must hear from you immediately. This plan is the only one I can conceive by which something may be rescued for the nonjudgment creditors. Please answer at once.

"Yours truly,

"F. R. Lawlor.

"To....."

With this letter, Lawlor enclosed to each of his creditors a paper to be signed and returned, consenting to the sale or disposition of the property levied upon at private sale, by Lawlor and the parties in whose favor the levies were made, to the end that the largest sum possible should be realized therefrom. The evidence tends to show that this letter before it was sent out was shown to a representative of the execution creditors and approved by him. Before the end of January, Lawlor received favorable replies from eighty-seven out of a total of ninety-six of his creditors. Among those who refused to give the consent requested were the plaintiffs in this suit.

On January 23, 1890, the sale advertised for that day was, by the direction of the plaintiffs in the executions and with the consent of Lawlor, adjourned to January 29, 1890. On that day, it was by like direction and consent, adjourned to February 8, 1890. On February 5, 1890, the plaintiffs in this suit recovered a judgment against Lawlor for $1,957.77, and on the same day an execution on their judgment was issued and placed in the hands of the defendant, as sheriff, with directions to levy upon the property of Lawlor and make the amount of the execution as soon as possible. On February 8, 1890, the sale was again adjourned by direction of the plaintiffs in the senior executions and consent of the execution debtor, but without the consent of the plaintiffs in this suit, to February 11, 1890. Between February 8th and 11th, the sheriff was requested by the present plaintiffs not to postpone the sale any longer, and notified that they objected to any further postponement, but notwithstanding this, the sheriff again postponed the sale by direction of the plaintiffs in the senior executions to February 13, 1890. The sale of the Blue Island avenue stock of goods was, in like manner, postponed from time to time, the day to which it was postponed being, in each case, a day or two later than that fixed for the sale of the Wabash avenue stock.

The scheme of having the property sold at private sale having failed to receive the unanimous consent of Lawlor's creditors, arrangements were made by the senior execution creditors for having the stocks of goods directed a delay of sale and left the goods with the debtor.

In Cox v. McDougall (1798) 2 Yeates, 434, it seems to have been held that suffering the goods to remain in the debtor's hands and remaining inactive for some time did not postpone the lien of the execution, and this rule was followed although the goods remained in the debtor's hands for upwards of two years. Perit v. Wallis (1799) 2 Yeates, 524.

The property may be left in defendant's possession after levy without the loss of priority, if it is done in good faith, but if it is so left for several years, or an unusual or unreasonable time, and the defendant is permitted to use and enjoy it as before the levy, it may be evidence of fraudulent intent. The plaintiff may consent to reasonable adjournment from time to time or even direct adjournment, if it is done in good faith. The plaintiff may at the time of delivering the writ to the sheriff, direct him not to proceed with the sale without further orders or unless urged by younger executions, if it is done in good faith. But if defendant is permitted to retain possession and use the property the same as before executing an unlimited control over it, selling, exchanging, or consuming it as the owner, it is such evidence of fraud as to postpone the execution to a younger one. Cumberland Bank v. Hann (1842) 19 N. J. L. 166; James v. Burnet (1846) 20 N. J. L. 636.

But elsewhere, in Wise v. Darby (1845) 9 Mo. 131, the court in deciding that the direction not to levy will postpone a lien, says a direction to delay a levy will postpone the lien on the principle that the levy divests the property from the defendant and that to leave such property in possession of defendant by the connivance or at the request of the plaintiff would be a fraud against subsequent executions.

Instructing the sheriff to permit the property to remain in the debtor's hands will postpone the lien. Parker v. Waugh (1864) 34 Mo. 340.

Directing the sheriff to leave the property in possession of the debtor will postpone the lien. Roberts v. Scales (1840) 23 N. C. 88.

If the officer is ordered to levy on, but to leave the property with the owner, the order undoes all that the officer does by the seizure; it is no levy as to third persons. It is not necessary that the officer should remove the property or even sell it immediately, if this be done in a reasonable time. Berry v. Smith (1811) 3 Wash. C. C. 60. In that case the levy of the second writ was made one day later than that of the first and it was given the preference, the court saying the order of suspension deprives the officer of all its force and effect and if before it is countermanded a second execution is levied, the former must be postponed.

If in addition to leaving the property in the debtor's hands he is permitted to use it as before, this is usually regarded as sufficient to defeat the lien.

Permitting the debtor to retain possession, with the right to consume or sell the property, or to retain possession for an unreasonable time, will postpone the execution. Swigert v. Thomas (1838) 7 Dana, 220.

Permitting the debtor to continue selling his goods as usual will postpone the lien although the proceeds are to be paid over to the sheriff. Bingham v. Young (1849) 10 Pa. 365.

If the goods are seized and the officer put into possession, but the debtor is permitted to have control over them as before from March until November, the goods will be subject to an execution subsequently issued against them. Lovick v. Crowder (1828) 8 Barn. & C. 182, 2 Mann. & R. 84.

Leaving the property in possession of the debtor sold in bulk and not in parcels, Charles O. Lay being the prospective purchaser to whom it was proposed to have the sale made. With a view to this result, the following instrument was executed the day prior to that on which the sale finally took place:

"Chicago, February 12, 1890.

"We, the undersigned, judgment and lien creditors of Fanton R. Lawlor, hereby authorize and direct the sheriff of Cook county Illinois, to sell in bulk instead of in piecemeal or in parcels, all goods and stock of said Fanton R. Lawlor, heretofore levied upon under executions now in the hands of said sheriff.

"Hibernian Banking Association,

"Nemo Murphy.

"James H. Walker & Company.

"I hereby consent to the sale of all my stock of goods levied upon by the sheriff of Cook county, in bulk.

On the following day, and before the sale, the plaintiffs in the senior executions gave to the sheriff an indemnifying bond, in the penal sum of $50,000, which after reciting that the plaintiffs in those writs had requested the sheriff to make sale of the goods levied upon in bulk, and were desirous that he should make sale of them in that manner, was conditioned to hold him harmless from all actions, etc., to which he might be subjected by reason of selling the goods in bulk. On the same day, the following instrument was executed by Charles C. Lay, the proposed purchaser at the sale and the Hibernian Banking Association:

"Chicago, February 12, 1890.

"In consideration of the Hibernian Banking Association assigning to Charles C. Lay the following named judgments against F. C. Lawlor, to wit: Hibernian Banking Association, $84,982.08; Murphy, $1,765.67; Price, $5,160.50, amounting, together with $251.18 interest to date, to $42,109.36, I, Charles C. Lay, hereby agree to pay to said association the sum of $37,109.36, less the amount to be received by said association from the sheriff of Cook county on account of the sale this day by said sheriff of the property in the Wabash avenue store of said Lawlor.

"(Signed) Charles C. Lay.

"Hamilton B. Dox,

"Cashier Hibernian Banking Asson."

There is no evidence tending to show that any of the several postponements of the sale of the goods levied upon were made for want of bidders, but the evidence tends to show that they were all made in furtherance of efforts on the part of the execution debtor, co-operated in by the plaintiffs in the senior executions, first, to obtain the unanimous consent of all the creditors of the execution debtor to a private sale of the goods, and and permitting him to dispose of it as before will postpone the writ. Pary's App. (1861) 41 Pa. 273, 80 Am. Dec. 615; Keyser's App. (1860) 18 Pa. 409.

Permitting the debtor to consume the property for the purposes of his family will postpone the execution to one levy subsequently. Farrington v. Sinclair (1818) 15 Johns. 428.

If the property is permitted to remain in the possession of the debtor for the use of himself and his family and not as agent for the sheriff, the special property acquired by the levy is relinquished and the lien is gone. Kirkpatrick v. Oason (1863) 30 N. J. L. 331.

Where an execution was levied on a stock of goods on the 14th of January, and by permission of the creditor the property was left in the store of the debtor where he continued to carry on his trade until the 31st of the next May, when the sheriff took possession, it cannot be said that an execution is really executed where the debtor is permitted by the plaintiff to retain possession and exercise the same acts of ownership over it which he before had done. Barnes v. Billington (1808) 1 Wash. C. C. 33.

And the lien will also be lost if the property is left in possession of the debtor for an unreasonable time.

Justice to other creditors requires that goods which may be at the time sufficient to satisfy all shall not be left in such a situation that they may be consumed or eloiigned. The law and sheriff are not left to take their course. It is not they but the plaintiff who is acting by the sheriff, whom he sees fit to install as his private agent. The goods being no longer in the custody of the law, but rather in that of the plaintiff, there is no foundation for the lien and preference which the law can attach is a consequence of its own regular action only. Knower v. Barnard (1843) 5 Hill, 377.

Permitting the property to remain for months in possession of the debtor and allowing him to sell from it as usual is fraudulent as against other creditors. Davidson v. Waldron (1863) 31 Ill. 120, 88 Am. Dec. 206.

Where property easily removable is left in the possession and use of the debtor and the sale delayed an unreasonable time, the execution will be postponed. Acton v. Kowles (1862) 14 Ohio St. 18.

Permitting the goods to remain in the debtor's possession an unreasonable time after levy or under instructions to the sheriff to proceed no further with the writ will postpone it. Etheridge v. Edwards (1852) 1 Swan, 426.

Leaving the property in the possession of the debtor for a year after the levy and permitting him to use it as his own will make the execution fraudulent and void and postpone it in favor of the second execution. Storm v. Woods (1814) 11 Johns. 112.

In Eberle v. Mayer (1829) 1 Rawls, 366, the court recognizes the doctrine that postponing the sale and leaving the property in the debtor's hands will render the writ dormant. But in that case the evidence was such as to show fraud on the part of the creditor.

Delaying sale.

If in addition to leaving the property in the debtor's hands the creditor delays the sale he loses his lien.

If the property is left in the possession of the debtor and the sale is delayed at the instance of the creditor, the execution becomes dormant. Benjamin v. Smith (1834) 12 Wend. 404; Ball v. Shell, 21 Wend. 222; Kimball v. Munger (1842) 2 Hill, 304; Price v. Shipps (1858) 16 Barb. 585.

Where the property is left with the defendant upon execution of a delivery bond which is forfeited and no attempt made to renew the execu-after that scheme was abandoned, to enable him to make arrangements for a purchaser who would bid off the two stocks of goods in bulk, and to have it so fixed that the sale should be made in that manner and not otherwise. The evidence also tends to show that the plaintiffs in this suit did not consent, but expressly objected to having the sales made in bulk.

On February 13, 1890, the Wabash avenue stock of goods was sold by the sheriff, without being previously offered in parcels for $86,026, and on February 15th, the Blue Island avenue stock was sold in the same manner for $6,100, Charles C. Lay in both cases becoming the purchaser. The amount thus realized being a little less than sufficient to satisfy the senior executions, the execution in favor of the plaintiffs in this suit was returned wholly unsatisfied.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, and at the trial, which was had before the court, a jury having been waived, all propositions submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs, of which there were a considerable number, were held as the law in the decision of the case, and the court thereupon found the defendant guilty, and assessed the plaintiffs' damages at $2,313.22, and for that sum and costs the plaintiffs had judgment. On appeal to the appellate court, the judgment was reversed, and a final judgment was entered by that court that the plaintiffs take nothing by their suit, and that the defendant go thereof without day, and also that the defendant recover of the plaintiffs his costs. In rendering this judgment, the appellate court found the facts and recited the same in its final order as follows:

1. That defendant on February 5, 1890, was the sheriff of Cook county, Illinois, and on that day plaintiffs delivered to him the writ of fiat facias mentioned in the plaintiffs' declaration dated February 5, A. D. 1890, for the sum of $1,957.77 and costs of suit and against said Fanton R. Lawlor, and gave to the said defendant the instructions alleged in said declaration.

2. That prior to said February 5, A. D. 1890, and on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1890, one Nano Murphy had recovered in the superior court of said Cook county a judgment for $1,765.67 and costs of suit; one E. W. Price had recovered in the same court a judgment for $5,160.50 and costs of suit, and the Hibernian Banking Association had recovered in the circuit court of said Cook county seven judgments for $202.50, $3,020.11, $7,942.89, $3,990.61, $9,883.33, $4,031.84 and $5,031.35, and costs of suit, respectively all of said judgments being against the said Fanton R. Lawlor, upon each of which said judgments a writ of fiat facias in due form had been duly issued out of and under the seal of, the proper court, and delivered to the said defendant on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1890, and all of the said nine executions in favor of the said Nano Murphy, E. W. Price, and the Hibernian Banking Association for the respective sums above mentioned were on said 8th day of January, A. D. 1890, duly levied by the defendant tion for five years, the lien will be lost. Slocomb v. Blackburn (1867) 18 Ark. 369.

Delay in sale may of itself be sufficient to defeat the lien if for an unreasonable time although not coupled with the other fact of leaving the property in the debtor's possession.

Suffering the levy to remain without proceeding on it, term after term, will raise a presumption that it was intended as a cover which will postpone the lien. Corlies v. Stanbridge (1835) 5 Rawle, 236.

Leaving property in the possession of the debtor without sale for a period of eight years will render the writ dormant. Lewis v. Smith (1815) 2 Serg. & R. 142.

A delay for three years to enforce a sale will postpone the lien. Deposit Bank of Cynthiana v. Berry (1867) 2 Bush, 236.

Doty v. Turner (1811), 8 Johns, 20, recognized the rule that delay in effecting a sale will postpone the lien.

But there are some courts which hold that mere delay or acquiescence in delay unless for an unreasonable time will not postpone the execution.

Mere granting a delay in effecting the sale will not postpone the execution, if the execution is not kept up, merely by color and for fraudulent purposes. Sterling v. Van Cleve (1881) 12 N. J. L. 327.

Mere acquiescence of an execution creditor in delay of a sheriff in selling under an execution where the creditor does not direct such delay, does not render execution dormant as to subsequent ones. Thompson v. Van Vechten (1857) 5 Abb. Pr. 453.

Mere surfeance will not defeat the lien. McCoy v. Reed (1836) 5 Watts, 302.

In Howell v. Alkyn (1830) 2 Rawle, 233, it is held that the only ground for postponing an execution is fraud. The judge delivering the opinion denies the ruling of Berry v. Smith, that if the plaintiff directs the sheriff to delay the sale one day, he avoids his levy as much as for a year. The judge states that the practice in England is not applicable to this country and that there are many cases in which a reasonable delay may be beneficial to all concerned, in which mere delay cannot be considered fraudulent.

In Locke v. Coleman (1825) 2 T. R. Mon. 12, 15 Am. Dec. 118, the court was asked to instruct that if the execution was held up an unreasonable time after the levy before a sale was effected the sale could not be enforced as against leases taken subsequently to the levy, but the court refused to do so and was upheld by the appellate court, which said when an officer has once levied he may sell at any time and the lien continues until he does sell, but it does not appear from the case by what authority the sale was postponed.

Conflicting instructions as to the order of sale which result in a delay in the advertisement of only one day will not result in a postponement of execution. Childs v. Dilworth (1833) 44 Pa. 123.

But if the enforcement of an execution levy has been delayed for an unreasonable time, a third person has a right to presume that it has been abandoned. Cook v. Clemens (1888) 87 Ky. 566.

The lien may be lost if the plaintiff is guilty of gross laches in not having the property sold in a reasonable time. Conway v. Jett (1833) 8 Yerg. 453, 24 Am. Dec. 590.

Permitting a levy to be dormant for three years and eight months before taking proceedings to enforce a sale under it will displace it. Patterson v. Fowler (1861) 23 Ark. 470.

Temporary postponement.

A mere stay of execution without fraud will not destroy the levy. State v. Records (1848) 5 Harr. (Del.) 147.

In Hyman v. Hubbs (1874) 71 N. C. 424, it was held upon the goods and chattels mentioned in the plaintiffs' declaration, contained in two separate stores, a mile distant from each other, which said goods and chattels were at usual invoice prices, worth the sum of $62,000 to $65,000.

8. That the said defendant duly advertised to sell said goods and chattels pursuant to law, under said writs of ieri facias, in favor of said Nano Murphy, said E. W. Price and the Hibernian Banking Association, on the 22d day of January, A. D. 1890, but postponed said sale, first, to the 29th day of January, A. D. 1890, again to the 8th day of February, A. D. 1890, again to the 11th day of February, A. D. 1890, and again to the 15th, and as to a part of said goods and chattels to the 15th day of February, A. D. 1890, on which two last-mentioned dates said defendant, after duly advertising, sold said goods and chattels at public sale, to the highest bidder, selling the stock of goods in each store in bulk as one lot, and realized as the proceeds of the same the sum of $42,000.

4. That said judgments and writs of ieri facias in favor of said Nano Murphy, E. W. Price, and said Hibernian Banking Association, were bona fide, and said writs of ieri facias were not taken out or used by the said Nano Murphy, E. W. Price, or said Hibernian Banking Association, or either of them, or by the said defendant, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding any of the creditors of said Fanton R. Lawlor, and, although said postponements of said sale, as made by the defendant, as aforesaid, were so made with the consent of the said Fanton R. Lawlor, and at the request of the said Nano Murphy, said E. W. Price, and said Hibernian Banking Association with the hope that Lawlor might make some arrangement with his creditors, and for his benefit, said postponements were reasonable and proper, under all the circumstances, and did not, in fact, in any manner, injure, delay, defraud, or hinder, or tend to injure, delay, defraud, or hinder the plaintiffs, or any other creditor or creditors of the said Fanton R. Lawlor, in the collection of their demands against him.

5. That at the time of the making of said sale of said goods and chattels, as aforesaid, the said judgments in favor of said Nano Murphy, said E. W. Price, and said Hibernian Banking Association, were in full force and effect, and there were due thereon, the amounts respectively for which said judgments had been rendered together with interest, as provided by law.

6. That the defendant in selling the same in two lots or parcels as aforesaid, acted in good faith, though under the direction of and indemnified by the Hibernian Banking Association, and obtained for said goods and chattels as large a price as could or would have been obtained had he divided said goods and chattels into smaller lots or parcels, and the said plaintiffs suffered no damage whatever by reason of said sale being made in the manner aforesaid.

7. That the proceeds of said sale of said goods and chattels, after deducting the legal that merely postponing the sale does not waive the lien as against a junior execution, where the owner of the latter had the right to proceed to sell notwithstanding such directions, and it is not shown that the property brought any lower price when the sale actually took place than it would have brought had the sale proceeded when advertised.

In Denton v. Woods (1897) 19 La. Ann. 353, it was held that merely to stay a sale would not permit a sale under a junior writ which would gain a valid title.

A postponement of sale for six days will not defeat a writ as against a second one coming to the hands of the sheriff two months after the expiration of the six days. Huber v. Schnell (1896) 1 Browne (Pa.) 18.

In United States v. Conyngham (1891) Wall. C. C. 173, it is ruled that the sale must be proceeded with as fast as is reasonable under the circumstances, and that where the execution of the writ is procrastinated by the connivance or privity of the party and in the interim another execution comes, he loses his preference.

The adjournment of the sale to a time before the return day of the writ will not postpone the lien. But an adjournment to a time beyond the return day, so that no sale could take place under the writ, will be equivalent to an indefinite postponement and will postpone the writ. Lantz v. Worthington (1846) 4 Pa. 153, 45 Am. Dec. 682.

Indefinite postponement.

Indefinite postponing of the sale will defeat the lien. McClure v. Ege (1888), 7 Watts, 74.

Preventing sale for three years during which time a third person bona fide purchases the property, will defeat the lien. Owens v. Patteson (1846) 6 B. Mon. 489, 44 Am. Dec. 730.

Directing the sheriff not to sell and permitting the execution to be returned and remain dormant for two and one-half years will displace the lien as against one who purchases the property from the debtor's administrators. State Bank v. Etter (1854) 15 Ark. 268.

An execution placed in the hands of a sheriff with instructions not to sell until further orders is not in his hands for any purpose known to the law. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. McCreary (1890) 65 Ala. 127.

Postponing the sale for eight months and leaving the property in the meantime in the possession of the debtor without bond will destroy the preference gained. Abertson v. Goldsby (1856) 23 Ala. 711, 65 Am. Dec. 380.

A man has a judgment for a just debt against A, and takes out a ieri facias and gets the sheriff to seize the goods but would not let him proceed further; B, who has a judgment for a just debt against A, takes out a ieri facias against him and the court ruled that he could seize the same goods, for the former was a fraudulent execution and the sheriff might very well return nulla bona upon it. Rice v. Serjeant (1708) 7 Mod. 37.

Leaving the property in the debtor's possession and directing the sheriff not to proceed to sell until further orders makes the execution dormant. Hickok v. Coates (1829) 2 Wend. 419, 20 Am. Dec. 632.

An instruction after the execution has been levied, to stop further proceedings, will render it fraudulent as against subsequent execution. Branch Bank at Montgomery v. Broughton (1148) 15 Ala. 127.

Instructing the officer to proceed no further after making the levy will be regarded as fraudulent. Hickman v. Caldwell (1834), 4 Rawle, 376, 27 Am. Dec. 274. In that case the court says that some of the statements in Howell v. Allyn, 2 Rawle, costs and charges of the defendant accruing from said levy and sale, were insufficient to satisfy the writs of feri facias, aforesaid, in favor of said Nano Murphy, said E. W. Price, and said Hibernian Banking Association, and accordingly the defendant applied said proceeds pro rata upon said writs and returned the same in part unsatisfied; and there being none of said proceeds remaining to be applied upon the writ of feri facias aforesaid, in favor of the plaintiffs, and the said defendant not having been able by due diligence to find any property of the said Fanton R. Lawlor, out of which he, the said defendant, could make the amount of said writ of feri facias in favor of the plaintiffs, or any portion thereof, duly returned said writ "No part satisfied."

Wherefore this court doth now find the said defendant and appellant not guilty of the wrongs and injuries in the declaration of the plaintiffs and appellees set forth.

Messrs. Weigley, Bulkley & Gray, for plaintiffs in error:

The stay of execution sale under the agreement between the parties gave priority to appellee's writ.

Property which requires delay.

Delaying of sale of growing wheat from the time of levy in December until it is ready for harvest in August, will not in itself amount to a fraud in law. Where the property seized was hides in a vat, which could not be sold for several months without great loss, the court held that postponing the sale did not render the execution dormant, saying: "We think that an execution cannot be considered dormant because it thus seeks to make the most of the property taken, though some little delay be the consequence." Power v. Van Buren (1837) 7 Cow. 560.

Land.

Since in most jurisdictions the judgment itself is a lien on land, the same rules do not necessarily apply as apply in cases of personalty. McLaughlin v. McLaughlin (1877) 85 Pa. 317.

The lien of the judgment may be enforced as against land although there was a delay for about twenty-six months after execution issued before sale was enforced and the property had been sold to a third person in the meantime. Harman v. May (1882) 40 Ark. 146.

But it has been held that a delay of sale for four years will defeat a lien on land in favor of purchasers. Allen v. Levy (1882) 59 Miss. 613.

Effect as to debtors.

The execution may be good against the debtor, notwithstanding delay. Arrington v. Sledge (1890) 13 N. C. 869.

The suspension of the sale will not affect the validity of the writ as against defendant or his heirs. McKeel v. Larkin (1882) 31 Ark. 423.

Mere delay will not defeat the execution as to the representatives of the debtor after his death. Barber v. Peay (1876) 31 Ark. 363.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The 87th section of the Statute in relation to practice in courts of record provides that, when any final determination shall be made by the appellate court as the result, wholly or in part, of a finding of the facts concerning the matter in controversy different from the finding of the court from which the cause was brought by appeal or writ of error, it shall be the duty of the appellate court to recite in its final order, judgment, or decree the facts so found, and the judgment of the appellate court shall be final and conclusive as to all matters of fact in controversy in such cause. In this case, the appellate court has found the facts upon which its judgment is based, and has recited those facts in its final judgment, and it is insisted that recital is conclusive in this court as to all the facts in the case.

It is urged, however, with much earnestness that the section of the statute here referred to is not applicable to this case, for the reason that there was not, either in the appellate court or in the trial court, any substantial controversy as to the material facts, and that the judgment of the appellate court therefore was not and could not have been the result, either wholly or in part, of any finding of facts different from the finding of the trial court, but only of a difference of opinion between the two courts as to the legal consequences of facts about which there was really no controversy.

It must be admitted that the power of the appellate court to find and recite the facts in such way as to make its recital the exclusive evidence of what the facts in controversy are, is purely statutory, and can be exercised only in those cases to which the statute applies. And there seems to be much reason for the contention that, where the facts are not really in controversy, there can be no occasion for the appellate court to find and recite them in its final judgment. In such case, its determination cannot, in the nature of things, result from a difference between its finding and that of the trial court as to the facts, and consequently no case is presented which is within either the letter or intention of the statute.

It is urged in this case that the practical objection to accepting the recital of facts found in the final judgment of the appellate court, instead of taking them as they appear in the record of the trial court, arises, not so much from any inaccuracy in the recitals of the appellate court, so far as they go, but from the omission, as the plaintiffs insist, of various material and undisputed facts which appeared before the trial court. If, then, the findings of the appellate court are to be taken as the final, plenary and conclusive recital of all the facts in the case, it is insisted that the plaintiffs will now be deprived of the benefit of the omitted facts, though proved at the trial and not controverted.

But while we are disposed to think that there is much force in the contention, we are inclined to base our decision solely upon the facts as recited in the judgment of the appellate court. It appears from that recital that the nine executions in favor of the Hibernian Banking Association, Nano Murphy, and E. W. Price were placed in the hands of the defendant, as sheriff, January 8, 1890; that on the same day, the defendant levied those executions upon the two stocks of goods in question; that he advertised the same for sale on January 22, 1890, but postponed the sale to January 29, and again to February 8, and again to February 11, and finally to February 18, at which last-mentioned date the Wabash avenue stock of goods was sold, the Blue Island avenue stock being sold, after similar postponements, on February 15. It was further recited, in substance, that these several postponements of the sales were made as aforesaid by the defendant, with the consent of the execution debtor, and at the request of the plaintiffs in the executions, with the hope that the execution debtor might make some arrangements with his creditors, and for his benefit.

On the 5th day of February, which was pending the postponement from January 29 to February 8, the execution of the plaintiffs in this suit came into the hands of the defendant, as sheriff and the question is, whether at that date, the senior executions were, or thereafter became, as against the junior execution, dormant, so as to give to the junior execution priority of lien.

The theory upon which it is claimed that the senior executions became dormant is, that the several postponements of the sale, made as they were at the request of the execution creditors, for the benefit of the execution debtor, and for the purpose of aiding him in making some arrangement with his creditors, constituted an employment of the writs for an object inconsistent with their nature, and were such a perversion of them from their legitimate purpose, as rendered them fraudulent and void, as against other creditors.

It is true the appellate court found, as a matter of fact, that the senior executions were not taken out or used by the plaintiffs therein or by the sheriff, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding any of the creditors of the execution debtor, and that the postponements of the sale were reasonable and proper, under the circumstances, and did not in fact in any manner injure or tend to injure, delay, defraud, or hinder the plaintiffs in the junior execution, or any other creditor of the execution debtor, in the collection of their demands against him. If the present case is one in which the appellate court was required by the statute to find the facts and recite the same in its final judgment it must of course be conceded that this finding is conclusive that in the several postponements of the sale there was no fraud in fact, that is to say there was no actual intention on the part of the plaintiffs in the senior executions or of the sheriff, to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors, and that the postponements of the sale did not in fact have that effect. But it is clear that the finding of the appellate court upon the question whether the use made of the executions was fraudulent can be given no effect beyond this. Whether there was fraud in law, that is to say, whether fraud resulted as a legal consequence or conclusion from the postponements of the sale, made in the manner and for the purposes above stated, is a legal question, in respect to which the findings of the appellate court can have no binding effect in this court.

Does the law then, from the facts as found, imply such fraud as must be held to be sufficient to postpone the senior executions to the lien of the junior creditors? The general doctrine applicable to this subject is stated by Freeman, in his Treatise on Executions, as follows: "An execution and its lien may be avoided by such conduct on the part of the plaintiff as shows an improper use of his writ, though the motives influencing such conduct, instead of being fraudulent, were grounded in kindness and charity toward the defendant, and free from the slightest design to injure others. The only proper use of an execution is to enforce the collection of a debt, and to enforce it with a considerable degree of diligence. To employ it for other objects is inconsistent with its nature, and such a perversion from its legitimate purposes as brings upon it the penalty prescribed by the Statute of Elizabeth. The plaintiff in execution may desire to allow the defendant time in which to make payment, and yet may wish to save himself from all hazard arising from his delay to enforce collection of his judgment. He is likely, therefore, to take out execution with a view of binding defendant's property, but with no intent to make any immediate levy or sale. In other words, he seeks to convert an execution into a mere mortgage. This the law will not tolerate." 1 Freeman, Executions, § 206. And again: "The lien of an execution is designed to assist the plaintiff while he is seeking to enforce the writ. If at any time he is shown not to be seeking such enforcement, then, during such time, he is without any execution lien, and is liable to lose the benefit of his writ through the sale or incumbrance of the defendant's property, or by the operation of a junior writ. He cannot avoid this result by showing that his intentions were meritorious, or that he knew of no other creditors. Whenever, by the plaintiff's orders, or by agreement between him and the defendant, the execution of the writ is suspended, by directions not to levy, or, after levy, by directions not to sell, whether such directions are permanent in their nature, or designed to operate only until further orders are given, then, according to the decided preponderance of the authorities, the lien is also suspended, and the execution becomes dormant." Ibid.

In Gilmore v. Davis, 84 Ill. 487, this court stated the rule as follows: "We believe the doctrine to be, as the object of an execution is to obtain satisfaction of the judgment on which it issues, on its delivery to the proper officer, it gives to the creditor a priority, because the law imposes the duty upon the officer to execute it without delay. Any act of the creditor, therefore, diverting the execution from this purpose, renders it inoperative against other creditors, and clothes them with priority." In that case, an execution was placed in the hands of the officer with instructions not to levy until further orders, and it was held to be subordinate to another execution afterwards issued to the officer with instructions to proceed at once. In Ross v. Weber, 26 Ill. 221, a judgment creditor entered into an agreement with his debtor to stay his execution, and it was held that the execution thereby became dormant, and that the creditor lost the lien acquired by his levy.

But an execution does not become dormant or fraudulent by the mere indulgence or negligence of the sheriff. "The concurrence of the plaintiff is necessary to produce that result, and if the delay in proceeding under an execution arises from the orders of the party by whom it has been issued, or from collusion with him, such delay will render the execution fraudulent and void as against all other creditors of the defendant." Murfree, Sheriffs, § 536. See also, Eberle v. Mayer, 1 Rawle, 366; Com. v. Stremback, 3 Rawle, 841, 24 Am. Dec. 851; Hickman v. Caldwell, 4 Rawle, 376, 27 Am. Dec. 274; Kellogg v. Griffin, 17 Johns. 274; Berry v. Smith, 3 Wash. C. O. 60; Koren v. Roemheld, 6 Ill. App. 275; Baldwin v. Freydenhall, 10 Ill. App. 106.

The application of these rules to the present case must result, we think, in the conclusion that, at the time the junior execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff the senior executions were dormant so as to give priority to the junior writ. The postponements of the sale from time to time do not seem to have been made by the sheriff for want of bidders, nor in the exercise by him of the discretion which the law vested in him in matters of that character, but they were all made as the result of the interference by the creditors in the due execution of their writs, and at their express request, and for objects inconsistent with the nature and purposes of the writs. On that subject, as we have already seen, the appellate court found the fact to be, that all these postponements of the sale were made by the sheriff, at the request of the plaintiffs in the executions, and for the benefit of the execution debtor, and with the hope that the debtor might make some arrangement with his creditors that such use of the writs constituted a perversion of them from their legitimate purposes seems to us too plain to admit of serious doubt. Action under them was postponed from time to time for the mere purpose of giving the debtor an opportunity to negotiate with his other creditors, in such a way as to secure from them some compromise or other advantage. This manifestly was not a purpose for which the writs could be legitimately used.

It matters not that the creditors were actuated by motives of kindness or leniency to their debtor, or that they had no actual intention to hinder or defraud other creditors, nor is it a controlling circumstance that the various postponements of the sale did not, as a matter of fact, hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors. Fraud arises from such abuse of the writs as a legal conclusion and the consequence which the law imposes is, to give to a junior execution coming into the hands of the sheriff during the pendency of such postponements a preference over the writs used for such fraudulent purpose.

The senior creditors having thus lost their priority the sheriff, in distributing the proceeds of the sale of the goods, should have satisfied the junior execution first, and sufficient money having been realized to more than satisfy that execution, his return that he could find no property of the execution debtor with which to satisfy it was a false return which entitled the plaintiffs therein to recover from him the amount of their judgment and costs.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the superior court was justified by the facts, and the judgment of the Appellate Court will accordingly be reversed, and the judgment of the Superior Court will be affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

PITTSBURG & HOMESTEAD ELECTRIC STREET R. CO., Appl.

1. Not more than one street railway franchise upon the same highway can be given under a statute authorizing the incorporation of street railway companies only for the construction and operation of a street railway on a street or highway "upon which no track is laid, or authorized to be laid, or to be extended under any existing charter."

2. An actual corporate existence clothed with a legal right to build a railroad being a fundamental condition of permission to occupy a highway for that purpose, permission nominally granted to a company not yet legally in existence cannot become effective on its incorporation, at least as against a company previously chartered which with reasonable promptness obtains a later grant of permission to use the same road.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The subject of contention in this case is the right of the plaintiff to occupy, with its railway, a part of the public road in Mifflin township between Pittsburgh and Homestead. Both the parties are electric street railway companies. In the bill the plaintiff asked for an injunction to restrain the de-defendant from the construction of any electric road upon the part of the highway in question, and also to restrain any interference by the defendant with the construction of the plaintiff's road. The learned court below decreed that the plaintiff had a right to construct its railway on the highway, but that its rights were not exclusive, and the defendant was also entitled to construct its railway upon the same highway. Each of the litigants held a permissive grant from the township authorities. The order of the charters and grants of permission is as follows: The defendant obtained its charter November 16, 1898, and the municipal consent on December 19, 1898. The plaintiff obtained its charter November 29, 1898, and a municipal consent was granted on November 20, 1898; the grantees therein named being "The Homestead Street-Railway Company." The defendant challenges the validity of this grant, as there was no such company in existence when the grant was made. It will be perceived, therefore, that one main subject of contention is whether there may be two, or rather more than one, grants of franchise to construct street passenger railways on the same public highway. Both of these companies were chartered under the General Law of May 14, 1889 (Pub. Laws, 211). The authority for the charters is conferred by the first section of the act, and its language is as follows: "Be it enacted that any number of persons, not less than five, may form a company for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a street railway on any street or highway upon which no track is laid, or authorized to be laid, or to be extended under any existing charter with the privilege of occupying so much of any street, used or authorized to be used under any existing charter, as is hereinafter provided, for public use in the conveyance of passengers by any power other than by locomotive."

We have reached the conclusion that there can be but one street-railway franchise upon the same highway, under this statute. The express words of the act limit the right of incorporation to one railway only. The purpose of the act is expressed in its title to be "to provide for the incorporation and government of street-railway companies in this commonwealth." A reading of the whole act shows that the incorporation of street-railway companies, and their government, was the entire purpose and object of the act. The earlier sections provide for the manner of accomplishing the organization, and define the powers and privileges of the corporations. The fourth section confers authority to construct extensions and branches, provided "that no extension or branch shall be constructed on any street or highway upon which a track is laid or authorized under any existing charter, except as hereinafter provided." The fourteenth section confers a right to use portions of the tracks of other companies already laid, when it is necessary to construct a circuit upon its own road at the end thereof, but the extent of such use is limited to 500 feet, and compensation must be paid for the privilege. By the fifteenth section it is provided that no street passenger railway shall be constructed by any company incorporated under the act, within the limits of any city, borough, or township, without the consent of the local authorities thereof. The seventeenth section provides that any company may ascertain and define such route as they may deem expedient upon any turnpike, not, however, exceeding width for two tracks to be laid upon such turnpike, and thereupon to lay down a track or tracks for its use in the transaction of its business, but making compensation therefor in the manner provided by the act. By the nineteenth section it is provided that street passenger railway companies shall have the right to the street, and any willful obstruction of the passage of the cars shall be punishable by fine, upon conviction. We think it apparent that all of these sections are inconsistent with the exercise of more than one railway franchise on the same street. The language of the first section expressly limits even the right of incorporation to such companies only as are formed "for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a street railway on any street or highway upon which no track is laid, or authorized to be laid, or to be extended under any existing charter;" that is, the statutory power of incorporation can only be executed in favor of a company which will construct and operate a railway on a street or highway upon which "no track is laid or authorized to be laid" under any existing charter. There can be but one meaning to these words, and that is, if a track is already laid, or even authorized to be laid, on the proposed street or highway, then there can be no incorporation of such company. It cannot come into existence, and, as a matter of course, if a charter should be obtained, in such circumstances, it would be simply nugatory,—it could confer no power in hostility with the law of its creation. It seems to us there can be no more convincing proof than this; that it is the settled, fixed, established policy of the commonwealth, as determined by this legislation, that there shall not be more than one lawfully authorized street passenger railway track laid upon the same street or highway at one time. There are manifest reasons why such a policy should prevail, though it is not necessary to look for them. These railways are authorized to be laid upon the public highways of the commonwealth. Those highways are for the use of the whole public,—all the citizens of the commonwealth, in all its territorial extent. This use is of the broadest and most comprehensive character, embracing, as it does, all the purposes of free and unobstructed passage for the persons, the vehicles, the animals, and other property of the citizens at all times. Now, it is not thought inconsistent with this right to confer a right to a special mode of transit by means of street cars and railway tracks on the highways, because they tend to facilitate, rather than obstruct, public travel. But it is very easy to see how the right of the general public to free and unobstructed travel may become most seriously impaired if there should be an unlimited right to occupy the streets and highways of the commonwealth with railway tracks. Even one track becomes, at times, especially in our large towns and cities, an obstruction to travel. The great bulk of public travel is off, and not on, our street cars. In the crowded thoroughfares, particularly where the streets are constantly occupied by horses and carriages, heavy wagons, carts, drays, omnibuses, and other vehicles, a duplication of street-car tracks would be an intolerable burden and a most serious obstruction. Even on country roads, where travel is much less, the traveled part of the roads is so much narrower than in the cities and towns that the obstruction would be felt quite as severely as in the streets of the cities. It is a very proper inference, therefore, that when the legislature prohibited, in the fundamental law of street railways, the laying of more than one track upon one street or highway, it was for the purpose of preventing the obstruction of travel on the highways of the commonwealth. The fourth section of the Act contains the same prohibition in relation to extensions and branches as is imposed by the first as to the original structure. In a negative sense, the fourteenth section, by giving the right to make a circuit by occupying a distance of 500 feet of the track of any other company, recognizes the same principle of the nonoccupancy of the highway by more tracks than one. The fifteenth section, by imposing upon the street-railway companies the duty of obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities to the occupancy of their streets, placed it within the power of the local governments to absolutely prevent the obstruction of their streets by refusing their consent to such occupancy; so that, if a second occupation should be proposed, the authorities could stop it immediately by simply refusing their consent. There would be little use for such a right of refusal, if it was the purpose of the act to empower as many railway companies as could obtain charters to lay their tracks upon streets already occupied. The seventeenth section, which authorizes the occupancy of turnpikes by street-railway companies upon making compensation, expressly prohibits the laying of more than a double track; thereby implying that two tracks at most, and those belonging to the same company, should be tolerated on the same highway. We conclude the reading of the act by declaring that its manifest and consistent purpose is to prevent the occupancy of the public highways by more than the track or tracks of one street-railway company.

Some contention is made that by the expression, "under any existing charter," is meant only charters existing at the date of the passage of the act. But this proposition is so manifestly untenable that it deserves only a passing notice. The plain reading of the language of the section proves conclusively that the exclusive words, "upon which no track is laid or authorized to be laid," relate to the time of proposed incorporation, for they prohibit the incorporation of such a company. How can a company be incorporated years after the passage of the act, if there was no outstanding charter, or track actually laid, at the date of the act, and yet there were such a prior charter or track laid, after the date of the act, but before the application for incorporation? The act would be senseless if it meant to permit the incorporation of a company notwithstanding the presence of a recent track, or the existence of a recent charter granted after the date of the act, and yet prohibited incorporation if the track or the charter existed when the act was passed. We hold, therefore, that the time of which the act speaks is the time of proposed incorporation, and that such incorporation is prohibited if then, at that time, there is a track laid or an outstanding authority for a track.

Assuming, then, that incorporation is prohibited, if at the time it is sought there is a track down or any outstanding authority to lay a track, the practical question here is, Which of these litigant companies is subject to that prohibition? It is certain that on November 16, 1898, when the defendant company sought and obtained its charter, there was no track laid, and it is equally certain that there was no outstanding authority residing in the plaintiff to lay a track, for the simple, but conclusive, reason that the plaintiff company had at that time no corporate existence. It had not even the municipal consent, although unincorporated, because that consent was not given until November 20, and it could not possibly antedate the day of its birth, and have a prenatal efficacy to prevent the defendant's otherwise lawful incorporation. But the municipal consent alone could not suffice to create a right to lay a track, without being joined with a corporate existence possessing a proper franchise. Whether such a consent might be joined to a subsequent incorporation is perhaps immaterial to consider, because, whether it could or not, it could not operate to debar or to defeat a prior incorporation, granted when there was neither corporate existence nor municipal consent residing with the plaintiff.

We consider the subject too plain for a prolonged argument. Of course, the prior incorporation of the defendant being perfectly valid, a reasonable time must be conceded in which to obtain municipal consent; and this was so proceeded with that on the 19th December, barely a month after the charter was obtained, full municipal consent was given, and an important contract executed, regulating the construction of the road between the municipality and the defendant company. The chronological situation, therefore, suffices for all the legal needs of the defendant in the acquisition and assertion of its prior right. But there is no lack of logical or legal precision in holding that, in any point of view with which the plaintiff is concerned, there was a real authorization of the defendant company to lay a track prior to the grant of the plaintiff's charter, or even to the application for it. The plaintiff's articles of association were not signed or attested until November 21, 1898, and the proceeding for incorporation was not completed until the 29th, while the defendant's proceeding was completed on the 16th. Now, the charter of the defendant company fully authorized the laying of a track over the disputed highway. The source of such authority is not the municipality, but the commonwealth, through its enabling legislation, in this case the Act of 1889. The municipal consent is an incident, essential, it is true, but necessarily of subsequent occurrence. So far as incorporation is concerned, the authorization to lay the track is complete when the charter is obtained. Therefore, both when the plaintiff's municipal consent was obtained (granting that it could be obtained prior to actual incorporation, which is more than doubtful), and also when its charter of incorporation was sought and obtained, there was a previously authorized charter right to lay the track in question, which was followed up with the necessary municipal consent immediately thereafter. This being so, the plaintiff's right to incorporation was posterior in time to the defendant's, and was subject to the prohibition of the statute; hence it cannot be set up against the defendant's prior right, which was unaffected by the prohibition of the statute. We hold, therefore, (1) that the defendant was legally authorized to lay a track on the disputed highway at the time of the plaintiff's application for a charter; (2) that the defendant obtained the municipal consent to lay the track within a reasonable time after the grant of its charter, and therefore consummated its legal right by the speedy acquisition of the municipal consent; (3) that the plaintiff was subject to the prohibition of the statute at the time of its application for a charter, and could not acquire a right to occupy the disputed highway with a track in hostility with the previously acquired right of the defendant; (4) the municipal consent granted on November 20, 1893, to a grantee designated as "The Homestead Street-Railway Company," could not defeat in any degree the previously acquired right of the defendant company, nor could it be joined to a subsequent incorporation so as to have such effect. We say this without saying, or intending to say, that in no circumstances could a previously granted municipal consent be acquired by a subsequently incorporated company. It may be that, on the principle of ratification or adoption, all parties consenting, and no intervening rights being affected, such a combination might be accomplished; but we do say that it cannot be done to defeat an opposing right which was already initiated and perfected, so far as the law permitted, at a time anterior to both the municipal consent and the subsequent incorporation of the opposing claimant. The municipal consent, of itself, can confer no right. The municipality has no power to confer the franchise. But it is the franchise, and that alone, which gives the legal right to build the railway. When the franchise is granted, authority is conferred to lay the track, and it can then truly be said that the laying of a track is authorized. Municipal consent is only essential to the execution of the authority, not at all to its creation. Definitely, and in this case, we do say, therefore, that the municipal consent set up by the plaintiff has no validity as against the defendant. No corporation of the plaintiff's name, vested with authority to lay any track over this disputed highway, was in existence at the time of the grant; and, as no other than that kind of a body could receive such a grant, the attempt of the supervisors of Mifflin township to give consent to the plaintiff to lay a track on the highway in question, by their resolution of November 20, 1893, was a void act, and ineffective for any purpose. The language of the fifteenth section is: "No street passenger railway shall be constructed by any company incorporated under this act within the limits of any city, borough, or township, without the consent of the local authorities thereof." It is manifest at a glance that only a "company incorporated under this act" could construct a passenger railway within the limits of the township, and hence a grant of permission to lay the track could only be made to such a company. But the company had no existence when the grant was made, and was therefore not competent to accept it. On the contrary, when the grant of permission was made to the defendant, it had a full corporate existence, and was clothed with legislative authority to lay the track in question.

The Act of 1889 is of such recent origin that cases involving the question at issue have not heretofore arisen, and there is, therefore, an entire absence of authorities directly upon the subject we are now considering. There is, however, some analogy in cases of steam railroad construction. Thus, in the case of New Brighton & N. O. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh, Y. & C. R. Co., 105 Pa. 13, the two contending companies were duly incorporated with authority to construct a railroad along Big Beaver river between defined points. Each company claimed to have adopted a survey and location of a route made by engineers before either company was incorporated, and the contest was, Which had the prior right to the location at points of interference? The present chief justice, delivering the opinion, said: "It thus appears that the first act of each company, looking to the location of its line, was the adoption by mere resolution of a survey and location made before either of them came into existence, by parties who, respectively, had no authority to survey, locate or construct a railroad on the route in question. The first location actually made on the ground, after the incorporation of either company, was that made by appellant, as above stated. It is too clear for argument that neither of the surveys thus made, prior to the incorporation of either company, by parties having no authority to locate or construct a railroad on the route in question, could, in and of themselves, confer any right to the location in dispute." After stating that the question in dispute turned upon the construction of the General Act of 1868, authorizing the creation of railroad companies by voluntary articles of association, and pointing out the authority of companies organized under that law, the opinion proceeds: "The provisions of the act are clear and explicit. Every railroad company is created for a purpose that is essentially public, and to that end it is clothed with a right of eminent domain. . . . It is expressly authorized to survey, mark, and determine the route of its road between the points designated in its charter, and to enter upon and occupy all lands on which its road may be so located. . . . In thus exercising the right of appropriating to public use the lands of private individuals, it is necessary, in the first place, to survey, locate, and designate by appropriate marks, the property to be taken. It was undoubtedly intended that these essential acts upon the ground should be performed, not by the projectors of a railroad company before its incorporation, nor by any one not authorized by the legislature to do so, but only by the president and directors of a duly incorporated company, their engineers and employes. Indeed, the act expressly authorizes them to do so, but is silent as to the right of all others. No such thing as a wholesale adoption, by mere resolution, of an unauthorized preliminary survey and location, appears to have been contemplated. The foregoing principles were reaffirmed, and again enforced, in an exhaustive opinion by our Brother Williams in the case of Williamsport & N. B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co., 141 Pa. 407, 12 L. R. A. 220, in which we held that nothing but an actual location and appropriation, after incorporation, would suffice to confer title to the route of a railroad. Applying this doctrine to the present contention, it will be perceived that the subject of controversy is the right to locate and construct a railway track upon the bed of a public road in Mifflin township. The plaintiff, not denying the prior charter right of the defendant to occupy the same road with its track, alleges that a grant of permission by the authorities of the township was made to it before a similar grant of permission was made to the defendant; and claims that the prior permission granted to itself, after its charter right had come into existence by the organization, which it completed on November 29, 1898, became effectively attached thereto, so as to confer title to the location by priority of right. In point of fact, the plaintiff had no corporate existence until November 29, 1898, and did not do any act, by acceptance of the permission, or by any resolution of adoption, at any time before December 19, 1898, when the municipal authorities made a direct grant of permission to the defendant company in its corporate capacity. The situation, then, is that the defendant held both a prior chartered right to occupy the street, and a full municipal permission to do so, granted after it became incorporated, while the plaintiff held a chartered right subsequent to that of the defendant, and no grant of permission from the municipal authorities to itself as a corporation. Now, the disputed question being the right to build the railway on a particular street, which company had the prior right? The plaintiff seeks to make out a complete prior right in itself, by the aid of a grant of permission made when it had no existence as a corporation. Independently of the reply to this contention, which grows out of the prior charter of the defendant, which at least authorized the building of the railway, it is apparent, from the foregoing decisions, that the grant of permission of November 20th was ineffective to confer any right to the location, because it was not made to anybody competent to build the road. Although the grant was made nominally to a grantee called "The Homestead Street-Railway Company," there was no such company in existence, and therefore no party competent to build the road. But, if there was no competency to build the road, there was none to accept the grant of the municipal permission to build it. The municipal authorities had no power whatever to confer a franchise to build upon any corporation, and, of course, not upon any individuals. Now, although in the above-cited cases the right to build the road carried with it the power of eminent domain to the contending companies, thereby authorizing the taking of private property, we can see no difference in principle between those cases and this. The fundamental condition is the same in both, to wit, an actual corporate existence, clothed with a legal right to build a railroad. In the cited cases there was a complete actual survey and location by both of an actual route on the ground, but because it was made before incorporation, although by the agents and employes of the persons who subsequently became incorporated, it was held entirely ineffective, although in one of the cases there was a formal adoption by the company after incorporation; and it was so held because the thing to be done, to wit, the location and building of a railroad, could not be done except by an incorporated company. But the Act of 1889 is just as imperative upon this subject as the Act of 1868. Both require an actual incorporation, because the franchise is only conferred upon chartered companies, and the administrative acts authorized to be done must all be done by the actual corporate body. The case of Larimer & L. Street R. Co. v. Larimer Street R. Co., 187 Pa. 588, does not raise the question involved here, and was not decided upon any point applicable to this. The defendant there had both a chartered right to build the road, and also the municipal consent given to itself in its corporate capacity. The plaintiff had a prior chartered right, but it had no municipal consent at all, the same having been applied for, but flatly refused. The case was decided upon the point that the plaintiff, being without any municipal consent, had no standing to be heard. The question whether a consent given prior to incorporation could become effective was not in the case, and did not arise. Nor did the other question arise, whether a prior chartered right, followed speedily and within a reasonable time by full municipal consent, would be legally prior to a subsequent charter preceded by a municipal consent granted before incorporation. These are both new questions, which require decision upon their own merits. Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the defendant company has priority of right to occupy the highway in question, and that its right of occupancy is exclusive as against the plaintiff. Of course, we do not agree that there may be concurrent rights of construction upon the same highway in both companies.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania v.

(166 Pa. 89.)

1. A contract by which an article is left with a person for a certain time for the payment of certain amounts per week, the aggregate of which for the time equals the price of the article, and which provides that the article may be purchased at any time by paying the price upon which all rents paid shall be credited, is a sale and not a lease.

2. The peddling of the separate articles after the package in which they were shipped from other states has been broken may lawfully be regulated under the police power of a state.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment now appealed from rests on three distinct findings of fact made by the learned judge of the court below. These are: First, that the defendant was engaged in April, 1894, in the business of selling clocks in Allegheny county; second, that he made his sales, not as a merchant having a place of business, but as a peddler, going from house to house, and exposing his clocks for sale in the homes he had invaded; and, third, that he was in so doing violating the Act of February 6, 1830 (Pub. Laws, 39), as he had no license authorizing him to sell clocks. These findings have not the conclusive effect of a verdict, but they are entitled to great weight and will not be disturbed unless plain error is shown.

As to the second and third findings no serious question is raised. It is conceded that the defendant had no license under the Act of 1830, and it is not denied that he carried his clocks from house to house, and disposed of them wherever he could bring a possible customer to buy.

The first finding is attacked on the allegation that the defendant did not sell clocks, but let them for hire, and that the persons who took them were bailees, and not purchasers. In support of this position the written agreement made with customers was relied on. It provided that the American Wringer Company rents one clock for the term of thirteen months, at the rent of 25 cents per week, or $13 for the term; and the lessee may at any time during the term purchase the clock for the price of $13, and be allowed all rents as a credit on such purchase. Now, let it be conceded that this agreement may be enforced according to its terms between the parties, because it is their agreement; the question still remains, What is the legal effect as to the rights of creditors or the commonwealth? The rent and the price of the article are the same. The payment of the price passes the title to the purchaser. It was plain to the court below that the device of a lease was a cover for an actual sale, in violation of the Act of 1830, so thin as to be transparent. The justice of the peace before whom they were first brought testifies that the defendant admitted that he was selling clocks. The constable who arrested him testifies that he saw him going from house to house, peddling clocks. Maggie Tyrie, a witness, says he offered to sell a clock to her. She finally took it, and the paper relied on as a lease was produced, executed, and left with her as a receipt for the money paid. Two other witnesses testified that clocks were offered to them, to be paid for by monthly or weekly payments. G. H. Rishel, the general agent of the American Wringer Company at Pittsburgh, testified that the company was a corporation, created under the laws of Rhode Island; that the clocks were made in Connecticut, and sent to him in original packages. By him they were delivered to the road agents of the company, who sold them at retail, upon a commission. In answer to the question, "On what terms are they sold?" his answer was, "They are sold on monthly installments." This testimony clearly warranted the first finding of fact, viz., that the clocks were sold, and that the lease, or instrument so called, was a device contrived to evade the Act of 1880, and defeat its salutary provisions.

The findings of fact standing undisturbed, there is but one question left, and that a question of law. Is the Act of 1880 constitutional? It is not alleged that it violates any provision of the constitution of this state, but it is said that it violates the Constitution of the United States, because it interferes with interstate commerce. But how does it interfere with interstate commerce? It is a part of a system of police legislation beginning as early as 1784, directed against the business of peddling, because of the fraud and crime connected with it. The Act of 1784 (3 Smith's Laws, p. 99), in its preamble, recites the mischief requiring a remedy thus: "Whereas many idle and vagrant persons may come into this state, and under pretence of being hawkers and peddlers, may greatly impose upon many persons in the quality and price of goods, and also may commit felonies and other misdemeanors; for preventing such inconveniences and evil practices, and to the intent that no person may be admitted to follow the business of hawkers and peddlers within this state, but those who are of known honesty and civil behavior;" and then follow the provisions of the statute requiring proof of good moral character, and the payment of a license fee by the applicant. As new branches of this peripatetic commerce have sprung up, the legislature has extended the prohibition of the Act of 1784 to them. As early as 1880 the peddling of worthless clocks became an evil of sufficient magnitude to attract the attention of the legislature; and in that year the act now before us was passed, requiring all persons, resident or nonresident, desiring to embark in the business, to make proof before the court of quarter sessions of their good moral character, and to obtain a license authorizing them to peddle clocks. The purpose of the act was to secure some measure of protection for the citizens of the commonwealth against the frauds practiced upon them by strangers, who had no place of business in the state, and who, when wanted to answer for their cheats and crimes, were safely beyond the reach of process. This court has uniformly asserted the validity of such legislation as a reasonable and proper exercise of the police power, and we do not propose to travel over the argument again in this case.

It is urged that the act is a trade regulation, like the ordinance of Sayre borough, considered in Sayre v. Phillips, 148 Pa. 482, 16 L. R. A. 49. But this statute is not directed against certain persons engaged in peddling clocks. It is directed against all persons. It does not distinguish between the citizens of different subdivisions of this state, or between citizens of Pennsylvania and those of any other state. It is directed against the business of peddling clocks, by whomsoever undertaken. It does not, however, prohibit the business, but regulates it. The regulation is reasonable. It is impartial in its operation. It is general in its application. It meets the tests required by Millertown v. Bell, 128 Pa. 151; by Sayre v. Phillips, 148 Pa. 482, 16 L. R. A. 49; and by Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847. In the recent case of Titusville v. Brennan, 148 Pa. 642, 14 L. R. A. 100, the judgment of this court was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States (Brennan v. Titusville, 158 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719), on the ground that the ordinance upon which the prosecution rested was not a police, but a trade, regulation; but it was said in that case that, "by virtue of its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a state may provide for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons, and the protection of property so situated," subject to the qualification that a "subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to congress by the constitution is not within the police power of the state, unless placed there by congressional action." We submit with great respect that the control of no branch of retail trade has been confided exclusively to congress by the constitution, and that the interstate commerce clause was never intended to do more than keep the great channels of commerce open, and to guard against such obstructions as state custom houses, state inspections, state taxes, and the like, on goods passing from manufacturer or wholesaler in one state to retail dealer or consumer in another.

It must be conceded that these clocks may be sent into this state in manufacturers' packages, and they may be sold in the same packages, under the authority of the interstate commerce clause; but once in this state, and the package opened by the consignee, the disposition of the separate articles at retail is intrastate traffic, and subject to the police regulations that experience may show to be necessary for the protection of citizens in the comfort of their homes and the enjoyment of their property. To deny this power to the states, and to assert that the wandering and unscrupulous adventurers who buy their brass jewelry or worthless clocks on one side of a state line may, as agents of interstate commerce, invade any other state to cheat and defraud its citizens, is to degrade the whole subject, and to create needless friction between the general government and the people of the several states. It is suggested that these clocks, standing on the shelves of purchasers, belong to the Rhode Island corporation still. This overlooks the finding of the court below that they were sold. It overlooks the testimony of the general agent of the corporation, who says distinctly, "They were sold on monthly installments."

Finally, the general principle that penal statutes are to be strictly construed is appealed to, as a reason for reversing the judgment of the court below. We cannot see its applicability. The statute forbids the peddling of clocks. The defendant was fairly and properly convicted, on the evidence, of violating the statute. He did exactly that thing which the statute commanded him not to do. No matter how strictly the statute may be construed, he has been found guilty of violating it, and this finding is abundantly supported by the testimony. He should therefore suffer the penalty he has incurred.

If any vestiges of the police power of the states remain to them for the protection of the property or of the comfort of the people, we must think the statute now before us is a proper exercise of that power, and that the states do not invade the jurisdiction of congress when they seek to regulate a business conducted, in the language of the preamble to the peddler's act, by "idle and vagrant persons," and in a manner that does "greatly impose on many persons in the quality and price of goods," and which results in the commission by these irrepressible vagrants of "felonies and other misdemeanors." We cannot bring ourselves to doubt the validity of the Statute of February 6, 1880, or the justice of the conviction and judgment appealed from.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was the owner of a ferry-boat, William Thaw, plying between the lower part of Allegheny City and south side of the Ohio river. On 9th of February, 1892, the plaintiff, Dr. W. W. Sturgis, a practicing physician, drove on the boat in a light two-wheeled sulky, to be ferried from north to south side. The boat left the wharf, and was some distance from it, in the channel, when it was passed by a small tug-boat, the John Dippel, which, when near to the William Thaw, blew its steam whistle. This frightened the horses, of which there were a number on the ferry-boat. The entrance on the boat from the landing had been closed by a wooden rail or bar, to prevent frightened or unruly horses from backing vehicles off the boat, or from plunging over into the water. When frightened by the scream of the whistle, the horses commenced backing and plunging. The plaintiff was sitting in his sulky, the horse's head in the direction of the forward part of the boat, and the rear of the sulky not far from the crossbar which protected the entrance. In front of him was a two-horse team, which backed against plaintiff's horse. His horse then backed, turned almost around towards the outside of the boat, struck the crossbar with his shoulder, broke it, and plunged into the river with sulky and driver. The horse was drowned, the sulky lost, but the owner was rescued without sustaining any serious personal injury. He brought suit for loss of his horse and sulky against defendant, the owner of the ferry-boat, averring negligence in putting up and using a defective and insufficient crossbar to protect the owners of teams in traveling on the boat. The bar had been broken and spliced, to be used, temporarily, until a new one was procured. Several days before the accident, the inspector of hulls had called attention to the defective rail, and directed it should be replaced. The jury rendered a special verdict for plaintiff, in the sum of $865 damages, subject to the opinion of the court on the question whether the blowing of the whistle on the tug Dippel was the proximate cause of the accident, in the sense that the owner of the Thaw was not responsible, even if the guard bar or rail was defective. If so, then judgment to be entered for defendant, notwithstanding verdict for plaintiff. The court afterwards, in an opinion filed, entered judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict. From this defendant appeals.

While, as argued by appellant, the liability of a ferryman, under the facts in this case, was not exactly as great as that of a common carrier of goods, nevertheless, having undertaken to carry the plaintiff, with his horse and vehicle, for hire, his duty was to carry safely as against defects and insufficiency of his boat or neglect on part of himself and servants. At the same time, the plaintiff, the owner of the horse and sulky, assuming the care of them while on the boat, was bound to exercise ordinary watchfulness and skill to prevent loss or injury. Wyckoff v. Queens County Ferry Co. 52 N. Y. 32, 11 Am. Rep. 650. And, as is said in Clark v. Union Ferry Co. of Brooklyn, 35 N. Y. 485, 31 Am. Dec. 66: "They [the owners of the boat] are also required to be provided with all proper and suitable guards and barriers on the boat, for the security of the property thus carried, and to prevent damage from such casualties as it would be naturally exposed to, although ordinary care is required on the part of the traveler." In this last case, as here, a horse was lost while the owner was in the vehicle. It took fright, and backed against the chain which was used to close the entrance to the ferry deck. The chain broke, because of a defective hook in it. The ferry company was held answerable for negligence. To the same effect are Lewis v. Smith, 107 Mass. 384; Walker v. Jackson, 10 Mees. & W. 161.

Therefore, in view of the verdict, the single assignment of error for our consideration is the one urged that, even if the broken rail was defective, the proximate and controlling cause of the accident was the blowing of the tug whistle, for which defendant is not answerable, and that the court erred in not so instructing the jury. The question of negligence of defendant in not providing such a guard rail as ordinary care required, and the question of the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff in not getting from his sulky, and taking his horse by the head, and quieting him, were both fully and impartially submitted to the jury, and found against defendant. It seems to us, under the facts, the blowing of the whistle, although the originating cause of the injury, cannot relieve the defendant from liability. The cases cited and presented so concisely by the learned counsel for appellant are unanswerable when applied to the facts in them and even to facts as he assumes them to be in this issue, if some of the significant intermediate facts be not noticed. "The true rule is that the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence,—such a consequence as, under the surrounding circumstances of the case, might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrongdoer, and likely to flow from his act." West Mahanoy Twp. v. Watson, 112 Pa. 574, 56 Am. Rep. 886. To the same effect is Behling v. Southwest Pennsylvania Pipe Lines, 160 Pa. 359. And so all the cases cited on both sides, either expressly or by implication, rule.

Was the plunging of this frightened horse against the guard rail such a consequence as ought to have been foreseen by the owner of the ferry-boat? The primary cause of the plunging was the blowing of the whistle; but the primary is by no means always the natural and probable cause of the particular injury. It is not when there is a sufficient and independent cause between it and the injury. In such case resort must be had by the sufferer to the originator of the intermediate cause. As is said by Agnew, J., in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. 377, 21 Am. Rep. 100, the question is: "Was there a continuous succession of events, so linked together that they become a natural whole, or whether the chain of events is so broken that they become independent, and the final result cannot be said to be the natural and probable consequence of the primary cause." The primary, natural, and probable consequence of the blowing of the whistle was the fright of the horses, and their rearing and plunging. Any injury they might have done to each other, or those in charge of them on the boat, would not have been attributable to the owner of the ferry-boat, because that was the consequence of the primary cause,—the blowing of the whistle. But what is naturally to be expected from a frightened horse on the narrow circumscribed deck of a ferry-boat? Manifestly, that he will plunge off it into the water. This the ferry-boat owner, to a large extent, provided against by guard railing of sufficient strength all around the boat except at the one place,—the entrance; and here it was usually strong enough to prevent such an accident, but on this day was not. The horse plunged against the spliced and defective rail, which broke, and it went over. Here was an independent intermediate cause or omission of duty, without which, notwithstanding the primary cause, the injury would not have been suffered. And the jury, on sufficient evidence, have found defendant was negligent in maintaining a defective guard rail at that point. Says Appellton, Ch. J., in Moulton v. Sanford, 51 Me. 184: "Ordinarily, that condition is usually termed the 'cause' whose share in the matter is the most conspicuous, and is the most immediately preceding and proximate in the event." It does not help us much in the administration of justice to refine on the distinctions between "cause" and "condition" in bringing about results. Taking the case before us on its facts, it is not essentially different from Hey v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 44, 22 Am. Rep. 788. The plaintiff was driving his horse in a park maintained by the city for the use of the public. He was on a roadway fifty feet wide, which curved round the declivity very near a steam railroad, the high bank on the right of the roadway descending very abruptly to the Schuylkill river. At this side there was no barrier or railing. The horse took fright at a locomotive whistle on the railroad, plunged down the bank into the river, and was drowned. This court held it was for the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, it was negligence in the city not to have erected a proper barrier at such a point. If such omission were negligence, then that condition interposed between the originating cause—the blowing of the whistle—and the event, so as to constitute the negligent omission the efficient and proximate cause of the loss. To the same effect are Alger v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 402; Norris v. Litchfield, 35 N. H. 271, 69 Am. Dec. 546; Joliet v. Verley, 85 Ill. 68, 85 Am. Dec. 842.

The owner of the ferry-boat in this case, on whom was the duty of care according to the circumstances, ought to have foreseen such a result, because it was natural and probable, and have guarded against it by a sufficiently strong rail. The fact is he did foresee it, but negligently did not guard against it. His business was to ferry persons and vehicles across a navigable river, at a point where other water craft were constantly passing and repassing. When approaching each other, passing or crossing each other's path, signaling or warning by steam whistles is the settled custom. Whether any less startling signal might, with comfort and safety, have been adopted, has not yet been determined. It is now, and has been since the use of steam power, the recognized method of communication between steam vessels. He knew this, and could not have been ignorant of the fact that fright by a screeching whistle was a constant menace to the safety of the animals and those having them in charge on that boat. Horses will take fright at just such noises, especially in such a situation, penned up on a boat. That, when frightened, they would press against each other and the guard rails, he was bound to know, for he was bound to have such knowledge of his business as would enable him to conduct it with reasonable safety to the public, whose patronage he invited. If the blowing of a steam whistle by a passing vessel had been out of the ordinary course of things, or if it were out of the ordinary and usual habit of horses to take fright at such a sound, he would not have been expected to foresee and provide against such an accident. Ordinary care would not have required precaution against extraordinary contingencies. But, here, the breaking of the bar, by the pushing of a frightened horse against it, was the natural and probable consequence of putting such a defective bar there; and this was the negligence which, under the circumstances, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. The learned judge of the court below, in his opinion on the reserved point, has very clearly distinguished this from the cases cited, and claimed to establish the blowing of the whistle as the proximate cause.

The assignments of error are overruled; the judgment affirmed.

CERTIORARI to the District Court for Silver Bow County to review a judgment appointing a receiver for the Independent District Telegraph Company and the Citizens'

District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company. Dismissed.

Statement by DeWitt, J.:

This is a writ of certiorari directed to the district court to review its action in appointing a receiver of the properties of two of the relators, viz., the Independent District Telegraph Company and the Citizens' District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company, it being claimed by the relators that the district court acted in that matter without jurisdiction. The receiver was appointed in an action entitled as follows: "H. L. Haupt and E. A. Nichols, trustee, Plaintiffs, v. Independent District Telegraph Company, Citizens' District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company, Fred B. Puddington, H. Sommers, John O'Rourke, Thomas D. Butterfield, G. A. Lauzier, Alex. Johnson, and John Doe (whose true name is unknown), Defendants." The appointment was made upon the complaint in that case and upon affidavits filed. The following facts appear from the complaint:

Each of the companies defendant in the case in the district court (and who are relators here) is a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The plaintiff Haupt is owner of 76 shares of the stock of the Independent Company. The plaintiff Nichols, as trustee, is also owner of 76 shares of said company. The Independent Company is the owner of a franchise from the city of Butte permitting it to carry on the district messenger business, and granting to the company the use of the streets and alleys of the city for the purpose of said business. The Citizens' Company owns a similar franchise. On May 1, 1892, the said two companies entered into an agreement by which they should put their respective stocks, franchises, and property into a common business, to be carried on by officers and agents to be appointed by the two corporations jointly. This agreement was to run for twenty years. All moneys earned should go into a general fund, and be in the hands of a general treasurer. After paying expenses, a reserve fund of $500 was to accumulate in the hands of the treasurer. After paying expenses and the accumulation of this reserve, the profits were to be paid by the general treasurer to the respective corporation treasurers in the proportion of five ninths to the Independent Company, and four ninths to the Citizens' Company, to be distributed by the said respective companies as dividends on their stock. Thereupon the general manager and general treasurer were elected to carry on this joint business. The reserve fund of $500 was accumulated. The business was carried on until June 1, 1893. At that date the stockholders Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke united together and obtained a majority of the stock of each company. After obtaining this stock, those stockholders united and conspired together to manage and conduct the combined corporations for their individual benefit, and to exclude from the management profits and benefits the plaintiffs Haupt and Nichols. Since that time said plaintiffs Haupt and Nichols have been entirely excluded from the profits, management, and benefits of said corporations and the combination of the corporations. From the time said association of the two corporations was formed until said Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke obtained control of the said combined business, there was paid to the treasurers of the said corporations $500 a month, to be distributed by them as dividends on the stock of the corporations. That, when said Sommers and others obtained control of the said associated corporations, there was in the hands of the general treasurer said reserve fund of $500, and also cash in the sum of $1,000, and also interest on the reserve fund of $25. That this total sum of $1,525 was turned over to Lauzier, the general treasurer elected by his friends Sommers, Butterfield, and O'Rourke. That the current expenses which then remained unpaid did not exceed $300, and that there was therefore $1,225 available as a dividend to be paid to the stockholders. That, ever since said Sommers and others obtained control as aforesaid, they have refused to give the plaintiffs any account of the profits of the association, and have refused to pay any dividends on the stock. Plaintiffs allege, on information and belief, that, since the Sommers control obtained,—that is, since June 1, 1893,—the net profits of the associated corporations have been $500 per month, and that said Sommers, O'Rourke, Butterfield, and Lauzier, instead of paying those profits as dividends, have converted the same to their own use. On February 9, 1894, the officers elected under the Sommers management executed to Fred B. Puddington three promissory notes, payable each in nine months, for the sums, respectively, of $5,000, $2,000, and $2,000, bearing interest at the rate of 1½ per cent per month. That said Sommers management, also as security for said notes, executed to said Puddington a chattel mortgage upon the franchises and all the property of said corporations. That said notes purported to be given for the purchase price of a certain franchise granted by the city of Butte to said Puddington,—a franchise to erect and maintain a district messenger and burglar-alarm telegraph system in the city of Butte. That said franchise was granted by the city subject to certain conditions precedent. The complaint then sets out those conditions, and then alleges that none of those conditions were fulfilled. The complaint alleges that said Puddington's franchise is forfeited and void, and was forfeited and void at the time of the pretended sale of the same to the two said companies and the execution of said notes and mortgage. The complaint further states that said Sommers and others, at the time of said pretended sale, well knew that the Puddington franchise was forfeited and void and was of no value whatever. It is further alleged that said Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke conspired together to defraud the plaintiffs, and to obtain possession of the plaintiffs' stock, and all interest in the Independent Company, and of the said combination of the two companies; and that in fact they executed said mortgage and notes without any consideration, and for the purpose of bringing about the sale of said property and franchises of the said companies, and of foreclosing all interest of the plaintiffs therein. The complaint further alleges that unless the negotiation of the said notes is restrained, and the notes and mortgage declared fraudulent and void, all the property of the Independent Company will be sold under the mortgage, and plaintiffs will be deprived of their interests in the said corporation. The complaint prays for several items of relief, among them that said Fred B. Puddington, and all persons claiming under him, may be enjoined from negotiating said notes or mortgage, or from collecting or foreclosing the same, or from interfering in any manner with the properties or franchises of the said companies, and that said mortgage and notes be adjudged null and void.

In addition to the allegations made in the complaint, a number of affidavits were filed and used on the hearing. One Le Clare deposes that he heard John O'Rourke and G. A. Lauzier, two of the defendants in the district court, conversing about the business of the said district messenger companies, and that O'Rourke said "that if they [meaning himself, Butterfield, Lauzier, and Sommers] would stand together, they would do that Dutch outfit up [referring to the Shultzes and the other stockholders]." H. A. Neidenhofer deposes that from December, 1890, to February, 1892, he was manager of the Independent Company, and that all that time monthly dividends were paid to its stockholders amounting to $750 per month, excepting during the time when there was an opposition company, and that those dividends were net profits. This affiant also states that after the combination was made between the two companies they paid dividends of $500 a month. Seth B. Smith, another affiant, stated that, prior to the time when Sommers and his party obtained control of the combined corporations, he (affiant) was treasurer of the combination. He testifies in his affidavit rather fully about the formation of the combination between the two companies. He testified that the reserve fund above mentioned, of $500, accumulated in the hands of the treasurer; that finally Sommers and his party bought the affiant's stock and he retired from the management; that he turned over to the new management all the funds in three different checks of $911.80, $107.94, and $14.25; that at that time there were expenses outstanding and unpaid of only $400; that when he retired he was just preparing and ready to declare a dividend of $500, but he was instructed by the Sommers party not to pay said dividend; that while affiant was treasurer of the company he paid dividends to the stockholders of about $500 a month. Carl Shultz and his wife, Mary Shultz, each made an affidavit in which they testify as to Lauzier's and Butterfield's negotiations for the purchase of affiants' stock, and threats that if they did not sell that they (Lauzier and Butterfield) would freeze out said affiants. Haupt, one of the plaintiffs, also makes an affidavit that for more than a year after the combination of the two companies he received monthly dividends on his stock of 50 cents per share. This affiant also alleges, on information and belief, that the combined corporations keep two sets of books, one of which sets of books shows the actual receipts and disbursements and the net profits of the association, and the other set of books does not show the correct accounts of the said corporations, but is kept for the purpose of deceiving and misleading stockholders who have been excluded from the management and participation in the management of said business; that, since the Sommers party obtained control of the business, affiant has received no dividends on his stock, although there have been large profits. This affiant then sets forth the execution of the Puddington notes and mortgage. He also sets forth the facts showing that the Puddington franchise which he (Puddington) purported to sell to the companies for $9,000 was absolutely void and worthless. One of the employees of the combined corporations testifies to hearing Butterfield say that the business was good and paying as well as any business in town.

An answer was filed by the defendants, and also some affidavits. It is not necessary to recite the contents of these papers, for on the writ of certiorari in this court the question of the discretion of the lower court in appointing a receiver is not under review. After hearing argument in the district court as recited in its order, the court found that the plaintiffs were entitled to the appointment of a receiver pendente lite. It was therefore ordered that A. H. Barrett be appointed receiver pendente lite of the franchises, plants, business, books, and accounts, and of all other property belonging to the said two corporations, for the purpose of managing and conducting said business; and he was by the order authorized and directed to take possession of the said premises, franchises, plants, and all property, books, and accounts, of any nature whatsoever, belonging to the said corporations, and to manage and control the same during the pendency of this action, and for that purpose to take care of and manage and control the said property and business, and to pay all debts and obligations, and collect all moneys due to the said corporations. It was ordered that the receiver give a bond, with sureties, in the sum of $10,000. Upon the appointment of the receiver, the said G. A. Lauzier made an application to this court upon behalf of himself, and purporting to be also on behalf of the two district telegraph companies, asking for a writ of certiorari to review the action of the district court in appointing a receiver. The application, of course, is made upon the ground that the district court had no jurisdiction to make the appointment. That is the point discussed and decided in the opinion below.

Messrs. George Haldorn and Oliver M. Hall, for respondent.

The district court had jurisdiction to make the order appointing a receiver.

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is simply whether under the facts, as recited in the statement above, the district court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. State v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct. Judge, 10 Mont. 401. See also French Bank Case, 53 Cal., at page 550. There is here no question of the court's discretion under consideration. The relators in this application rely very largely upon the decision in the French Bank Case, but we think that the case at bar is distinguishable from that case in many respects, and, in order to make the distinction apparent, we quote as follows from the California case: "Irrespective of the effect of the fifth subdivision of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which will be presently considered, there is no jurisdiction vested in courts of equity to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party. This is only to say that there is no jurisdiction vested in these courts in such a case to dissolve a corporation; for the power of a receiver, when put in motion, of necessity supersedes the corporate power. It necessarily displaces the corporate management, and substitutes its own, and assumes, in the language of the order under review, 'to do all and everything necessary (in the judgment the receiver, under the advice of the court) to protect the rights of the creditors and depositors of said corporation.' This precise question was brought directly under consideration here in the case of Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145, 76 Am. Dec. 508, where, in a suit brought by a stockholder, a receiver had been appointed by the district court to take possession of the property of the Gold Hill & Bear River Water Company, a corporation existing under the laws of this state. The opinion in that case, rendered by Mr. Justice Cope, and concurred in by the whole court, after referring to the adjudicated cases in England and in this country, uses this language: 'This decree, if permitted to stand, must necessarily result in the dissolution of the corporation; and in that event the court will have accomplished, in an indirect mode, that which, in this proceeding, it had no authority to do directly. It is well settled that a court of equity, as such, has no jurisdiction over corporate bodies for the purpose of restraining their operations or winding up their concerns. We do not find that any such power has ever been exercised in the absence of a statute conferring the jurisdiction.' Of course, it is not to be doubted that the trustees of a corporation, the persons who constitute its direction, and from time to time exercise the corporate authority in the management of its affairs, are subject to the control of courts of equity; or, as observed by Chancellor Kent, 'that the persons who from time to time exercise the corporate powers may, in their character of trustees, be accountable to this court [the court of chancery] for a fraudulent breach of trust; and,' he adds, 'to this plain and ordinary head of equity the jurisdiction of this court over corporations ought to be confined.' Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 388, 1 L. ed. 420. And in exercise of these admitted equity powers of the court, referable to the well-known grounds upon which its jurisdiction ordinarily proceeds, embracing the cognizance of fraud, accident, trust, and the like, the rights of natural persons, injured or put at hazard through corporate proceedings unauthorized by law, will find ample protection and redress. But, even in such a proceeding as that, the trustees must, of course, be made parties defendant; and it will be observed, upon looking at the complaint of Gallagher in this view, that it is not substantially sufficient in its scope to put the equity powers of the court in motion for any purpose. The corporation itself being the sole party defendant, the trustees—those persons upon whom the management of its affairs is devolved—are not parties, nor is any relief sought against them personally. That there is no inherent power in the district courts, as being courts of equity, to appoint a receiver in such a case as that presented by the complaint of Gallagher, is therefore apparent, both upon principle and authority."

In the California case an important element in the decision, as it appears, was that the appointment of the receiver acted as a dissolution of the corporation. In the case at bar no such result is intended by the order appointing the receiver, or is accomplished by that order. It is true that the complaint in the case in the district court asks for a dissolution of the corporation, but whether such relief may be granted in that action is not now before us for review. The complaint also asks another relief, as set forth in the statement, namely, that the negotiation of the notes described be restrained, that the foreclosure of the mortgage be prohibited, and that the notes and mortgage be declared null and void. While the determination of these matters is pending in the action, the receiver is to act. His appointment is pendente lite only, and he is authorized to do only those acts which are peculiarly pendente lite. Again, in the French Bank Case, one ground of the decision was that the action was against the corporation only (see page 546 of the decision), and not against the malfeasant trustees; that is, the "persons upon whom the management of its affairs is devolved" (at page 551). But in the case at bar the managing officers of the corporation are joined as defendants, and their unlawful acts are sought to be set aside, and their future wrongful conduct enjoined. The receiver is not to wind-up the corporation under his appointment. He is simply to manage the affairs of the same while charges of the most outrageous frauds by the managers and controllers of the corporation are being investigated in the trial of the action. We are fully aware of the reluctance of courts of equity to interfere by receivership in the management of corporations, or to take that management from trustees elected by the shareholders. It is said in Morawetz on Private Corporations (sec. 281) as follows: "A court of equity will grant all relief to a shareholder which the nature of his case may require. But it has always been a settled principle that no interference with the management of a corporation can be justified, unless such interference is absolutely necessary to the attainment of justice. The reason of this rule is obvious. The officers of a corporation are generally elected by a vote of the shareholders. Every shareholder has a voice in their appointment, and may insist that they shall represent the corporation when duly appointed. If an officer is guilty of a breach of duty, he may in many cases be removed by act of the corporation; but no minority of the shareholders have any authority to restrain his action, or remove him and appoint another officer in his place. Nor can a court of chancery interfere at the suit of a portion of the shareholders, and remove an offending officer, or even enjoin him generally from acting for the corporation, unless this be essential to the protection of the corporate rights; as, for example, where the directors have conspired to defraud the corporation, or have otherwise shown themselves to be totally unfit to be intrusted any longer with the management of the company's affairs. The court must ordinarily confine its remedy to the redress of the specific wrongs which have been charged."

But the case before us is not an ordinary one, and perhaps it may be doubted that many such histories of fraud will be found in the conduct of human affairs. It is difficult to imagine a case more thoroughly saturated with fraud than this which was presented to the district court on the application for the appointment of a receiver. Four shareholders of two small corporations, which were paying handsome dividends, obtained control of the majority of the stock, and elected their own officers. These four conspirators, instead of paying $500 a month dividends which the corporations were earning, proceeded to put that money into their own pockets. They kept false books to deceive the shareholders. They pretended to buy for the corporations an absolutely worthless franchise, when they already owned two good and valid franchises, which were more than ample for the same purpose. They gave the corporations' notes for this worthless franchise, and mortgaged all of the property of the corporations for the purpose of having the mortgage foreclosed, and the property of the corporations wiped out. It is needless to enlarge upon these facts. They are all set forth in the statement preceding this opinion. This is a story of wrecking and robbing that would make a pirate of the Spanish main exclaim, in the language of Lord Clive, "I am surprised at my own moderation." Is not interference here absolutely necessary, as Morawetz says, to the attainment of justice? Again Morawetz remarks, as quoted above, the court of chancery will not interfere at the suit of the shareholders unless this be essential to the protection of the corporate rights. We can scarcely conceive of a case where it would be more essential than it is here, for the protection of the corporate rights, for, if the interference is not had, the corporate property will be swept away from the corporations into the grasp of the conspirators; and, while the investigation into the acts of the Sommers-O'Rourke party is being made by the court, should the court allow this same band of marauders to remain in possession of the corporations and their property, and continue to convert the assets to their own use, and exercise their own pleasure as to the trusts imposed upon them? To allow such a proceeding, it seems to us, would shock the conscience of the most indifferent court. Our statute provides that "a receiver may be appointed by the court in which an action is pending, or by the judge thereof:

Sixth. In all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity." Code Civ. Proc. § 229. We are of opinion that the decisions of the courts sustain the doctrine of the powers and the usages of courts of equity in such a case as that which was made in the showing before the district court. We note the following language from a very recent decision (January, 1894) of the Kansas supreme court. While the Kansas statute is broader than ours, and the case of Re Lewis, 52 Kan. 660, is decided largely upon the statute of that state, still the following remarks of the Kansas court are valuable, as is also the collection of authorities appended to the decision. We extract from the opinion as follows: "By the averments of the petition, it would appear that all the officers of the corporation have conspired together to divert its business to another company, and to absorb its earnings and assets, and appropriate the same to their own uses. Under those circumstances, it would be useless to apply to the officers to bring an action against themselves, and in such cases the law permits the appointment of a receiver at the instance of a stockholder. In most cases of this character no other adequate remedy exists. The appointment of a receiver is not necessarily a proceeding to dissolve a corporation, nor will it necessarily result in its extinction. The property and assets of the corporation, which are being dissipated and fraudulently absorbed, will be preserved and rightfully applied under the supervision of the court, and may be restored to the officers of the corporation when there has been a change of officers, or when it is deemed prudent and safe to restore the property and affairs of the corporations to its duly constituted officers. See First Nat. Bank of Mauch Chunk v. United States Encasement Tile Co. 105 Ind. 227; Wayne Pike Co. v. Hammons, 129 Ind. 368; Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hall v. Baker, 134 Ind. 293, 20 L. R. A. 210; Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 64 Wis. 639; Consolidated Tank-Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 48 Fed. Rep. 204; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 281; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1834; High, Receivers, § 818; Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 1001; 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 272." We also find it stated in High on Receivers as follows: "It has already been shown that in most of the states of this country the general jurisdiction of courts of equity over corporations has been enlarged to the extent of authorizing the appointment of receivers in behalf of creditors and shareholders." Section 313.

The court of Michigan (October, 1892), in Miner v. Belle Isle Ice Co., 98 Mich. 97, 17 L. R. A. 412, after reviewing the history of a fraud which perhaps is worthy to be ranked with that of the case at bar, says: "The present case furnishes an instance of gross abuse of trust. Must the cestui que trust be committed to the domination of a trustee who has for seven years continued to violate the trust? The law requires of the majority the utmost good faith in the control and management of the corporation as to the minority. It is of the essence of this trust that it shall be so managed as to produce for each stockholder the best possible return for his investment. The trustee has so far absorbed all returns. What is the outlook for the future? This court, in view of the past, can give no assurances. It can make no order that can prevent some other method of bleeding this corporation, if it is allowed to continue. If Lorman be removed, who shall take his place? He has the absolute power to determine. Once deposed, he may elect a dummy to fill his place. There are practically but three persons concerned, Miner, Lorman, and Loris Carpenter, and she has for seven years, in fraud of complainant's rights, been paid a dividend to secure her acquiescence. Who has any right to complain if ample and complete justice is awarded to Miner? Who shall be permitted to stand between him and an adequate remedy? This corporation has utterly failed of its purpose, not because of matters beyond its control, but because of fraudulent mismanagement and misappropriation of its funds. Complainant has a right to insist that it shall not continue as a cloak for a fraud upon him, and shall not longer retain his capital, to be used for the sole advantage of the owner of the majority of the stock, and a court of equity will not so far tolerate such a manifest violation of the rules of natural justice as to deny him the relief to which his situation entitles him. I think a court of equity, under the circumstances of this case, in the exercise of its general equity jurisdiction, has the power to grant to this complainant ample relief, even to the dissolution of the trust relations. Complainant is therefore entitled to the relief prayed. A receiver will be appointed, and the affairs of this corporation wound up." In the Michigan case the decision went to the winding up of the corporation, but in the case before us the receiver is only to hold until the charges of fraud are investigated. The Michigan decision is an able discussion of the powers of the court of equity in this respect, and a valuable review of decisions. It may be said here, as was said in the Michigan case, that the corporations have utterly failed of their purpose, not because of matters beyond their control, but because of the fraudulent mismanagement and misappropriation of their funds. An equal if not greater mismanagement and misappropriation has been done by the officers of the corporations who are here made defendants, and whose acts are sought to be restrained and set aside and declared null and void. We also find the same general subject mentioned in the following language of Waterman on the Law of Corporations (vol. 2, § 356): "The power to appoint a receiver is necessarily inherent in a court which possesses equitable jurisdiction. It is exercised when an estate or fund is in existence, and there is no competent person entitled to hold it; or the person so entitled is in the nature of a trustee, and is misusing or misapplying the trust, or the property is about to be removed beyond the reach of the court; and, generally, when it is necessary to secure rights and prevent a failure of justice. The property is thus placed in the hands of an officer of the law in order that it may be under the protecting care and control of the court, and be delivered unimpaired to the persons to whom it is legally ascertained to belong." See also Ranger v. Champion Cotton-Press Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 611; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 642.

Upon questions of equity and jurisdiction aid is always found in the records of the courts of chancery of New Jersey, and from a decision rendered in May, 1894, by that learned court, we quote as follows: "The power of this court to appoint a receiver of a corporation, either because it has no properly constituted governing body, or because there are such dissensions in its governing body as to make it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business with advantage to its stockholders, I think must be regarded as settled; but I think it is equally well settled that this power is subject to certain limitations, namely, it must always be exercised with great caution, and only for such time and to such an extent as may be necessary to preserve the property of the corporation and protect the rights and interests of its stockholders. As soon as a lawfully constituted and competent governing body comes into existence, whether it is brought into existence by an adjustment of the dissensions or by the election of a new body, and such body is ready to take possession of the property of the corporation, and proceed in the proper discharge of its duties, the court must lift its hand and retire. This is the doctrine, as I understand it, which was laid down by Vice Chancellor Malins in Featherstone v. Cooke, L. R. 16 Eq. 298, and Trade Auxiliary Co. v. Vickers, Id. 308, and which was approved by Chancellor Runyon in Einstein v. Rosenfeld, 88 N. J. Eq. 809, and by Chancellor McGill in Archer v. American Waterworks Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 83; Edison v. Edison United Phonograph Co. (N. J.) 29 Atl. Rep. 197. It is true, of course, that the power must be exercised with great caution, but we are of the opinion that the most scrupulous caution would not cause a court to hesitate in the matter which was before the district court. Furthermore, the district court did not go any further in the appointment than was necessary to preserve the property of the corporations, and protect the rights and interests of its stockholders, as was stated in the New Jersey case. It does not seem necessary to go further in this discussion. The facts of this case will not afford a precedent in the future for any imprudent or unauthorized appointment of a receiver for corporations, or the unwise withdrawal of the business of a corporation from the management of its duly elected and lawfully acting trustees. The case is a precedent only as to its own facts. Here the objects of the existence, and, indeed, the practical existence itself, of the corporations, are being totally destroyed by the unlawful (not to use a stronger term) acts of its managers; and one object, at least, of the action in the district court, is to set aside and prevent such unlawful acts of such managers, and the action itself is against such unlawfully acting persons. If they are allowed to go on in their course which they are pursuing, the corporations are to be totally wrecked, their funds are to be embezzled, and their property is to be taken from them by a fraudulent conspiracy of the managers, whose position is one of trust towards the plaintiffs in the action in the district court. Under such a vigorous showing of facts, we believe that the decisions of the courts of equity uphold the powers and usages of those courts to interfere by a receivership. See the cases cited in this opinion and the cases referred to in those citations.

We are therefore of the opinion that the writ of certiorari must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

PROVIDENCE SAVINGS LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF NEW YORK.

1. Technical warranties as well as representations made in an application for insurance, although referred to in the policy as part of the contract, are included in the provision of Stat. 1887, chapter 214, section 21, that misrepresentations in the negotiation of a contract shall not be deemed material unless made with actual intent to deceive, or unless the matter misrepresented increases the risk.
2. A person was attended by a physician within the meaning of the question in an application for life insurance, if he went to the office of the physician, telling him he had coughed and spit blood, submitted to a physical examination, obtained a prescription, and paid a fee therefor, and afterwards consulted the physician again and paid a fee.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to the ruling of the Superior Court for Essex County made during the trial of an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of life insurance, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. New trial granted.

The policy was issued upon the life of John T. White, who died February 26, 1892, and the question at issue was as to whether or not the policy was avoided by answers which the insured had given to certain questions propounded in the application.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. J. F. Quinn and H. P. Moulton for plaintiff.

Messrs. William H. Moody and Joseph H. Pearl, for defendant:

The stipulations and agreements in the application are made a part of the policy by apt and sufficient words of reference and incorporation. In the application they are declared to be "with the stipulated premiums the sole basis of the contract," and in the policy, of them it is said, "all of which are a part of this contract." The application thus becomes a part of the policy itself.

The nature of the answers in issue are such that there is no hardship to the assured or the beneficiary in treating them as warranties. They related to the present health of the assured, the existence of pulmonary symptoms, the disease of the lungs, the death of a blood relative from hereditary disease, and to the medical attendance of the assured. The information sought by the interrogatories was vitally material to the risk and peculiarly within the knowledge of the assured.

Section 21, chapter 214, Acts of 1887, dealt with representations and not warranties.

The representations were clearly such as, if untrue, would increase the risk of loss.

Where material statements have been incorporated in the policy and made the basis of the insurance, and the validity of the policy made to depend upon the truth of the statements, it is not important to determine whether the statements are representations or warranties, since in either case the policy is avoided by their untruth.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The most important question raised by the report is as to the effect of Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, now, by the Massachusetts Insurance Act of 1894, re-enacted as Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 21. The question is, in substance, whether the provisions of that section include in the word "misrepresentation" statements which in insurance law are classed as "warranties," because expressly said to be warranties by the language of the parties, or whether the section deals only with statements which are representations, and not with technical warranties. The ruling of the trial court went upon the theory that the section did not affect statements which were said in the policy and the application to be warranties, but only misrepresentations as to matters which were the subject of representations as distinguished from warranties. The section, as it stood in Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, was in these words: "No oral or written misrepresentation made in the negotiation of a contract or policy of insurance by the assured or in his behalf, shall be deemed material or defeat or avoid the policy, or prevent its attaching, unless such misrepresentation is made with actual intent to deceive, or unless the matter misrepresented increased the risk of loss;" and the language of Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 21, is the same. This language is broader than that of Pub. Stat., chap. 119, § 181, which applied only to misrepresentations made in obtaining or securing policies of fire insurance and of life insurance, and which was in these words: "No oral or written misrepresentation made in obtaining or securing a policy of fire or life insurance shall be deemed material, or defeat or avoid the policy, or prevent its attaching unless such misrepresentation is made with actual intent to deceive or unless the matter misrepresented increases the risk of loss." The broader language of the section, as it is found in the general insurance Act of 1887, was clearly designed to extend the rule, which up to that time dealt only with misrepresentations affecting policies of fire insurance and of life insurance, and to apply it to misrepresentations made in the negotiation of any contract or policy of insurance of whatever kind. Pub. Stat., chap. 119, § 181, is merely a re-enactment identical in language with Stat. 1878, chap. 157, § 1, which as to life insurance was a wholly new provision. There was, however, a previously enacted statute containing the form of fire insurance policies, providing that the conditions of the insurance should be stated in the body of the policy, and that neither the application of the insured nor the by-laws of the company should be considered as a warranty or a part of the contract, except so far as incorporated in full into the policy, and appearing on its face before the signatures of the officers of the company. This was Stat. 1864, chap. 196, which took the place of and repealed Stat. 1861, chap. 152, which seems to have been the earliest statute dealing with the form of fire insurance policies, and which provided that in all insurance against loss by fire the conditions of the insurance should be stated in the body of the policy, and that neither the application nor the by-laws, as such, should be considered as a warranty or part of the contract. The provisions of Pub. Stat., chap. 119, § 181, were substantially re-enacted in the General Insurance Act of 1887 and in that of 1894. See Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 59; Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 59. Besides the statutes already noted, there are also the several enactments, beginning in the year 1878, establishing a standard form for policies of fire insurance. These are Stat. 1878, chap. 381, with the amendatory act (Stat. 1880, chap. 175; Stat. 1881, chap. 166), repealing the two acts last cited, and prescribing a new standard form of policy; and Pub. Stat. chap. 119, § 189; Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 60; and Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 60,—the last three being substantially re-enactments, continuing in force the provisions of Stat. 1881, chap. 166. In the standard form of policy given in Stat. 1878, chap. 381, is this clause: "This policy shall be void if any material fact or circumstance stated in writing has not been fairly represented by the assured;" and the same clause is in the standard form given in Stat. 1881, chap. 166, and in Pub. Stat., chap. 119, § 189; in Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 60; and in Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 60. The provisions of Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, are thus seen to be part of a system of legislation, beginning in the year 1861, and then applied only to fire insurance in which the legislature has dealt with the subject of statements on the part of the assured affecting contracts of insurance, and which, before the question now raised for decision arose, had been made to apply to all statements made in the negotiation of contracts and policies of insurance of whatever kind. Stat. 1878, chap. 157, does not appear to have been enacted in consequence of any recommendation by the insurance department, nor has any construction been given to that statute or to Pub. Stat., chap. 119, § 181; Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21; or Stat. 1894, chap. 522, § 21—by that department, or by this court, except so far as Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, has been dealt with in the case of Ring v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 145 Mass. 426, and in that of Durkee v. India Mut. Ins. Co. 159 Mass. 514. The case last cited has no bearing upon the present question, nor is that question governed by the decision of Ring v. Phoenix Assur. Co. The statutes above referred to show a general intention on the part of the legislature to make, in lieu of the rules which spring from the doctrines held in the law of insurance as to technical warranties and representations, a statute rule by which to determine the effect upon the contract of all statements on the part of the assured, and also the effect of by-laws and similar matters which it might otherwise be contended would avoid or modify the contract.

The distinction in insurance law between "warranties" and "representations" is said by Baron Parke in Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. Cas. 484, 496, to have been laid down by Lord Mansfield. In Pawson v. Watson, Cowp. 785, decided in the year 1778, Lord Mansfield said: "There is no distinction better known to those who are at all conversant in the law of insurance than that which exists between a warranty or condition, which makes a part of a written policy, and a representation of the state of the case. Where it is a part of the written policy, it must be performed. . . . Nothing tantamount will do or answer the purpose. It must be strictly performed, as being part of the agreement. . . . So that there cannot be a clearer distinction than that which exists between a warranty, which makes part of the written policy, and a collateral representation, which, if false in a point of materiality, makes the policy void; but if not material, it can hardly ever be fraudulent." And in De Hahn v. Hartley, 1 T. R. 343, decided in 1786, he said: "There is a material distinction between a 'warranty' and a 'representation.' A representation may be equitably and substantially answered; but a warranty must be strictly complied with.

. . . A warranty in a policy of insurance is a condition or a contingency, and unless that be performed there is no contract. It is perfectly immaterial for what purpose a warranty is introduced, but, being inserted, the contract does not exist unless it be literally complied with." And, in the same case, Ashurst, J., says: "The very meaning of a 'warranty' is to preclude all questions whether it has been substantially complied with; it must be literally so." These doctrines of the law of insurance have long been recognized in our decisions, and their effect was fully pointed out by this court before the enactment of Stat. 1878, chap. 157. See Houghton v. Manufacturers Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 114, 120, 41 Am. Dec. 489; Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 881, 389, 401.

It is easy to see how an insurer by multiplying immaterial statements to be made by the insured, and giving to them, by the wording of the policy, the technical character of warranties, can, in the absence of any statute provision upon the subject, place the assured in a position in which it will be difficult, if not impossible, for him, although he has acted in good faith, to recover upon his contract, because of some inaccurate statement on his part. If he is held to have warranted the truth of a statement, its exact and literal truth is a necessary condition of his right to recover, however immaterial the statement may be, and however honest may have been his conduct. In the opinion of a majority of the court, it was the intention of the legislature by Stat. 1878, chap. 157, to change this rule to some extent, and to enact in place of it one which should hold the contract valid unless the misstatement, if made in the negotiation of the contract, was made with an actual intent to deceive, or unless the misstatement was of a matter which actually increased the risk of loss; and this with reference to statements which may be said by the parties to be warranties as well as those which were only representations. Such was already the law as to statements not technical warranties. As to mere representations, the statute may well be held to be only declaratory, but as to warranties it made a new rule. In the opinion of a majority of the court, it speaks in terms neither of warranties nor of representations, technically so called, but deals with all misrepresentations made in negotiating the contract or policy. Misstatements of fact, whether the statement is said to be by the parties a warranty or a representation, are equally misrepresentations, and are placed in each case upon the same footing by the statute which applies to them if the statements are called "warranties" by the parties no less than if they are mere "representations." And the same construction must, in the opinion of a majority of the court, be given to Pub. Stat., chap. 110, § 181, and to Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, which was in force when the policy sued on was written.

It is not necessary at present to consider whether the statute would have any effect if an immaterial statement declared by the application to be a warranty, instead of, as in the present case, being referred to in the policy, and thus brought into it by such reference only, were independently written out at length in the policy itself, and thus there declared to be a warranty upon the exact truth of which the policy was conditioned and founded. The statements upon the falsity of which the defendant relies in this case are not incorporated into the policy except by reference to the application. The declaration of the applicant warranting the answers to be true was in his application made in the negotiation of his policy, and was within the operation of the statute. In the opinion of a majority of the court, it was not taken out of the operation of the statute by the reference to the application in the policy, that it was "in consideration of the stipulations and agreements in the application hereof, and upon the next page of this policy, all of which are a part of this contract." In the trial of the present case a different view of the effect of the statute was held by the presiding judge, who ruled that, because the statements of the assured were warranties, the provisions of Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 21, did not apply. The plaintiff's exception to this ruling was well taken, and because the ruling was wrong the verdict for the defendant must be set aside, and a new trial ordered. We all agree that the ruling was correct; that the assured was attended by a physician, within the meaning of the question, "When and by what physician were you last attended, and for what complaint?" If he went to the office of a physician, told him that he had coughed and spit blood, desired him to make a physical examination, to which he submitted, receiving a prescription, and paying for the services of the physician, and subsequently calling again at the physician's office, and consulting him professionally, and paying him a fee, the circumstances recited show that the assured was under the care and treatment of the physician for a complaint, and was as really attended by the physician as if the latter had seen the assured at his home.

I. Checks.

In Thomson v. Bank of North America (1880) 88 N. Y. 1, the court said it was not prepared to hold that an agent receiving a check in payment of a claim would be authorized to indorse the principal's name thereon. The doubt thus expressed is shown by the authorities to be well founded, as all agree that mere authority to receive a check is insufficient to justify an agent in indorsing the principal's name thereon. Such is the decision in Graham v. United States Sav. Inst. (1870) 46 Mo. 188.

In Pickle v. Muse (1890) 7 L. R. A. 98, 88 Tenn. 380, the same doctrine was declared in denying title to sue on a check.

So the clerk of an acting trustee under a will employed to collect rents and perform other services has no implied authority to indorse checks taken for rent. Robinson v. Chemical Nat. Bank (1881) 86 N. Y. 407.

In Seventh Nat. Bank of Philadelphia v. Cook (1873) 73 Pa. 483, 13 Am. Rep. 751, a clerk taking a check in collection of a debt was found by verdict of a jury to have indorsed it without authority.

A drummer or commercial traveler having power to collect accounts and receive money has no implied authority to indorse checks taken by him. Jackson v. National Bank of McMinnville (1893) 18 L. R. A. 663, 92 Tenn. 154.

So a power of attorney to prosecute a claim against the government giving authority to receive a check in payment gives the agent no power to indorse and collect the check. Millard v. National Bank of the Republic (1877) 3 McArthur. 54.

The same was decided in substance in Hogg v. Snaith (1808) 1 Taunt. 347, and Holtzinger v. National Corn Exch. Bank (1890) 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 232, which were cases in which drafts were received and indorsed. See infra. II. a.

In Messenger v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York City (1875) 6 Daly, 190, an indorsement of the name of another person on a check was held to be ratified by acquiescence.

The usage of a clerk to indorse checks for deposit by using a stamp which included the name of the bank and then signing his employer's name, was held insufficient to make valid an indorsement of a check by him without using the stamp for deposit have been misappropriated by plaintiff's secretary with the connivance of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. S. Owsley and Lathrop, Morrow, Fox & Moore for appellant.
Mr. Elijah Robinson for respondent.

Brace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in the Jackson county circuit court. The plaintiff is a building and loan association organized under the laws of this state, of which, at the time of the transaction in question, E. E. Richardson was president, Benjamin Holmes, treasurer, and George L. Harris, secretary. In June, 1887, the association made a loan to Richardson of $4,000, evidenced by his bond, and secured by a deed of trust on some property in Kansas City. In June, 1888, Richardson concluded to pay off this loan, and made an arrangement with Judge Brumback for that purpose, who on the 19th of June, 1888, drew his own check of that date for $3,676.74, the balance due thereon, "on Armour Brothers Banking Co.," payable to "Gate City Building and Loan Association," and delivered the same to the said Harris in payment thereof, who indorsed said check, "Gate City B. & L. Ass'n, by George L. Harris, Secretary," in another bank to his own credit. Schmidt v. Garfield Nat. Bank (1892) 64 Hun, 298.

A bank taking checks on other banks indorsed per pro by a traveling agent who has no authority to indorse or deposit them, and then allowing him to check out the proceeds, is held in Bissell v. Fox (1885) 53 L. T. N. S. 193, to be guilty of negligence and therefore not protected by section 83 of the English Bills of Exchange Act of 1882; but a check on itself thus indorsed which it received and credited to the agent and then allowed him to check out the proceeds was held to be paid though not paid in cash over the counter, and so within section 60 of the Act whereby payments in good faith and in the ordinary course of business by a banker of a bill with forged indorsements is protected.

II. Other negotiable paper.

a. Of agents in general.

A principal may be bound by the indorsement of a note by his agent if he has acquiesced in the practice of the agent to make such indorsements. New York Iron Mine v. First Nat. Bank of Negaunee (1878) 89 Mich. 644; Morse v. Diebold (1876) 2 Mo. App. 168.

A general authority to indorse bills is held inferable by the jury from the agent's practice to draw checks and bills with several instances of indorsements. Prescott v. Flinn (1882) 9 Bing. 19, 2 Moore & S. 18.

The authority of a steward in charge of a stock farm to indorse bills was held to be a question for the jury where he was proved to have done such acts before without expressly proving the knowledge of the employer. Davidson v. Stanley (1841) 3 Scott, N. H. 49, 2 Mann. & G. 721.

So the authority of an agent of the proprietors of a town in Maine to indorse notes received on sale of land was held to be properly shown by proof of acquiescence in such indorsements by him as well as by a vote authorizing him to sell the land and "to attend to such other business as may concern the general interest." Trundy v. Farrar (1850) 32 Me. 225.

The question here was as to the sufficiency of the indorsement to transfer title so as to sustain an action by the indorsee against the maker.

The power to indorse is held to arise of necessity from the duties of the position and the customary exercise of such power with acquiescence where the business of the firm as a dock company was carried on by a general agent designated variously as secretary, cashier, and financial agent, with very great powers, who was shown to have negotiated notes taken in the business. Edwards v. Thomas (1877) 66 Mo. 468.

Where an agent was carrying on the whole business at a certain place with authority to receive payments in checks or cash, the court said the jury would have been warranted in finding that his plenary authority included implied powers to in-

The power of an agent to guarantee a subagent against liability for indorsing a bill was denied in Fenn v. Harrison (1789) 3 T. B. 757, on proof that he was expressly directed not to indorse it; but on a subsequent trial where there was no proof of directions not to indorse, the principal was held liable. (1791) 4 T. R. 177.

An agent in charge of a branch lumber yard was held to have no authority to indorse a note for his principal and ratification thereof could be made only with knowledge of the act. Diets v. City Nat. Bank of Hastings (Neb.) Nov. 8, 1894.

An agent's indorsement of a note before delivery was held to be ratified by a written agreement of the principal with the maker. Harrod v. McDaniels (1879) 126 Mass. 413.

Ratification of unauthorized indorsement of notes by an agent is made by retaining the proceeds. Baer v. Lichten (1887) 24 Ill. App. 811.

A clerk styled "cashier" in the office of the state treasurer, whose general duties are to keep a ledger, a cash book and bank pass, make bank deposits and certain petty cash disbursements, but expressly forbidden to cash drafts, cannot pass the title of such drafts to banks by indorsing them. People v. Bank of North America (1879) 75 N. Y. 548.

But a deputy treasurer was held authorized to make such indorsements. Ibid.

A wife cannot bind her husband by indorsing negotiable notes without express or implied authority. Leeds v. Vail (1850) 15 Pa. 188.

But her indorsement of his name on notes may be ratified by him. National Bank of Orleans v. Fassett (1890) 42 Vt. 422.

That oral authority to transfer a note by indorsement may be sufficient is implied by all the cases which hold the principal liable by reason of custom or acquiescence. So parol authority is expressly decided to be sufficient to sustain an indorsement for accommodation. Turnbull v. Trout (1828) 1 Hall, 386.

Under a statute requiring an indorsement to be "under the hand" of the indorser it is not necessary that an agent's indorsement should show his authority on the note or bill. Bettis v. Bristol (1881) 56 Iowa, 41.

The power to indorse need not be under seal. Bank of Washington v. Pierson (1826) 2 Cranch, C. C. 685.

A written authority to sign for the principal any note for the renewal of notes in a certain bank of which the principal was drawer or indorser is a continuing authority to indorse for successive renewals of such notes including therefore a renewal of notes of which he was indorser only by the act of the agent. Ibid.

and on the next day presented the same to the defendant bank, in which was then being kept an account in the name of said association, as also an individual account in the name of said Harris, for deposit on his personal account. Thereupon, the check was credited to Harris on his individual account, and collected by the bank, through the clearing house of Armour Bros. Banking Company, on the 21st of June, 1888. Afterwards the proceeds thus placed to the credit of Harris on his personal account were checked out by him on his individual checks, for what purposes does not appear, except that on the same day of the deposit there was deposited to the credit of the association on its account the sum of $590.83, the exact amount of one of his checks on that day charged to him on his individual account. On the same day the check was given by Brumback, the following written statement was made upon the face of the bond of Richardson: "Received June 19, 1888, payment in full by E. E. Richardson, per J. Brumback, $3,076.74. Geo. L. Harris, Secretary,"—and the deed of trust was satisfied of record by a deed of quitclaim executed by the vice president of the association, in pursuance of a special order of the board of directors. Harris, the secretary, was the active manager of the association, and, under its by-laws, the custodian of its bonds, notes, mortgages, and other

An agent may indorse and transfer a note under power to do all matters in relation to property or debts which the principal could do. Gould v. Bowen (1868) 35 Iowa, 77.

Unrestricted general power of attorney to indorse notes makes the agent's indorsement binding on the principal although the power was intended to authorize renewals only. Mann v. King (1819) 6 Munf. 428.

Power of attorney by several persons authorizing indorsement of their names upon "all bills" drawn in favor of one of them does not authorize several and successive indorsements but only a joint indorsement. Bank of United States v. Beirne (1844) 1 Gratt. 284, 42 Am. Dec. 551.

A power of attorney left at a bank authorizing indorsements at that bank by an agent gives him authority to indorse any note payable at and due to the bank, but not a note due to another bank, although made payable at the bank named. Morrison v. Taylor (1827) 6 T. B. Mon. 82.

So a similar power of attorney left at the office of an insurance company authorizing the agent to indorse notes at the office of the insurance company does not authorize the agent to indorse a note to that company which is made payable at the bank where a different liability attaches to notes payable at the bank. In this case notwithstanding the fact that the agent was authorized to indorse a note at the bank and at the same time to indorse notes at the insurance company's office, a note due to the insurance company and made payable at the bank was held beyond his power to indorse. Ibid.

There is no power to indorse bills under a power of attorney to manage estates in Ireland, give leases, collect rents, bring actions therefor, "and do all lawful acts and things whatsoever concerning all my business and affairs of what nature or kind soever in the said united kingdom, and generally to act for me and on my behalf in all matters as fully and amply in all respects as I might or could do therein were I personally present," since these general words must be construed with reference to the particular powers given. Redaile v. La Nause (1835) 1 Younge & C. Exch. 304.

A power of attorney to draw bills per pro does not necessarily authorize an indorsement per pro. So while an acceptance proves the drawing it does not prove an indorsement of the same bill though both were made per pro. Robinson v. Yarrow (1817) 7 Taunt. 455, 1 J. B. Moore, 150.

So a power of attorney to receive all moneys due, use all means for recovery, and appoint attorneys for bringing actions and to revoke their appointment, and "to do all other business," does not extend to a power to indorse a bill which comes to the hands of the agent under the power, as the general words are limited to the specific business mentioned. Hay v. Goldsmid (1804) 2 Smith, 79.

Authority to sell and indorse a note belonging to a copartner individually in order to use the proceeds for paying partnership debts does not extend to negotiation of the note for other purposes after the dissolution of the partnership. Callender v. Golsan Bros. (1875) 27 La. Ann. 811.

An agent's power to negotiate a draft for cash does not include power to indorse it for his own debt. Dowden v. Cryder (1893) 55 N. J. L. 329.

An agent for collection has no authority to indorse and sell negotiable instruments in his possession, and there is no presumption of authority by virtue of his possession. Hardesty v. Newby (1869) 28 Mo. 537, 75 Am. Dec. 187; Goodfellow v. Landis (1865) 35 Mo. 163; Smith v. Johnson (1880) 71 Mo. 382; Quigley v. Mexico Southern Bank (1883) 80 Mo. 289, 50 Am. Rep. 508; Hays v. Lynn (1838) 7 Watts, 524.

The doctrine that an agent to collect has no authority to indorse drafts is declared in Murray v. East India Co. (1821) 5 Barn. & Ald. 204, although in that case the indorsement was made after the death of the principal.

Attorneys to collect a claim against the government are not authorized to indorse the principal's name on drafts received payable to his order under a power of attorney to receipt and sign acquittances "and execute other needful instruments and papers, and to perform all and every acts and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises." Holtzinger v. National Corn Exch. Bank (1890) 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 222.

To the same effect it was held in Hogg v. Snaith (1808) 1 Taunt. 347, a power of attorney to receive from the government all salary and other money due the principal does not authorize a negotiation of bills received in payment.

Indorsement of a bill to enable a purchaser to pay for goods sold is outside the scope of authority of an agent in charge of a store. Bank of Hamburg v. Johnson (1846) 3 Rich. L. 42. See also infra as to accommodation indorsements.

Power of attorney to sell an interest in a partnership and to act as the agent thinks best in the partnership matters does not give authority to indorse a note received on the sale of such interest for an amount much larger than the purchase price. Eissick v. Buokwalter (1889) 20 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 26.

Similar to some of the above cases, though involving no indorsement, is the case of Nickson v. Brohan (1713) 10 Mod. 109, in which a servant sent with a note on Saturday to collect it got back bills therefor from a third person without his master's knowledge, and it was held that the master was liable for the loss resulting from the maker's failure on the following Monday before the note was paid. The court agreed in this case that as the note was not indorsed and title was not transferred it was only security in the hands of the person who advanced the money upon it.

securities, the keeper of its accounts with its officers and members and those having dealings with the association, whose duty it was "to receive all moneys, and pay the same over to the treasurer," and "at all meetings of the board of directors furnish a statement of the financial condition of the association, and give a detailed statement thereof at each annual meeting, and make a semiannual report for publication in January and July of each year." The treasurer was the custodian of the money of the association, whose duty it was "to receive from the secretary all money paid into the association," to "pay all orders issued by the board of directors, signed by the president, and countersigned by the secretary," and to keep his accounts "open at all times to the inspection of the president and board of directors," and, when demanded by them, to give "satisfactory proof that the money and other assets are actually in hand in accordance with his own books and those of the secretary." It was the duty of the board of directors to hold monthly meetings, for the transaction of the business of the association not otherwise provided for, on the first Monday evening of each month. In the account of Holmes, the treasurer, kept by the secretary in the ledger of the association, appears the following entry: "October 1, 1868. Cash, E. E. Richardson, loan returned, thirty-seven hundred

A bona fide purchaser of a note from a corporation indorsed by an officer thereof takes at peril of the officer's lack of authority to make the indorsement. Davis v. Rockingham Investment Co. (1892) 89 Va. 290. In this case one who was secretary and treasurer and general manager of an investment company was held not to have authority to indorse and transfer a note.

But the possession of a note purporting to be indorsed by a corporation is by virtue of Minnesota Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 76, § 89, prima facie evidence that it was indorsed by authority, as that statute provides that possession of a note or bill is prima facie evidence that it was indorsed by the person by whom it purports to be indorsed. First Nat. Bank of Rock Island, Ill., v. Loyed (1881) 23 Minn. 396; National Bank of Battle Creek v. Mallan (1887) 87 Minn. 404.

Denial of an indorsement by a corporation "so as to transfer title" was held insufficient to raise the question of authority to make the indorsement. Second Nat. Bank of Richmond v. Martin (1891) 82 Iowa, 442.

A local agent of a manufacturing company who takes a note for the company has no authority to indorse it for the company to himself and take it for his own commissions under an arrangement with the general agent so as to make a subsequent transfer from him to a third person valid. Englehart v. Peoria Plow Co. (1897) 21 Neb. 41.

An agent of a foreign corporation expressly authorized to indorse and discount at a certain bank paper which he has taken for sales may give good title to a note which he represents to the bank to have been taken for such sales. Marine Bank of Buffalo v. Butler Colliery Co. (1899) 28 N. Y. S. R. 818. This case also held that the power of the president to authorize such agent to indorse paper after being exercised for years is unaffected by by-laws.

The power of an executive committee of a board of trustees to indorse negotiable paper may be delegated by a power of attorney. Sheridan Electric Light Co. v. Chatham Nat. Bank (1899) 62 Hun, 875.

In Chillioothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio v. Fox (1856) 3 Blatchf. 433, a transfer of negotiable paper was admitted to have been made by authorized indorsement, but it was said that it was in accordance with universal usage of the presidents and cashiers of incorporated companies to make in their behalf indorsements and transfers by simply indorsing their name and title of office. This case turned rather on the form of the indorsement than the power to make it.

A corporation is estopped to deny the authority of its president to discount notes after it has received and used the proceeds. German Nat. Bank v. Louisville Butchers Hide & Tallow Co. (Ky.) March 5, 1896.

The indorsement of negotiable paper by the president of a corporation is valid when this is in accordance with the usual custom of the business. Clark v. Titcomb (1864) 42 Barb. 122; Elwell v. Dodge (1861) 33 Barb. 386.

But one who takes from the president of a corporation for his individual debt a note payable to the corporation and indorsed for it by him is chargeable with notice of any lack of authority on his part to make the indorsement, but is a bona fide holder if inquiry would have shown his authority, even if he did not make the inquiry or know the fact. Wilson v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (1890) 120 N. Y. 145.

Where a by-law of a corporation authorized the indorsement of a note by the secretary only a director chargeable with notice thereof is not protected in taking it on the president's indorsement. Leavitt v. Connecticut Peat Co. (1868) 6 Blatchf. 139.

A railroad president who is its financial agent may indorse and assign notes and mortgages given to aid in the construction of the road. Irwin v. Bailey (1879) 8 Biss. 523.

The transfer and indorsement of a promissory note in the name of a railroad company by its president was held in Illinois to be prima facie with authority where there was no plea verified by affidavit putting the authority in issue. Goodrich v. Reynolds (1863) 51 Ill. 490, 33 Am. Dec. 240.

The president of a warehouse company was held by usage to have power to indorse and transfer notes. National Bank of New York v. German American Mut. Warehousing & Secour. Co. (1896) 21 Jones & S. 397.

The president of an insurance company has no implied authority to indorse and negotiate notes in the absence of any provision in the charter or by-laws giving such authority, where no practice to make such indorsement is shown. Marine Bank of New York v. Clements (1856) 8 Bosw. 600.

But the president of an insurance company has power to indorse and transfer notes where the by-laws authorize him to make contracts and transact the ordinary business of the company. Brouwer v. Harbeck (1852) 1 Duer, 114.

No vote of the directors is necessary to authorize indorsement of notes by the president of an insurance company. Topping v. Hickford (1862) 4 Allen, 120.

The practice of the president of an insurance company to indorse and transfer notes may be sufficient to show his authority in this respect. *Marine Bank of New York v. Clements (1863) 31 N. Y. 83, affirming 6 Bosw. 166; Scott v. Johnson (1859) 5 Bosw. 213; Merchants Bank of New York v. McColl (1860) 6 Bosw. 473; Ogden v. Andre (1859) 4 Bosw. 583; Howland v. Myer (1850) 3 N. dollars." The evidence further tends to prove that Harris made the deposits to the credit of the association's account in the bank; that he was the only one that came to the bank to attend to its business; that prior to this transaction Harris had been making deposits both on his own account and on the account of the association; that he was in the habit of depositing checks payable to the association, indorsed as this one was, and no checks came to the bank indorsed in any other way; that he made other deposits to his own credit in the same way; that he "used very often to deposit the entire receipts to his own credit, and then give the company a check to cover it, and deposit it to the credit of the association;" that no objection was ever made by any of the officers of the association to his mode of doing the business at the bank, and this check was not deposited otherwise than in the regular course of his business with the bank. It further appears from the evidence that in April or May, 1889, Harris absconded, and it was thereafter discovered by the association that there was a shortage in his accounts, and that the check in question had been deposited by him to the credit of his individual account. In July thereafter a demand was made on the bank for a return of the money collected thereon, and on the 28th of September, 1889, this suit was instituted for its recovery, in dent of the company is prima facie sufficient to show his authority to make the transfer. Cabot v. Given (1858) 45 Me. 144; Brown v. Donnell (1861) 49 Me. 421, 77 Am. Dec. 206.

So where a note was payable to the order of a person described as president of an insurance company the indorsement by him was held sufficient to transfer the title. Nichols v. Frothingham (1858) 45 Me. 220, 71 Am. Dec. 539.

Even when an indorsement was made after the resignation of the president of an insurance company it was held sufficient prima facie to transfer title as against the maker. Patten v. Moses (1861) 49 Me. 255.

In Central Bank of Brooklyn v. Lang (1887) 1 Bosw. 202, a note was indorsed by the vice-president of a company, but no question was raised as to his authority.

An indorsement of notes by the treasurer of a corporation under express authority or when he is its general financial agent, is sufficient. Lester v. Webb (1861) 1 Allen, 34.

But the authority of the treasurer of a corporation to indorse negotiable paper must be shown either by resolution or by ratification of similar dealings. Knight v. Lang (1855) 4 E. D. Smith, 381, 3 Abb. Pr. 227.

Long practice of the treasurer of a corporation to indorse notes is presumptive evidence of his continuing authority to do so, and oral evidence is admissible to prove his statements that the indorsement was in the course of business and by authority. Second Nat. Bank of Allentown v. Pottier & Stynus Mfg. Co. (1888) 24 Jones & S. 216.

The authority of the president treasurer and general manager of a foreign phosphate company having its principal place of business in the state, to indorse its notes, is a question of fact for the jury where there is evidence that he was in the habit of making such indorsements. Fifth Nat. Bank of Providence v. Navassa Phosphate Co. (1890) 119 N. Y. 253.

The treasurer of a corporation to whom drafts are made payable by name, adding the word "treasurer," may authorize an attorney to indorse them for him whether he could do so or not in case of drafts payable to the company by name. Shaw v. Stone (1848) 1 Cush. 228.

Authority or a recognized course of business must be shown to make good the indorsement of a note by the secretary of a corporation. Gould v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. (1882) Cin. Super. Ct. 8 Week. L. Bull. 281.

The secretary of a mining company has no authority to transfer notes in payment of debts of the company. Blood v. Marcuse (1869) 38 Cal. 500, 90 Am. Dec. 435.

The indorsement of a note by the secretary of a corporation with the knowledge and consent of its directors is evidence of his authority and the production of the note thus indorsed is prima facie evidence of the indorsee's title. Williams v. Cheney (1855) 3 Gray, 215.

Ratification on the trial was held sufficient to sustain an indorsement by the secretary of a corporation in State Trust Co. v. Owen Paper Co. (Mass.) Oct. 18, 1894.

The admissibility of evidence of an indorsement by the secretary of an insurance company on a note payable to the treasurer of the company was sustained in Gould v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. (1882) (Cin. Super. Ct.) 8 Week. L. Bull. 281. The court seems doubtful as to the authority to make the indorsement, but holds that the evidence was competent as far as it went.

The indorsement of a note by the secretary of an insurance company alleged to be that of the company by him duly authorized, was held to be admitted to be authorized by failure to deny the fact. Nicholas v. Oliver (1859) 36 N. H. 218.

The same was held as to the indorsement of a note by the secretary of a railroad company as to which the court said: "If it was not their act it should have been denied by affidavit." Frye v. Tucker (1860) 24 Ill. 180.

c. Of bank officers and agents.

Since the business of banks consists so largely in dealing with negotiable paper the question as to them of power to indorse is somewhat different from that in case of other corporations.

In Hoyt v. Thompson (1851) 5 N. Y. 335, the court said, although it was not actually decided in the case, that if the transfer be made in the usual course of business and in good faith, the denial of the power of the president or cashier to transfer negotiable funds of the bank without express authority from the directors is erroneous.

It is said in Allison v. Hubbell (1861) 17 Ind. 559, that in the business of banking either the president or cashier is authorized to bind the institution by indorsing bills of exchange, etc., in the absence of any specified manner of transacting its business, though this question was not actually in the case, which was as to the signing of bills.

The cashier and president of a bank have no authority to pledge its assets for antecedent debts, although they may dispose of its negotiable securities in the ordinary course of business. Tennessee v. Davis (1874) 50 How. Pr. 447.

The indorsement of a note by the president of a bank is held in Hallowell & Augusta Bank v. Hamlin (1817) 14 Mass. 180, to be a matter not within his power ex officio, but that his authority must be proved by legal evidence.

So in Smith v. Lawson (1881) 18 W. Va. 212, 41 Am. Rep. 688, it is held that the president has no power ex officio to transfer negotiable notes in consideration of the surrender of notes of another bank, although there was no cashier at his bank and it was the form of an action for money had and received to the use of the association. At the close of all the evidence, the court instructed the jury to find for the defendant. Plaintiff thereupon took a nonsuit, and, the court refusing to set the same aside, the plaintiff appeals.

The law of the case seems to be within a narrow compass. There is not a particle of evidence tending to prove that the bank did not act in perfect good faith in this transaction, in respect of which it occupied no fiduciary relation to plaintiff. It does not appear from the evidence to what purposes the proceeds of the check were ultimately applied by Harris,—it may have been to his own, or to those of the association,—nor is this a matter of any importance upon the present issue. The bank was not responsible for the proper application of those proceeds by him. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 8691. The check was a negotiable instrument. Famous Shoe & Clothing Co. v. Crosswhite (Mo.) 28 L. R. A. 568. The credit given to the account of Harris was the same as if the money had been paid him on the check, and had been immediately placed back by him and credited on his own account. Benton v. German-American Nat. Bank, 123 Mo. 853; Oddie v. National City Bank, 45 N. Y. 785, 6 Am. Rep. 160; 3 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 451. The bank thereby became a purchaser for shown that he was in the habit of receiving deposits and payments. But it was held that such transfers by the president might be ratified by permitting him to carry on the practice.

The validity of the indorsement of a note by the president of a bank is sustained in Aiken v. Marine Bank of Milwaukee (1868) 16 Wis. 660, as being within his implied authority.

In Spear v. Ladd (1814) 11 Mass. 94, it is said that the president of a bank may be authorized to indorse notes by virtue of his office and by vote of the directors.

The authority of the president of a bank to indorse and transfer a note payable to the cashier but belonging to the bank, was denied in Kennedy v. First Nat. Bank (U. S. C. C.) 5 Cin. L. Bull. 219, but in that case it was held that the receipt of the proceeds acknowledged by the vice-president of the bank and approved by the cashier was a ratification of the indorsement.

In Palmer v. Nassau Bank (1875) 78 Ill. 890, an indorsement in the name of the president of the bank described as president on the transfer of the note to him was sustained, but it did not appear that he wrote the indorsement or had anything to do with it, nor was any question raised as to his authority to indorse notes. The court said it did not know of any legal inability in the bank through its agent and president to transfer by indorsement, the legal title of the note to him.

An indorsement by the president of a bank for the bank on his own note where the proceeds were credited to the bank, was held binding on the bank. Central Trust Co. v. Cook County Nat. Bank (1883) 15 Fed. Rep. 885.

The general agent of a bank possessing more than ordinary cashier's power was held in Merchants Bank of Macon v. Central Bank of Georgia (1846) 1 Ga. 418, 44 Am. Dec. 665, to have power to indorse in obtaining the discount of a bill.

As to the cashier of a bank it is held in Carey v. Giles (1851) 10 Ga. 9, that the payment of a debt by a bank, or securing the same by transfer of securities, is an act which belongs to his office and which he may rightfully do. And it was held in that case that evidence to the effect that there was no legal president and board of directors at the time was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that such transfers were invalid.

This doctrine of the power of a cashier to indorse negotiable securities of the bank is held by a large number of authorities. They agree that so long as the indorsements are in the regular course of business a cashier has prima facie authority to make them. Fleckner v. Bank of United States (1823) 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 388, 5 L. ed. 681; Lafayette Bank v. State Bank of Illinois (1847) 4 McLean, 208; Wild v. Bank of Passamaquoddy (1825) 3 Mason, 506; United States v. Greene (1837) 4 Mason, 457; Blair v. First Nat. Bank of Mansfield (1877) 2 Flipp. 111, 5 Rep. 27 L. R. A.

40; Lanning v. Lockett (1882) 10 Fed. Rep. 451; Everett v. United States (1857) 8 Port. (Ala.) 108, 30 Am. Dec. 584; Bank of the State v. Wheeler (1868) 21 Ind. 90; Merchants Ins. Co. of New Orleans v. Chauvin (1844) 8 Rob. (La.) 49; Haynes v. Beckman's Succession (1851) 6 La. Ann. 224; Farrar v. Gilman (1841) 19 Me. 440, 36 Am. Dec. 766; Cooper v. Curtis (1849) 30 Me. 488; Kimball v. Cleveland (1857) 4 Mich. 606; Harper v. Calhoun (1848) 7 How. (Miss.) 208; Crocket v. Young (1848) 1 Smedes & M. 241; Corser v. Paul (1860) 41 N. H. 24, 77 Am. Dec. 758; City Bank of New Haven v. Perkins (1864) 39 N. Y. 554, affirming 4 Boew. 430; Robb v. Ross County Bank (1864) 41 Barb. 591; Coats v. Donnell (1883) 94 N. Y. 168; Smith v. Lawson (1851) 18 W. Va. 212-237, 41 Am. Rep. 688.

The case of Merchants Ins. Co. of New Orleans v. Chauvin, supra, distinguishes that of United States Bank v. Fleckner (1820) 8 Mart. (La.) 300, 13 Am. Dec. 297, in which it was held that a cashier was not authorized to indorse and transfer a note, and evidence of usage of that kind was rejected; but the later case distinguishes it on the ground of a resolution whereby in the Fleckner case the president and cashier had been expressly given authority to act in the matter in question. If the case cannot be distinguished it is then clearly overruled and against nearly the whole current of authorities.

Although the statute says that "contracts" made by a banking association and "all bills" shall be signed by "the president, or vice-president and cashier," usage of cashiers to indorse negotiable paper in the business of banking is held unaffected by the statute. Jones v. Hawkins (1861) 17 Ind. 550.

Although the charter of a bank provides that "every contract or agreement" on behalf of the company shall be signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier, the cashier may make valid indorsements of negotiable paper. Maxwell v. Planters Bank (1850) 10 Humph. 507.

The indorsement of notes for collection is part of the regular business of a bank which a cashier has implied authority to do. Corser v. Paul (1860) 41 N. H. 24, 77 Am. Dec. 758.

The power of a cashier to indorse notes for collection is also sustained in Hartford Bank v. Barry (1821) 17 Mass. 97, in which the court denies that the cashier can transfer the property of the corporation in the note but can only transfer it so far as is necessary to collect it. The doctrine thus announced in this early Massachusetts case was not necessarily decided therein, as the only power involved was that to indorse for collection and this was sustained while in addition the acts were held to have been ratified by the corporation, and the doctrine there unnecessarily declared is substantially obsolete now.

In Bank of the State of New York v. Farmers

value in the ordinary course of business of the instrument, and entitled to collect the proceeds thereof to its own account, if it acquired plaintiff's title by indorsement. So that the only question is, Did Harris, in his official capacity as secretary, have power to transfer the check by indorsement? By the by-laws, the secretary was made the general fiscal agent of the association, the custodian of all its securities, whether bonds, bills, notes, drafts, checks, or whatever their form might be. To him, and to him alone, was intrusted the duty of keeping the accounts of the association, and of collecting all moneys due or coming to the association on account of such securities, or from any other source. All moneys were to pass through his hands into those of the treasurer, whose only authority was to receive the moneys of the association from the secretary, and pay the same out in the manner prescribed by the by-laws. The by-laws were of course made for an association to be conducted in accordance with the business principles of the age, and it would be a strange construction of those by-laws, in an age in which nine tenths of the business of the country is transacted through the medium of bills of exchange, inland drafts, and bank checks, to hold that this secretary—who, it is conceded, had full power to collect the loan from Richardson, and in doing so to receive the check of Brumback there-

Branch of State Bank of Ohio (1862) 38 Barb. 332, an indorsement by a cashier was held to be simply for collection and not to bind the bank as indorser, and the court said: "It nowhere appears that the cashier was authorized to affix his name or that of the bank for the purpose of making the bank liable on a contract of indorsement." But the effect of this case to limit the generally recognized doctrine of the implied powers of cashiers is nullified by the fact which appears from a statement in Bank of the State of New York v. Muskingum Branch of the Bank of the State of Ohio, 29 N. Y. 426, 627, that the decision was reversed by the court of appeals on grounds which are not authoritatively stated as there was no opinion published. But the statement of counsel as to the reversal of the case adds that it was understood to be reversed on the ground that the question involved was for the jury.

In the case of Bank of the State of New York v. Muskingum Branch of the Bank of the State of Ohio (1864) 29 N. Y. 619, it was held that a cashier's indorsement for collection would bind the bank in favor of a bona fide holder of negotiable paper, although it had been fraudulently discounted by the bank to which it was sent for collection.

When indorsements by a cashier are outside the ordinary course of business the question becomes a different one. But in Bissell v. First Nat. Bank of Franklin (1871) 69 Pa. 415, where a cashier of a private bank for the accommodation of a customer took a draft, which he was unable to cash and which had been made payable to his bank, to the cashier of another bank on the street after banking hours, and indorsed it to obtain a discount of the draft from the other cashier, it was held to be a valid transaction and indorsement. In this case the act seems to have been done in reality as bank business to accommodate the bank's own customer simply because the bank itself could not discount the draft for lack of funds.

But the indorsement by a cashier of a note made payable to the bank for the purpose of discount but which the bank had not taken and did not own, was held outside the scope of his authority, in Elliot v. Abbot (1842) 12 N. H. 549, 37 Am. Dec. 227. The indorsement here seems to have been merely to give the holder a right of action and made after he had taken it and after the maker had absconded. The plaintiff declared as indorsee and the court held that his action in that form must fail.

The payment of a depositor by transferring to him negotiable paper owned by the bank is not within the usual course of business and therefore not within the implied authority of the cashier, Schneitman v. Noble (1888) 75 Iowa, 120.

Especially when the bank has become insolvent the transfer of negotiable securities to give a preference to a creditor is outside the authority of the cashier, Lamb v. Cecil (1886) 28 W. Va. 659, 37 L. R. A.

Still more clearly is this true where the preferred creditor is one of the directors of the bank. And in such case a statutory restriction on transfers of property of the bank exceeding a thousand dollars without resolution of the board of directors is held applicable. Gillet v. Phillips (1856) 12 N. Y. 114.

A cashier may transfer a certificate of deposit issued by his bank and made in his favor describing him as cashier. St. Louis Perpetual Ins. Co. v. Cohen (1845) 9 Mo. 421.

A cashier's indorsement of a note to himself was held in Preston v. Cutter (1888) 64 N. H. 461, to be valid until avoided by the bank even if not authorized, but in that case it was found to have been authorized.

A statement by a cashier on the sale of a bill that it is perfectly safe although he did not indorse the bill, is held to amount to a warranty binding the bank. Sturges v. Bank of Circleville (1860) 11 Ohio St. 153, 78 Am. Dec. 236.

But the transfer of non-negotiable instruments of a bank is held to be outside the scope of the cashier's implied authority. Holt v. Bacon (1853) 25 Mass. 567; Barriok v. Austin (1855) 21 Barb. 241.

A blank transfer made by a cashier on stock held as collateral when he surrendered it to the debtor has been held to bind the bank in favor of a person who was subsequently defrauded by the aid of the blank transfer. Matthews v. Massachusetts Nat. Bank (1874) Holmes, C. C. 386.

A mere clerk acting for a cashier in his absence has authority to transmit a note to another bank for collection, but cannot otherwise transfer or dispose of it or give any title thereto except what is necessary for collection. Potter v. Merchants Bank of Albany (1864) 28 N. Y. 641, 86 Am. Dec. 273.

The vice-president of a national bank has prima facie authority to guarantee a note transferred by it, and the bank while retaining the proceeds is estopped to deny his authority to make the guaranty. People's Bank of Belleville v. Manufacturers Nat. Bank of Chicago (1880) 101 U. S. 181, 25 L. ed. 307.

Directors of a bank may authorize one of their number to indorse its securities. Northampton Bank v. Pepoon (1814) 11 Mass. 233.

The treasurer of a savings bank must have specific authority in order to be entitled to make indorsements outside of the ordinary course of business. Such an indorsement without recourse on paper in which the bank had only a nominal interest was held sufficient after it had been acquired in long enough to raise a presumption of his authority. Chase v. Hathorn (1873) 61 Me. 505.

Authority given to a savings bank treasurer to sell notes does not include authority to indorse them. Bradlee v. Warren Five Cents Sav. Bank (1879) 127 Mass. 107, 34 Am. Rep. 351.

III. Indorsement for accommodation.

Parol authority may be sufficient to authorize the for, payable to the association, and who had full power to collect said check—had not the power to indorse the check for the association, in order that he might have in hand the actual money which he was required to receive and to pay over to the treasurer. Although the by-laws do not in express terms give the power to indorse checks, or to give acquittances for money received on account of the association, yet these powers are necessarily implied in the power given to the secretary to collect its securities and pay the money for the same to the treasurer. While by the by-laws all moneys are to pass through the hands of the secretary into those of the treasurer, and he must have all the power necessary to enable him to collect the money for such securities, and have it on hand for that purpose, they do not contemplate that it shall remain in his hands for any considerable length of time, or that it shall be paid out by him at all; and, in order that no loss or inconvenience may result therefrom, the accounts showing the condition of its treasury were open at all times to the inspection of the board of directors, whose duty it was maker of a note to indorse for his own benefit the payee's name upon it. Turnbull v. Trout (1828) 1 Hall, 283.

Acquiescence in the signing of one's name by another on the back of a note as accommodation indorser may be sufficient evidence of authority to make the indorsement. Forayth v. Day (1858) 46 Me. 176.

The fact that an indorsement is made as agent is not sufficient to put one on inquiry as to the power to make the indorsement, which is in fact only for accommodation, especially when the agent states that the indorsement is to obtain money for the business of his principal. Edwards v. Thomas (1877) 66 Mo. 463.

But in England it is held that an indorsement "per pro" is notice that it is made by special authority and puts one on inquiry as to any limitations on the agent's authority. So an indorsement per proc. by the manager of a banking company when made for an accommodation is not binding if not in fact authorized. Alexander v. Mackenzie (1860) 6 C. B. 766, 18 L. J. C. P. 94, 18 Jur. 344.

The president of an insurance company has no implied authority to indorse a note for accommodation by virtue of his authority to indorse where the corporation is to receive the proceeds or benefit of the transaction. Aetna Nat. Bank v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. (1882) 50 Conn. 167.

The president of a manufacturing company is also held to have had no authority to indorse commercial paper for accommodation of makers or for a consideration paid by them. National Park Bank v. German American Mut. Warehousing & Secur. Co. (1889) 5 L. R. A. 673, 116 N. Y. 281.

A treasurer of a manufacturing company has no authority to indorse notes for accommodation by virtue of a custom to indorse notes in the usual course of business. Re Wrentham Mfg. Co. (1872) 2 Low. Dec. 119; Ex parte Estabrook (1877) Id. 547.

The managing agent of a corporation cannot bind it by an accommodation indorsement in favor of a person who took a note from the maker and required him to get an indorsement before accepting it in payment for a purchase. But the court said that if the note had been transferred by the corporation in the purchase of goods by it the indorsement would have been binding. Odiorne v. Maxcy (1816) 18 Mass. 178.

A bank discounting a note for the maker and passing the proceeds to his credit cannot hold the payee as an indorser on an unauthorized indorsement by his agent for accommodation, although the agent had general authority to indorse notes and bills. Wallace v. Branch Bank at Mobile (1840) 1 Ala. 565. The court says in this case that it is well settled that a person dealing with a special agent is bound to know the extent of his power. But the case did not involve any question of the rights of a bona fide holder without knowledge of the accommodation character of the indorsement.

To similar effect is the case of Kingsley v. Bank of State (1833) 3 Yerg. 107, in which it was held that power to "indorse notes payable and negotiable at 97 L. R. A.

the Branch Bank" did not authorize an original indorsement as security for a third person. In this case the note said at the bottom, "Credit the drawer J. N. by his atto.," and the note was in fact made to the bank and the drawer thereof was credited with the proceeds.

An indorsement by an agent for his own benefit under general power to make indorsements is not binding in favor of a bank which discounts the paper for the agent. Stainback v. Bank of Virginia (1854) 11 Gratt. 269.

An indorsement for accommodation by the treasurer of a corporation is not a corporate act and does not make the corporation liable even to a bona fide holder in the absence of any by-law or usage or ratification showing his authority to make indorsements. Wahlig v. Standard Pump Co. (1890) 30 N. Y. S. R. 890.

In the absence of any proof that notes indorsed by the manager of a corporation were in its business, or that it received any benefit, or that the manager had any authority to bind it in that form, but where it seemed on the contrary that it did not concern the corporation's business, the court regarded the indorsement as without authority. No question of a bona fide holder was suggested. Middlesex County Bank v. Hirsch Brothers Veneer Mfg. Co. (1890) 24 N. Y. S. R. 297.

But it is expressly and clearly held that a bona fide holder can recover against the principal on indorsements made by an agent who has general power to indorse, although the indorsements are in fact made for accommodation only. North River Bank v. Aymar (1842) 3 Hill, 263.

So the usage of a secretary to indorse notes when acquiesced in by the corporation makes his indorsement for accommodation binding on the company in favor of a bona fide holder. Bank of Auburn v. Putnam (1867) 8 Keyes, 343, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 80.

So a corporation was held liable to a bona fide holder on an accommodation indorsement of a note by its president and financial officer for the corporation in Mechanics Bkg. Assn. v. New York & S. White Lead Co. (1866) 36 N. Y. 505. But in this case no question was made as to the authority of the officer.

The indorsement of a note by a cashier merely for accommodation binds the bank in favor of a bona fide purchaser. Houghton v. First Nat. Bank of Elkhorn (1870) 26 Wis. 663, 7 Am. Rep. 107.

But a cashier cannot bind the bank as an accommodation indorser of his own note. West St. Louis Sav. Bank v. Parmelee (1877) 96 U. S. 537, 24 L. ed. 490, affirming West St. Louis Sav. Bank v. Shawnee County Bank, 8 Dill. 408.

Somewhat akin to the subject is the decision that an agent employed to collect, who for the accommodation of the debtor indorses a bill in his own name and gets money which he sends to his principal, cannot charge the principal with the loss when compelled to pay on his indorsement. Hines v. Butler (1844) 38 N. C. 307.

each month to meet, ascertain the amount in the treasury, and loan the same if practicable. Had these officers discharged their duties, the exact condition of the fund arising from the collection of the loan to Richardson would have been known to them within ten or fifteen days after it had been received by Harris, and they could have then taken such measures for its disposal, and the protection of the association, as to them might have seemed necessary and proper. If the association has met with any loss by reason of a misapplication of that fund, it must be charged to a breach of the trust reposed in one of its officers, and the neglect of duty by the others. It cannot be charged to the bank on account of this transaction had with its secretary, who therein acted clearly within the scope of his authority.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

William McMULLAN, Resp't.,

v.

DICKINSON CO., App't.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Where, under a contract for personal service, the wages are payable in installments, and, before the term of service expires, the master dismisses the servant without his fault, and the wages are paid up to the time of dismissal.—Held, the liability of the master to the servant is not an absolute liability for wages for constructive service during the balance of the term, but a contingent liability of indemnity for loss of wages. This liability accrues by installments on successive contingencies, each of which consists in the failure of the servant without his fault to earn, during an installment period, the amount of wages which he would have earned had the contract been performed, and the deficiency is the measure of damages. The original breach is not total, but the failure to pay the successive installments constitutes successive breaches, and successive actions may be maintained for the recovery of the installments of damages as they accrue, if any.

2. This is the rule of damages usually allowed under the action of constructive service, but that action is rejected as false and inconsistent with that rule, while the rule itself is retained.

3. It does not follow, because of this, that the discharged servant cannot, if he so elect, consider the breach total, bring an action for all his damages, and recover all accruing up to the time of the trial; but it is held that prospective damages beyond the time of trial are too contingent and uncertain to be allowed.

NOTE.—The above case is in direct conflict with that of Olmstead v. Bach (Md.) 22 L. R. A. 74, in sustaining the right to successive actions for breach of contract by wrongful discharge of employé, and the other authorities on the question are extensively discussed in these cases.

B. 178; Wood, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 127, p. 261; 2 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 666, pp. 839, 407.

Plaintiff claims to recover in this action for purely constructive service.

The first action having been brought to recover upon the theory of constructive service wholly, this former action was in contemplation of law an action for damages for the breach of the contract caused by the wrongful discharge. The present action is likewise purely an action for damages for the breach of the contract.

A servant wrongfully discharged has his election of remedies.

1. He may treat the contract as continuing and bring the action against the master for breaking it.

2. If wages are not paid up to the time of the discharge, he may treat the contract as rescinded and sue on a quantum meruit for services actually performed.

Wood, Mast. & S. p. 250.

By the first remedy the servant can recover not only for wages actually earned but also for probable loss in being unable to secure equally profitable employment.

Ibid.; Gandell v. Pontigny, 4 Campb. 375; Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576.

This pernicious doctrine of constructive service received sanction in some of the earlier decisions of the nisi prius courts.

Thompson v. Wood, 1 Hilt. 96; Huntington v. Ogdensburgh & L. C. R. Co. 83 How. Pr. 416; Heim v. Wolf, 1 E. D. Smith, 73.

These cases, however, recognizing this doctrine, were subsequently overruled in Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 862, 19 Am. Rep. 285.

After the servant is dismissed he cannot recover for services.

Perry v. Dickerson, 85 N. Y. 345, 39 Am. Rep. 663; Colburn v. Woodworth, 81 Barb. 881; Howard v. Daly, supra.

It is immaterial that the plaintiff may have intended only to sue in the first action for wages upon the theory of constructive service; it must be held to be an action for damages whether so intended or not.

The prosecution of subsequent action by the servant after one recovery has been had may be enjoined in equity even though the wages are payable weekly. The contract is entire and but one action is maintainable.

Turboz v. Hartenstein, 4 Baxt. 78; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Staub, 7 Lea, 397; Litchenstein v. Brooks, 75 Tex. 196; Chamberlin v. McCallister, 6 Dana, 352; Keedy v. Long, 5 L. R. A. 759, 71 Md. 885; Keedy v. Orane, 71 Md. 385.

Plaintiff in the former action had a right to recover for all the damage sustained by reason of the alleged wrongful discharge, both present and prospective.

Under a contract for a certain fixed sum payable in installments, a party who is prevented from performing may treat the contract as still subsisting and sue for each installment as it falls due.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th of February, 1892, the plaintiff entered into a written agreement with the defendant corporation, whereby it agreed to employ him as its assistant manager, from and after that date, as long as he should own in his own name fifty shares of the capital stock of said corporation, fully paid up, and the business of said corporation shall be continued, not exceeding the term of the existence of said corporation, and pay him for such services the sum of $1,500 per annum, payable monthly during that time, and whereby he agreed to perform said services during that time. He has ever since owned, as provided, the fifty shares of said stock, and performed said services ever since that time until the 28th of October, 1893, when he was discharged and dismissed by the defendant without cause. He alleges these facts in his complaint in this action, and also alleges that he has been ever since he was so dismissed, and is now, ready and willing to perform said services as so agreed upon, and that there is now due him the sum of $125 for each of the months of March and April, 1894, and prays judgment for the sum of $250. The defendant in its answer, for a second defense, alleges that on March 2, 1894, plaintiff commenced a similar action to this for the recovery of the sum of $512, for the period of time from his said discharge to the 1st of March, 1894, alleging the same facts and the same breach, and that on April 16, 1894, he recovered judgment in that action against this defendant for that sum and costs, and this is pleaded in bar of the present action. The plaintiff demurred to this defense, and from an order sustaining the demurrer the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff brought each action for installments of wages claimed to be due, on the theory of constructive service. The doctrine of constructive service was first laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Gandell v. Pontigny, 4 Campb. 375, and this case was followed in England and this country for a long time (Wood, Mast. & S. 254), and is still upheld by several courts. Isaacs v. Davies, 63 Ga. 169; Armfield v. Nash, 81 Mass. 361; Strauss v. Meertief, 64 Ala. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 8. It has been repudiated by the courts of England (Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 74; Wood, Mast. & S. 254), and by many of the courts in this country (Id.; and notes to Decamp v. Hewitt, 43 Am. Dec. 204), as unsound and inconsistent with itself, as it assumes that the discharged servant has since his discharge remained ready, willing, and able to perform the services for which he was hired, while sound principles require him to seek employment elsewhere, and thereby mitigate the damages caused by his discharge. His remedy is for damages for breach of the contract, and not for wages for its performance. But the courts, which deny his right to recover wages as for constructive service, have denied him any remedy except one for damages, which, if seemingly more logical in theory, is most absurd in its practical results. These courts give him no remedy except the one which is given for the recovery of loss of profits for the breach of other contracts, and hold that the contract is entire, even, though the wages are payable in installments, and that he exhausts his remedy by an action for a part of such damages, no matter how long the contract would have run if it had not been broken. See James v. Allen County, 44 Ohio St. 236, 58 Am. Rep. 831; Moody v. Lecerich, 4 Daly, 401; Colburn v. Woodworth, 81 Barb. 381; Booge v. Pacific Railroad, 83 Mo. 212, 89 Am. Dec. 160. No one action to recover all the damages for such a breach of such a contract can furnish any adequate remedy, or do anything like substantial justice between the parties. By its charter the life of this corporation is thirty years. If the action is commenced immediately after the breach, how can prospective damages be assessed for this thirty years, or for even one year? To presume that the discharged servant will not be able for a large part of that time to obtain other employment, and award him large damages, might be grossly unjust to the defendant. Again, the servant is entitled to actual indemnity, not to such speculative indemnity as must necessarily be given by awarding him prospective damages. His contract was not a speculative one, and the law should not make it such. That men can and do find employment is the general rule, and enforced idleness the exception. It should not be presumed in advance that the exceptional will occur. This is not in conflict with the rule that, in an action for retrospective damages for such a breach, the burden is on the defendant to show that the discharged servant could have found employment. In that case, as in others, reasonable diligence will be presumed. When it appears that he has not found employment or been employed, there is no presumption that it was his fault, and, under such circumstances, it will be presumed that the exceptional has happened. But to presume that the exceptional will happen is very different. In an action for such a breach of a contract for services, prospective damages beyond the day of trial are too contingent and uncertain, and cannot be assessed. 2 Sutherland, Damages, 471; Gordon v. Brewster, 7 Wis. 355; Twiler v. Armour, 24 Ala. 194; Wright v. Falkner, 87 Ala. 274; Colburn v. Woodworth, 81 Barb. 385. Then, if the discharged servant can have but one action, it is necessary for him to starve and wait as long as possible before commencing it. If he waits longer than six years after the breach, the statute of limitations will have run, and he will lose his whole claim. If he brings his action within the six years, he will lose his claim for the balance of the time after the day of trial. Under this rule, the measure of damages for the breach of a thirty year contract is no greater than for the breach of a six or seven year contract. Such a remedy is a travesty on justice. Although the servant has stipulated for a weekly, monthly, or quarterly income, it assumes that he can live for years without any income, after which time he will cease to live or need income. The fallacy lies in assuming that, on the breach of the contract, loss of wages is analogous to loss of profits, and that the same rule of damages applies, while in fact the cases are wholly dissimilar, and there is scarcely a parallel between them. In the one case the liability is absolute; in the other it is contingent. If the rule of damages were the same, then, in the case of the breach of the contract for service the discharged servant should be allowed only the amount which the stipulated wages exceed the market value of the service to be performed, without regard to whether he could obtain other employment or not. If the stipulated wages did not exceed the market value of the service, he would be entitled to only nominal damages; and in no case could his failure to find other employment vary the measure of damages. Clearly, this is not the rule. In the one case the liability is a contingent liability for loss of wages; in the other case it is an absolute liability for loss of profits. Such contingent liability cannot be ascertained in advance of the happening of the contingency, and that is why prospective damages for loss of wages are too contingent and are too speculative and uncertain to be allowed, while retrospective damages for such loss are of the most certain character. On the other hand, if damages for loss of profits are too speculative and uncertain to be allowed, they are equally so, whether prospective or retrospective. "The pecuniary advantages which would have been realized but for the defendant's act must be ascertained without the aid which their actual existence would afford. The plaintiff's right to recover for such a loss depends on his proving with sufficient certainty that such advantages would have resulted, and, therefore, that the act complained of prevented them." 1 Sutherland, Damages, 1st ed. 107.

It is our opinion that the servant wrongfully discharged is entitled to indemnity for loss of wages, and for the full measure of this indemnity the master is clearly liable. This liability accrues by installments on successive contingencies. Each contingency consists in the failure of the servant without his fault to earn, during the installment period named in the contract, the amount of wages which he would have earned if the contract had been performed, and the master is liable for the deficiency. This rule of damages is not consistent with the doctrine of constructive service, but it is the rule which has usually been applied by the courts which adopted that doctrine. Under that doctrine the master should be held liable to the discharged servant for wages as if earned, while in fact he is held only for indemnity for loss of wages. The fiction of constructive service is false and illogical, but the measure of damages given under that fiction is correct and logical. It is simply a case of a wrong reason given for a correct rule. Instead of rejecting the false reason and retaining the correct rule, many courts have rejected both the rule and the reason. In our opinion, this rule of damages should be retained; but the true ground on which it is based is not that of constructive service, but the liability of the master to indemnify the discharged servant, not to pay him wages, and this indemnity accrues by installments. The original breach is not total, but the failure to pay the successive installments constitutes successive breaches. Since the days of Lord Ellenborough this class of cases has been in some courts an exception to the rule that there can be but one action for damages for the breach of a contract, and there are strong reasons why it should be an exception. Because the discharged servant may, if he so elects, bring successive actions for the installments of indemnity as they accrue, it does not follow that he cannot elect to consider the breach total, and bring one action for all his damages, and recover all of the same accruing up to the time of trial. Fowler v. Armour, 24 Ala. 194; Strauss v. Meertief, 64 Ala. 299, 88 Am. Rep. 8. But the wrongdoer can have no such election. He should not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and, for the purpose of preventing the use of any adequate remedy and defeating any adequate recovery, to insist that his own breach is total.

*A libel on two or more persons (although not associated together in business), contained in a single writing, and published by a single act, constitutes but one offense.

(February 1, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Otter Tail County overruling a demurrer to an indictment charging him with the publication of libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. W. Zollman, for appellant:

If the publication complained of is libelous within section 211 of the Penal Code, then a substantive offense has been committed against each of the three banks. There are then three distinct offenses, just so much so, as if three different crimes had been committed. The fact that the three offenses were committed in one act does not alter the case.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Although the trial court has in form certified all of the seven specific objections made to the indictment in defendant's demurrer, yet his counsel refers to only two of these in his brief, and of these two only one is worthy of any consideration, viz.: Does the indictment charge more than one offense? The defendant was indicted for a libel on three national banks (not in any way associated with each other in business), the libel against all three being contained in a single writing, published at one time, and by a single act. Defendant's contention is that this constitutes three separate offenses,—one against each bank libeled; and he likens it to a case where a person by a single act murders two or more persons. Without stopping to consider whether a person might not be indicted in the same court for any misdemeanor, such as assault, committed on two or more persons by a single act, we think that the case suggested by counsel is not analogous. His argument proceeds upon the false assumption that the gist of the crime of libel is the injury to the reputation of the person libeled. It is true that no publication is indictable unless it exposes the person of whom it is published to hatred, contempt, etc., or has a tendency to injure him in his business, but the indictability of the act does not come alone from harm to his reputation. The general policy of the law is to leave the care of men's reputations to themselves. No damage done to a reputation (at least, unless the further element of conspiracy enters into the act) is, at common law, in and of itself, a foundation for a criminal prosecution. The law makes the publication of a libel punishable as a crime, not because of injury to the reputation, but because the publication of such articles tends to affect injuriously the peace and good order of society. This has always been recognized as the reason why libel is a public wrong. For example, Starkie says: "It may consist in the tendency of the communication to weaken or dissolve religious or moral sentiments, or to alienate men's minds from the established constitution of the state, or to engender hatred and contempt of the king or his government or the houses of parliament or the administration of public justice, or in general to produce some particular inconvenience or mischief, or to excite individuals to the commission of a breach of the peace, or other illegal acts." Bishop defines libel as "any representation in writing," etc., "calculated to create disturbances of the peace, to corrupt public morals, or to lead to any act which when done is indictable." 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 909. Of course, these common-law definitions are not in all respects applicable under our Criminal Code, but they are fully in point as illustrating the gist of libel considered as a crime. It is on the same principle, and for the same reason, that it is made a misdemeanor to publish anything which exposes the memory of any deceased person to hatred, contempt, etc. It cannot injure the dead man, but it tends to create a breach of the peace by inciting his surviving friends to avenge the insult of the family.

At least, such is the reason usually given in the books. The publication of a libel produces public mischief, and it is for that reason that it is an indictable offense. The more persons affected by the libel, the greater the public wrong; but one act of publication, however many persons are affected by it, constitutes but one crime, although each of the parties injured by it may bring a civil action for damages. The gist of the offense of libel is the publication of something which tends, in contemplation of law, to affect injuriously the peace and good order of society, because it injuriously affects the reputation, memory, or business of individuals. In the case of homicide suggested by counsel the gist of the offense is the taking of human life. It is that, and not the particular means by which it is accomplished, which the law forbids. If it be suggested that, where the libel affects more than one person, the defendant may desire to prove different lines of defense as to each, and therefore there should be a severance of the charge, our answer is that we see no difficulty in the defendant proving, under a plea of not guilty, any defense which he has. Of course, the defense must be as broad as the charge, but, if it is more difficult to establish the defense where several persons are libeled in one publication, that is the consequence of the defendant's own act. See 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 888, and note. There are very few authorities directly in point on this question, for it seems to have been very rarely raised, it being apparently generally assumed that such an indictment was good; as, for example, in Crowe v. People, 92 Ill. 281. Bishop lays it down as the law. 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 487. So, also, does the supreme court of Kentucky, in Tracy v. Com., 87 Ky. 578, the only case we have found in which the rule was ever questioned.

Collins, J., concurring:

My first impressions were that upon principle as well as upon authority it would have to be held that the indictment charged more than one offense. But when we reflect that the gist of the offense of libel is the publication of something which tends, in contemplation of law, to injuriously affect the good order and peace of society, because of the injurious effect it has upon the reputation or business or memory of individuals, we are obliged to admit that upon principle it cannot be claimed that more than one offense was alleged. And in respect to the authorities it may be stated that we are not cited to one authority, and we have found none, which support the contention of defendant's counsel. The right of the prosecution to charge a libel published, as this is alleged to have been, reflecting on two or more persons, as a single offense, seems to have generally gone unchallenged. Whenever the question has been raised, the courts have sustained the practice adopted in this case. For these reasons, I concur in the views expressed in the main opinion.

Canty, J., dissenting:

I cannot agree to the foregoing opinions. It seems to me that there is a crime against the person. Section 211 of the Penal Code provides: "A malicious publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, sign, or otherwise than by mere speech, which exposes any living person or the memory of any person deceased, to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes or tends to cause any person to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure any person, corporation, or association of persons in his or their business or occupation, is a libel." The gist of the action is the injury to the corporation in its business, and not an injury to the good order of society in general. This more clearly appears after the trial begins. It immediately assumes the form of three actions on trial together, and having, perhaps, nothing in common except that they are all against the same defendant, and all arose at the same time, the issues and evidence in each being totally distinct and dissimilar. As to one bank, he may justify by attempting to prove the truth of the charge, and his good motive; as to another bank, he may attempt to prove a sufficient excuse under that part of section 213 which provides that "the publication is excused when it is honestly made, in the belief of its truth, and upon reasonable grounds for this belief, and consists of fair comments upon the conduct of a person in respect of public affairs;" as to the third bank, he may offer proof both of justification and excuse. Supposing the jury acquit him of libeling the first bank, but cannot agree as to the other two. Should the court refuse to receive such verdict, and discharge the jury for failure to agree, or should the court receive the verdict of acquittal as to one bank without an agreement as to all? Most certainly it should. Will this amount to an acquittal as to the other two banks? Certainly not. Supposing the defendant should request a return of three verdicts, one as to each bank, or what would be the same, a distinct finding of guilty or not guilty as to each bank, and the trial court should refuse such request, should a general verdict of guilty be allowed to stand? It might be that four of the jurors believed the defendant guilty as to the first bank, four others believed him guilty as to the second bank, and four others as to the third bank, while as to each bank eight jurors believed him not guilty, yet, by treating the libel of the three banks as one offense, the twelve jurors would vote to find the defendant guilty. Clearly, to prevent such an outrageous result, it would be the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury to treat the libel as to each bank as a separate and distinct charge, and vote on it separately. It is true that the separate character of each charge does not so readily appear until the defense opens its case on the trial, but this is because the state has so little to prove in the first instance, and that proof happens to be the same as to each case; the burden of proof, except as to publication, being thrown on the defendant. To hold that this indictment charges but one offense, and not three offenses, is to sacrifice substance to form. That there once were, and may yet be, criminal libels that were not offenses against the person, does not prove that this is not such an offense. If these three banks, taken together, constituted an "association of persons," within the meaning of section 211, and they were libeled in their associated capacity, it would constitute but one offense. But this is not such a case. I am of the opinion that the indictment charges three separate offenses, and that the order overruling the demurrer should be reversed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

A. G. FRERE

v.

Victor VON SCHOELER, Appt.

(47 La. Ann. 324.)

* The nineteenth paragraph of the eighth section of Act No. 150 of 1890, which imposes a license tax upon every person who shall engage in the business or avocation of operating one or more towboats to be graduated according to the gross annual receipts of said business, is illegal, unconstitutional, null, and void, because it is in conflict with, and contrary to, the provisions of the third clause of the eighth section of article 1 of the United States Constitution, familiarly known as the "Commerce Clause," it appearing that the defendant was operating his boats under a license or permit from the United States government, and that his towboats were engaged in traversing the waters of the Bayou Teche and the Atchafalaya and Mississippi rivers and their tributaries, and in operating between different states.

(December 10, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for the Parish of St. Mary's in a proceeding brought to compel the payment of a license tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. Caffery & Son, for appellant: Congress alone has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, ¶ 8.

The license required under Act 101 of 1886, although based upon gross annual receipts, is collectible on the second day of the year, while the receipts are mere potentialities or expectancies; consequently it cannot be exacted from an interstate trader without coming within the constitutional prohibition.

A statute of a state imposing a tax upon the gross receipts is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284, 21 L. ed. 164.

On rehearing.

The unconstitutionality of a part of a statute does not necessarily invalidate the whole. The same statute, and even the same section, may contain unconstitutional provisions and also salutary and useful provisions, not obnoxious to any constitutional exceptions.

Moore v. New Orleans, 83 La. Ann. 726; State v. Ebnicio, 88 La. Ann. 253.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding on the part of a tax collector by rule on the defendant to show cause why he should not be compelled to pay a state and parish license of $30 each for prosecuting the business and occupation of running and operating the towboat Jim Watson, within the limits of the parish of St. Mary, in this state; or, in default of so doing, that he be adjudged and condemned to cease the further pursuit of said business or occupation. The defendant's answer is, in effect, that the statute of the state under which the aforesaid licenses are exacted (paragraph 19 of section 8 of Act No. 150 of 1890) is unconstitutional, null, and void, because same conflicts with and is contrary to the interstate commerce clause of the United States Constitution, and hence the licenses claimed cannot be imposed. The answer admits that defendant is engaged in the occupation designated in the rule and in the statute, but its representation is that he has already paid and had in his possession, a license from the United States government, and that such license entitles him to pursue his occupation, which is that of operating towboats in the various navigable watercourses of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Ohio and

NOTE.—Power to impose local license tax on vessels licensed by United States.

The above case seems to be clearly within the authority of Harmon v. Chicago, 147 U. S. 386, 37 L. ed. 216, which holds unconstitutional an ordinance of Chicago which attempted to impose a license tax on tugs engaged in navigating the Chicago river. The court held that expenditures of the city in deepening and improving the river could not justify the imposition of such a license tax, saying: "The license fee is a tax for the use of navigable waters, not a charge by way of compensation for any specific improvement." It was also said that the requirement of a license in that case was "equivalent to declaring that such vessels shall not enjoy the privilege conferred by the United States except upon the condition imposed by the city. This ordinance is therefore plainly and palpably in conflict with the exclusive power of congress to regulate commerce, interstate and foreign." This being the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on a question which can be settled only by that court, it is not necessary to seek for other decisions. B. A. R.

Pennsylvania, and embracing those of the Bayou Teche, the Atchafalaya and Mississippi rivers, and the Gulf of Mexico, without the payment of any additional exaction, such as that which is sought to be imposed under the license law of Louisiana. The evidence shows that the area of defendant's operations with his towboats is similar to that indicated in the answer. The defendant comes within the purview of the statute. Is it unconstitutional? The act levies a license tax of $30 upon "every business . . . of operating one or more towboats, or tugboats, . . . based on the gross annual receipts of said business." And paragraph 19 of the eighth section of the statute declares that "when the receipts are less than $25,000 the license shall be thirty dollars." Act No. 150 of 1890, par. 19, § 8. This is an occupation license tax, and the same is to be collected of the person pursuing the avocation or business: and it is in no sense a property tax assessed against the property that is employed in the business of the owner, nor is it a tax levied on the cargo or boat. Parish of East Feliciana v. Levy, 40 La. Ann. 832. A question somewhat analogous to the one presented for our consideration is discussed and decided by the supreme court in State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284, 21 L. ed. 164. In that case, the question was whether the act of the Pennsylvania legislature levying a tax upon a railroad company of three quarters of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts of the company was in conflict with the commerce clause of the United States Constitution (U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, cl. 3), it being therein claimed and contended that the act was unconstitutional in so far as it taxes that "portion of the gross receipts of companies which are derived from transportation from the state [of Pennsylvania] to another state, or into the state of Pennsylvania from another state"; and, the supreme court of the state [of Pennsylvania] having decided adversely to the claim, the case was brought up for review." The court in passing on that question said: "We think that such taxation may be laid upon a valuation or may be an excise; and that, in exacting an excise tax from their corporations, the states are not obliged to impose a fixed sum upon the franchises, or upon the value of them, but they may demand a graduated contribution, proportioned either to the value of the privileges granted, or to the extent of their exercise, or to the results of such exercise. No mode of effecting this, and no forms of expression which have no meaning beyond this, can be regarded as violating the Constitution." Proceeding, then, to the discussion of the case, the court reaches this conclusion, viz.: "This tax is laid upon the gross receipts of the company; laid upon a fund which has become the property of the company, mingled with its other property, and possibly expended in improvements, or put out at interest. The statute does not look beyond the corporation to those who may have contributed to its treasury." And, in conclusion, the court adds: "But we think it may safely be laid down that the gross receipts of the railroad or canal companies, after they have reached the treasury of the carriers, though they may have been derived in part from transportation of freight between states, have become subject to legitimate taxation." But the instant case does not present the question of a tax upon the gross receipts of the defendant's business at all. He is proceeded against by the shorthand, compulsory process of the revenue law for the collection of a license or price of a permit to prosecute his avocation of operating towboats, and the alternative of the tax collector's rule is that, on the defendant's default in making payment of the license, he be adjudged and condemned to discontinue the prosecution of his avocation, notwithstanding he had previously obtained a license from the United States permitting him to pursue said calling. The case of Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 60, 28 L. ed. 653, presents the issue here raised, and, to our thinking, it is decisive of the controversy, and conclusively against the contention of the plaintiff. "But the license fee in the present case," says the court, "is not a tax upon the boats as property, according to any valuation. The very law authorizing its imposition declares that it shall not be construed to be a tax on property. It is said, however, to be a tax on an occupation, and for that reason not a regulation of commerce. If it were a tax upon the income derived from the business, it might be justified by the principle of the decision in the case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284, 21 L. ed. 164, which shows the distinction between a tax on transportation and a tax upon its fruits, realized and reduced to possession, so as to become a part of the general capital and property of the taxpayer. But here is not a tax on the profits and income after they have been realized from the business. It is a charge explicitly made as the price of the privilege of navigating the Mississippi river between New Orleans and the Gulf, in the coastwise trade, as the condition on which the state of Louisiana consents that the boats of the plaintiff in error may be employed by him according to the terms of the license granted under the authorities of congress. The sole occupation sought to be subjected to the tax is that of using and enjoying the license of the United States to employ these particular vessels in the coasting trade, and the state then seeks to burden with an exaction, fixed at its own pleasure, the very right to which the plaintiff in error is entitled under, and which he derives from, the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Louisiana statute declares expressly that, if he refuses or neglects to pay the license tax imposed upon him for using his boats in this way, he shall not be permitted to act under and avail himself of the license granted by the United States, but may be enjoined from so doing by judicial process. The conflict between the two authorities is direct and express. What one declares may be done without the tax, the other declares shall not be done except upon the payment of the tax. In such an opposition, the only question is, Which is the superior authority? and, reduced to that, it furnishes its own answer." There is no distinction between that case and the one before the court. The principle involved in each case is the same, and must control our decision. And the supreme court, in the case cited, overruled the decision of this court in New Orleans v. Eclipse Tow Boat Co. 38 La. Ann. 647, 39 Am. Rep. 279. Vide Sinnot v. Davenport, 63 U. S. 22 How. 237, 16 L. ed. 243.

The judgment appealed from must be reversed. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is further ordered and decreed that the demands of the plaintiff in rule be rejected, at his costs in both courts.

Rehearing denied February 25 1895.

ST. CHARLES STREET R. CO. et al.

*1. The intentional causing of loss by one man to another, without justifiable cause, and with a malicious purpose to inflict it is of itself a wrong, and it is a general principle that every act of man which causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it.

2. While it may be conceded that a person has an absolute right to refuse to have business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal be based upon reason, or be the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice, and that there is no law which could reach him for so doing, it is not equally true that he can always, from such motives, influence another person to do the same without incurring legal liability. The question of liability or not, in different cases, would be dependent upon their own special facts, and upon varying conditions and relations.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' malicious interference with his business. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter H. Rogers and W. B. Lancaster, for appellant:

There is a law prohibiting one from doing any act injurious to his neighbor. Civil Code, art. 2292, sets forth that an obligation may arise "from an act of the party," and article 2315 provides that, "every act whatever of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it."

To influence others not to deal with a neighbor is an act.—a positive, not a negative, agency,—whether done by means of persuasion or intimidation, or otherwise. It obliges *Headnotes by NICHOLLS, CH. J.

NOTE.—The liability to a merchant for keeping prospective customers away from his store by means of threats to discharge them from employment if they deal with him is a question presented for the first time, we think, in the above case. The decision plainly recognizes a liability in case of malice that would not exist in its absence. This case is plainly distinguishable from cases of 27 L. R. A.

its author to repair any damage arising from it; provided it happened "by his fault," as when done through malice.

Dely v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 562; State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46.

Mr. Harry H. Hall, for defendants:

Defendants had the legal right to discharge their servants, arbitrarily and without cause. The exercise of a legal right gives no cause of action against them. If the plaintiff be injured, it is damnum absque injuria.

Orr v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 12 La. Ann. 255, 68 Am. Dec. 770.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff seeks to recover a judgment against the St. Charles Street Railroad Company and Thomas Newman, in solido, for $5,000. Defendants filed an exception of "no cause of action," which having been sustained, and the suit dismissed, plaintiff has appealed.

The action is grounded upon the following allegations: "That Newman is the foreman of the company, and as such has the power of employing and discharging its employes; that for a considerable time, less than one year, he has persistently abused said power, in making use of it for persecuting petitioner and injuring him in his business, as herein-after set forth; that petitioner is proprietor of a substantial grocery store at the corner of Baronne and Eighth streets, of New Orleans, the stable and buildings of said company occupying another corner of the same street intersection; that Newman has frequently and continuously instructed the men under his control, in said capacity, that they must not deal at petitioner's store, and that he would discharge them if they did; that he especially directed such commands and threats to Henry Rigner, Joseph Santos, and Lee Halliday in the early part of the year 1893, say in the months of February and March, and thereabouts, and to various other persons within the past eight months; that he did discharge one Andrew Heffner from the employ of said company on or about the 19th of March, 1893, for no other cause than that said Heffner had manifested friendship for petitioner, by speaking in his favor; that the animus of all this was that of ill will against petitioner, and the deliberate desire to injure him; that, in all said conduct and actions, he was within the scope of his employment by said company; that in many other ways said Newman has manifested his ill feeling and malevolence towards petitioner; that petitioner has suffered loss in his business to the extent of one thousand dollars, in the patronage thus driven away and diverted, which he would otherwise have enjoyed; that petitioner has also suffered great annoyance and humiliation from the no-inducing employes to leave service or any other kind of cases as to inducing breach of contract, for which, see note to Boysen v. Thorn (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 238; and also from cases of conspiracy to interfere with business, since in the present case no conspiracy appears and no contract with the merchant is alleged to have been interfered with.

tority which their persecution has obtained in the neighborhood, through the openness with which it was carried on, and from the ridicule thereby engendered, the injury from which he estimates at not less than five hundred dollars; that he is entitled to punitive and exemplary damages in the further sum of thirty-five hundred dollars for said tortious, wanton, malicious, and unprovoked persecution."

Defendants' counsel in his brief refers us to the case of Orr v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 12 La. Ann. 255, 68 Am. Dec. 770, as containing a clear exposition of the principle upon which this defense rests. He says: "Defendants had the legal right to discharge their servants arbitrarily and without cause. The exercise of a legal right gives no cause of action against them. If the plaintiff be injured, it is damnum absque injuria. No authority has been suggested in opposition to the principle that a man has an undoubted right to employ labor, and fix the terms and conditions of that employment, in his discretion. In the instant case, defendants had the absolute legal right, the exercise of which was proper in the conduct of their business, to prohibit their employes from going to grocery stores or bar rooms, or from dealing in any way or with any person in such manner as might be prejudicial to the interest of their business. They had the legal right to insist upon abstinence in dealing as a condition precedent to their employment or retention in service. If the employes did not see fit to comply with these restrictions, they were at liberty to leave the employment. They were not coerced, in any sense of the word. They were free agents. They could have continued dealing with plaintiff, if they saw fit, but they could not so deal and remain in the employ of the defendant company. Defendants were exercising a legal right." The plaintiff in this case does not appear before us either as one who, having sought employment from defendants, and been refused by reason of what he alleges to be unreasonable, unwarrantable requirements at his hands, as conditions precedent to being taken into service, claims damages from defendants, nor as one who, having been employed by the defendants, under circumstances such as to have legally authorized the employer, at any moment, and without cause assigned, to discharge him, claims that he has legal ground of complaint, for the reason that the discharge was arbitrary, wanton, and malicious. Had this case presented features of that kind, the arguments which counsel makes would be unanswerable. A complainant, under such circumstances, would find himself met by the principle, which has taken the shape of a maxim, "neminem laedit qui jure suo utitur." The issue before us is whether, while the plaintiff, engaged in a lawful business, is legitimately earning his livelihood by and through the custom and patronage of others, the defendant, a corporation, and its foreman, having the power of employing and discharging large numbers of persons, can, without incurring legal liability therefor, without justifiable cause, and moved solely by a malicious and wanton intent and design to injure the plaintiff, use their power of employment and discharge upon persons seeking employment from them, or already in their employ, so as to cause those who are already dealing with the plaintiff to desist from further doing so, and those who would desire to do so from carrying out their wishes, by threats of nonemployment or discharge. In so doing the defendants would not only control their own will, action, and conduct, but forcibly control and change, from pure motives of malice, the choice and will of others, through fear of nonemployment or discharge. This will and power of choice both the plaintiff and the parties themselves are entitled to have left free, and not have coerced, in order simply to work the former damage and injury. In Lougshore Printing & Pub. Co. v. Howell (Or.) 38 Pac. Rep. 558, the court said, "Every man has a right to require that he be protected in his property rights," and quotes approvingly and correctly a citation to the effect that "the labor and skill of the workman or the professional man (be it of high or low degree), the plant of a manufacturer, the equipment of a farmer, the investments of commerce, are all, in equal sense, property." In Dela v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, the court said: "Every man has a right to use the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, skill and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition, but he has the right to be protected from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If the disturbance or loss come as a result of competition or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right, by contract or otherwise, is interfered with. But if it comes from merely wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition, or service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing." In the case at bar, defendants have committed the error of enlarging a right into a wrong, and applying to it the maxim, "neminem laedit qui jure suo utitur." In dealing with the question before us, we could entirely disregard, as a mere incident or accident of the case, the particular instrumentality by and through which the alleged damage and injury to plaintiff were inflicted. If it was accomplished under circumstances such as to give rise to legal liability, it would matter little whether it was through the power and influence which an employer can bring to bear upon the conduct and actions of his actual or prospective employes, or through some other means.

For the purposes of this opinion, we have taken up and followed the line of discussion and argument adopted and presented by both sides, and passed upon the general legal proposition advanced by plaintiff and disputed by defendant, without subjecting plaintiff's petition, as to its exact language and arrangement, to the strictest rules of pleading. From that standpoint, it is open to some criticism, but we have viewed it as substantially raising the issues presented in the briefs. We do not undertake to lay down any general rule by which should be ascertained and tested the right of one man to control and direct, against his will, the action and conduct of another, to the injury and prejudice of third persons, under the different relations and varying conditions of life. We do not mean, for an instant, to say, that defendants may not, on the trial of this case upon the merits, justify any conduct which they may have pursued in respect to the plaintiff. We simply say that the whole matter should be thrown open to inquiry and investigation. In the case of Dels v. Winfree, cited above, counsel laid down a proposition which the court said might be conceded as correct, to the effect that "a person has an absolute right to refuse to have business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal is based upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice, and there is no law which forces a man to part with his title to his property;" but it declared that "the privilege here asserted must be limited, however, to the individual action of the party who asserts the right. It is not equally true that a person may, from such motives, influence another person to do the same. If, without such motive, the cause of one person's interference with the property or privilege of another is to serve some legitimate right or interest of his own, he may do acts himself, or cause other persons to do them, that injuriously affect a third party, so long as no definite legal right of such third party is violated. In the case of Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 562, it was recognized to be a general principle that, "in all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case, to be repaired in damages. The intentional causing of such loss to another without justifiable cause, and with malicious purpose to inflict it, is of itself a wrong."

We are of the opinion that the exception of no cause of action should have been overruled, and the parties should have been made to go to trial on the merits.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from is annulled, avoided, and reversed, and that the exception of no cause of action filed by the defendants in the district court be, and the same is hereby, overruled, and this cause is ordered to be remanded to the lower court for further proceedings according to law.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Gilbert MURDOCK, Admr., etc., of Harvey Murdock, Deceased et al., Repts.,

v.

(145 N. Y. 65.)

A payment on a mortgage made by heirs of a deceased mortgagor to protect their title to part of the mortgaged premises descended to them, will not arrest the running of the statute, as against the lien of the mortgage on another part of the mortgaged premises conveyed by the mortgagor for full value in his lifetime to a third person who is under no obligation to pay any portion of the mortgage debt.

(February 26, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Otsego County Circuit in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed as to appellant Waterman.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Brooks, with Mr. James W. Tucker, for appellants Robinson and Lamb:

The payment of $1-as made August 8, 1885, was not such a payment as the law required to remove the bar of the statute.

As there was never an old promise by these defendants, that is, as they were not parties to the contract of the mortgage, how can it be

NOTE.—The above decision is apparently without any direct precedent but follows the rule that part payment of a debt which can keep it alive must be made by authority of the debtor to be prejudiced thereby.

said that they have made a new promise, and if they have made a promise, there is no previous promise to furnish the consideration.

Y. 175; Von Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 523, 51 Am. Dec. 823.

The fact that the party had knowledge of the payment made by one who claimed to act for him was not enough to avoid the defense of the statute of limitations.

McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456; Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 75.

The omission to avoid the statute must amount to an unqualified acknowledgment of the debt, disconnected with any circumstances indicating an intention not to become liable upon it.

The mortgage being more than twenty years old, there was a presumption of fact that it was paid, and the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs to show that in fact the mortgage had not been paid and was a good and valid demand, and this without reference to the statute of limitations.

A payment made on behalf of a debtor is not sufficient to avoid the statute of limitations, unless the additional fact appears that it was authorized by him or was adopted by subsequent ratification.

Mr. E. M. Harris, for appellant Waterman:

The defendants Harriet Robinson and Mary Lamb are not personally liable for the mortgage debt.

Hauselt v. Patterson, 124 N. Y. 349.

The alleged payment, August, 1885, by the defendants Robinson and Lamb, cannot have for effect the taking of the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations.

They are not debtors charged with the payment of the mortgage debt, and an acknowledgment or new promise on their part was nudum pactum.

Mr. Lynn J. Arnold, for respondents:

The one dollar payment by the Lamb heirs kept the mortgage debt alive and a lien on that portion of the mortgaged premises owned by them.

Payment by Lucinda Lamb, with the knowledge and approval of Harriet Robinson and Mary Lamb, has the same legal effect as if payment were made by all three.

Dings v. Guthrie, 45 Hun, 436; Pears v. Laing, L. R. 12 Eq. 51.

The one dollar payment by the Lamb heirs kept the mortgage debt alive, so that it continued a lien on the portion of the mortgaged premises owned by Clarissa Waterman.

Payments on the mortgage debt by the mortgagors, after the sale to Waterman, would continue the lien on her portion.

New York Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Covert, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 154.

Having received this property, the heirs were bound to satisfy and discharge the debt in the first instance; their position was exactly the position of the ancestor.

Suppose that the Lamb heirs, after the death of the elder Lambs, had paid interest on the debt annually for over twenty years; such payments would have the same legal effect as though made by the ancestor.

Pears v. Laing, L. R. 12 Eq. 41; Moller v. Duryee, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 458.

No personal representatives of deceased mortgagors ever having been appointed, a payment by the heirs under such circumstances would certainly keep the debt alive.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question arises upon the defense of the statute of limitations. The action is for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Alanson Lamb and Daniel Lamb to Harvey Murdock and Erastus Robinson, dated September 21, 1861, to secure the payment of $826, with interest, in installments, the last of which became due September 21, 1865. The mortgage contains an express covenant of payment in the same terms as in the bond of the mortgagors, executed concurrently therewith, and purports to bind them, "their heirs, executors, and administrators." The mortgaged premises consisted of a village lot, on which were two dwelling houses owned by the mortgagors as tenants in common. Alanson Lamb died intestate in 1870, and his undivided half of the mortgaged premises descended to his daughter, the defendant Mary Lamb. In 1871, Daniel Lamb, and Mary Lamb, by her special guardian, conveyed the south half of the lot and the dwelling house thereon to one Palmer, under whom the defendant Clarissa Waterman claims, for the sum of $1,650, the full value of the granted premises. The conveyance was by separate deeds. The deed executed by Daniel Lamb was with warranty, and the deed by the special guardian of Mary Lamb contained no covenants of title. Neither deed referred to the mortgage. The surviving mortgagor, Daniel Lamb, died intestate in 1872, and his undivided one half interest in the north half of the mortgaged premises descended to his daughters, Harriet Robinson and Lucinda Lamb, and his granddaughter, Mary Lamb. Lucinda Lamb died intestate, November 8, 1887, and her interest derived from Daniel Lamb descended to her sister, Harriet Robinson, and her niece, Mary Lamb. When this action was commenced, the title to the mortgaged premises was held as follows: The south one half was owned by Clarissa Waterman under the deeds executed in 1871; the north half had descended to and was owned by the defendants Harriet Robinson and Lucinda Lamb, one-fourth part by the former and three-fourths parts by the latter. No part of the principal sum secured by the mortgage has been paid. The mortgagors, in their lifetime, paid the interest up to September 21, 1865 (the day when the whole principal sum became due), and the payments were indorsed on the mortgage. No subsequent payment was made at any time until August 8, 1885, when, as is found by the trial judge, the sum of one dollar was paid and applied on the bond and mortgage "by Lucinda Lamb, on behalf of Lucinda Lamb, Harriet Robinson, and Mary Lamb, in their presence, and with their knowledge and approval, and in recognition of the mortgage lien." This is the payment relied upon to take the case out of the statute. It was made nearly twenty years after the mortgage became due, and the same period after the last preceding payment had been made. It was held by the trial court that this payment kept the mortgage in life, not only as against the part of the mortgaged premises then owned by the parties by whom the payment was made, but also as against the part of the premises owned by Clarissa Waterman, who was not a party to that transaction, and who neither authorized, consented to, nor ratified such payment. The payment was made on an occasion when the mortgagees called at the house on the mortgaged premises occupied by Harriet Robinson, Lucinda and Mary Lamb, and informed them that the mortgage was about to outlaw, and required that a payment be made in order to prevent a foreclosure.

It appears from the evidence that Palmer went into possession of the south house and premises under the deed of 1871, and that he and his grantees have remained in visible occupation since that time; and there is no ground for doubt that the mortgagees, on the 8th day of August, 1885, when the payment of one dollar was made, fully understood the facts respecting that conveyance and the possession thereunder, and the history of the devolution of the title of the other half of the mortgaged premises by reason of the death of Alanson Lamb. No administrators of the estate of either Daniel or Alanson Lamb have been appointed. We entertain no doubt that the finding that the payment of one dollar made August 8, 1885, was made in behalf of and with the knowledge and approval of all the three owners of this north half of the mortgaged premises, and in recognition of this mortgage lien, is supported by evidence. Nor is there any doubt that the payment operated to continue the lien of the mortgage for twenty years thereafter (unless sooner paid) as against the part of the premises then owned by the descendants of Alanson and Daniel Lamb. It was an unequivocal acknowledgment by them of the mortgage. The serious question arises as to the effect of this payment upon the lien of the mortgage upon the part of the premises owned by Mrs. Waterman, who confessedly was not a party to the payment. The question is whether a payment on a mortgage made by the heirs of the mortgagor, who have inherited part of the mortgaged premises, made after the death of the ancestor, to protect their title, arrests the running of the statute as against the lien of the mortgage on a part of lands embraced therein, conveyed by the mortgagor in his lifetime to a third person for full value, who assumed no duty and who was under no obligation to pay the mortgage debt. The statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 880, 881) fixes the period of twenty years after the cause of action has accrued for the commencement of an action upon a sealed instrument, and this applies to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Acker v. Acker, 81 N. Y. 148. The rule was the same under the former code. Section 90. Under the revised statutes the lapse of twenty years of money, against the party to the contract, in which the statute of limitations has been interposed as a defense; and the general principle has been asserted with great uniformity that a part payment, available to take the case out of the statute, must have been made by the debtor or his authorized agent, or, if made originally without his authority, it must have been subsequently adopted by him as his act. This view is founded upon the reason upon which a part payment is held to renew or continue a debt. Part payment of a debt by a debtor constitutes an admission by the person obligated to pay of his liability for the whole debt upon which the partial payment is made, and justifies an inference of a new promise, made at that time, to pay the portion remaining unpaid. The courts acting upon this admission, and inferring therefrom the new promise, treat the contract as renewed from the time of the part payment, and the payment as giving a fresh start to the running of the statute.

It is obvious that a payment by a stranger, or by a person not authorized to represent the debtor, affords no ground for assuming any admission on his part, or for inferring a new promise by him, to pay the balance of the debt; and a payment not made by him or by his authority cannot, therefore, arrest the running of the statute. But in the application of the doctrine that a part payment, within the statute, must be made by the debtor or by his authority, there has been much diversity of judicial opinion. The effort has been frequently made to have it adjudged that whenever the person making the payment is under a liability to answer for the debt upon which the payment is made, a part payment by him will inure as a payment by all the parties bound by the same obligation, and will be treated in applying the statute as if made by all. The decision of Lord Mansfield in the leading case of Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Dougl. 652, that a payment made by one of four joint and several makers of a promissory note took the case out of the statute as to all, was placed on the ground that there was a quasi agency created by the contract, whereby the act of one was binding upon the others. The case of Whitcomb v. Whiting was followed in some of the earlier cases in this state, but was finally repudiated in the case of Van Keuren v. Parmeke, 2 N. Y. 528, 51 Am. Dec. 322, and it has come to be the established doctrine here that a part payment of a debt by one of two or more joint contractors does not take the case out of the statute as to the others, and this whether such payment is made before or after the debt has been barred. Showmaker v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 177, 62 Am. Dec. 95. The existence of a common liability of several for a debt does not of itself make each the agent of the others, to bind them by part payment. The court has in a great variety of cases enforced with great strictness the rule that a part payment must be made by the debtor, or by his authority, in order to take the case out of the statute. This has been held in respect to a payment by a surty, unless at the request of the principal (Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 558); by the assignee of an insolvent debtor (Pickett v. Leonard, 84 N. Y. 175); by the application by the creditor of money derived from collateral securities assigned to him by the debtor (Harper v. Fairley, 53 N. Y. 442); by the maker of a note, of interest, as against the indorser. McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456.

In determining the question whether the payment by the heirs of Alanson and Daniel Lamb of the sum of one dollar on the mortgage continues the lien as against Mrs. Waterman, it is important to consider her and their relation to the debt and the property embraced in the mortgage. Neither Mrs. Waterman nor her grantors had assumed or were under any personal liability for the mortgage debt. The mortgage remained a lien on the land conveyed to Palmer in 1871, but in equity the north half of the lot was chargeable with the mortgage debt, and was first liable to be sold on foreclosure. The fact that Palmer paid full value for the south half of the lot did not alter the rights of the mortgagees. Their mortgage remained a lien as well on the part of the lot sold to Palmer as upon the part remaining unsold. But Palmer and his grantees, so far as appears, had never been called upon for payment. The Lamb heirs stood in a double relation to the mortgage debt. Their half of the lot was subject to the mortgage, and primarily chargeable. They also, as heirs of one or the other of the mortgagors, having acquired title to the mortgaged premises by descent, were liable under the statute (1 Rev. Stat. p. 749, § 4) to satisfy or discharge the mortgage out of their own property. The statute was recently construed in Hauselt v. Patterson, 124 N. Y. 849, and it was held, in substance, that the liability of heirs or devisees was limited to the property descended or devised, or its value in case of alienation. Assuming that the right to a remedy under this statute was not barred by the lapse of time, the Lamb heirs, who made the payment of August 8, 1885, may have been under a liability which could have been enforced against their property other than that embraced in the mortgage, depending upon whether they took any other than the mortgaged premises by descent. But in no other way were they liable for the mortgage debt. The mortgagees demanded and accepted from the Lamb heirs the nominal payment made August 8, 1885, with full knowledge of the conveyance to Palmer in 1871, as a condition of forbearing a foreclosure of the mortgage, and it was paid by them for the sole purpose of protecting their title. It undoubtedly preserved the lien of the mortgage upon the part of the land owned by them. But to give it the further efficacy of continuing the lien on the part of the property in which they had no interest, implies that they were the agents of Mrs. Waterman to renew the mortgage as to her, a relation which has no support in the evidence. It could not, we apprehend, be successfully contended that the payment by the Lamb heirs would have renewed the debt as against the administrators of the mortgagors; and much less, we think, can it be claimed that it continued the lien of the mortgage as against Mrs. Waterman. It was held by the chancellor in Moore v. White, 6 Johns. Ch. 373, 2 L. ed. 155, that an acknowledgment by an executor or administrator would not bind the real assets in the hands of the heir or devisee so as to affect the right of either under the statute of limitations. The question is not the same as it would have been if, during the running of the statute, but after their conveyance, the mortgagors had made a partial payment on the debt. It has been held that a partial payment by a mortgagor on the debt, even after he had conveyed the premises mortgaged, would continue the lien of the mortgage. New York Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Covert, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 154; Hughes v. Edwards, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. ed. 142. The mortgage is an incident to the debt, and, when payments are made by the debtor, the mortgagee is not called upon to inquire how the mortgagor has dealt with the equity of redemption. If the mortgage is recorded, the purchaser has constructive notice of its existence, and a dealing with the debt between the debtor and creditor in the usual course is to be expected. The mortgagors, until at least the debt is barred, represent all persons interested in the land. If not recorded, and the grantee purchased in good faith for value without notice then the lien of the mortgage is destroyed. But upon the death of a mortgagor personally bound to pay the debt a new situation arises. His personal representatives become liable to the extent of the personal assets. If the mortgaged premises descend to his heirs, or are devised, they are the primary resource in exoneration of the personality, unless (in case of a will) the testator otherwise directs. 1 Rev. Stat. 749, § 4. If, during his life, the mortgagor had conveyed the equity of redemption, his grantee does not become personally liable for the debt, unless he assumed its payment; but the land remains subject to the pledge, whatever may be the form of the conveyance. But upon the death of the mortgagor, after having conveyed the land, the personal liability is separated from the ownership of the land. Where the equity of redemption has been conveyed in parcels, without any personal covenant by the grantees to pay the debt, the land alone, as between them and the mortgagees, is liable. The judgment below proceeds upon the doctrine that the owner of one parcel, acting separately, and independently of the owner of the other parcels, may, by payment, continue the lien of the mortgage beyond twenty years, not on his own parcel alone, but on all the parcels. He could not do this by a written acknowledgment, as such an acknowledgment must, under the statute, be made by "a person to be charged thereby;" and a payment by the owner of one parcel ought not, we think, to be given any greater effect. It would be an admission of the debt, but an admission sub modo, affecting only the party making it. The payment would create no personal liability, even against him. He could not bind the owners of the other parcels by his admission, because he would, neither in law nor in fact, represent them. Payment by an heir or devisee, as such, is, we think, subject to the same limitation. It would continue his liability under the statute to the extent of the real assets in his hands, but would have no effect against the owners of the equity of redemption in arresting the running of the statute. A partial payment continues the debt on the theory that it implies a new promise, but the new promise can be implied only against the person making the payment, or when made in his behalf by one who, in law or in fact, is authorized to bind him.

We have found no authorities directly upon the question presented in this case. The case of Roddam v. Morley, 1 DeG. & J. 1, involved the question whether a payment by a devisee for life of interest on a specialty of his testator, in which the heirs were bound, was an acknowledgment "by the party liable by virtue of such specialty," within the meaning of the fifth section of the Act 3 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 42, and as such was sufficient to keep the right of action alive against the parties interested in remainder, and it was held that it was. The principle of this decision is very clearly set forth by Chitty, J., in the case Re Hollingshead, L. R. 87 Ch. Div. 651-659, which involved a similar question as to the liability of devisees on a simple contract of the testator. Speaking of Roddam v. Morley, he says: "The right principle to adopt is that, so far as the real estate is concerned, there is no one else but the tenant for life to pay the interest; that in making such payment he represents the whole estate; that the payment is an admission of the liability to the debt, affecting the real estate of which he is in possession; it is sufficient evidence of the continuance of the testator's contract to pay the debt, or (if it be necessary to have recourse to the somewhat subtle doctrine of a promise to pay) it is a promise to pay out of such real estate, which he, as the person in possession of such real estate, is competent to give on behalf of the real assets generally, and so as to bind them who take in remainder." These two cases proceed distinctly on the ground of agency. In Cooper v. Cresswell, L. R. 2 Ch. 112, Lord Chelmsford questioned the decision in Roddam v. Morley, although not governing the case then before him. In Cooper v. Cresswell the bill was filed in behalf of certain specialty creditors of a decedent to have the debt raised out of certain devised estates. The testator devised certain real estate to trustees in trust for E. for life, and other real estate to the same trustees for the payment of debts. All the real estate was, under the English statute, assets for the payment of debts. The owner of the equitable life estate pleaded the statute of limitations, and the court sustained the defense, holding that payment within twenty years of interest on the debt by the trustees was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute as to the equitable life tenant. In Dickenson v. Tensdale, 1 De G. J. & S. 52, it was held by Lord Chancellor Westbury, that where there were separate devises of lands, to two nephews of the testator, all of which were charged with the payment of his debts, that payments made on the bond in question by one of the devisees after the death of the testator was not an answer to the plea of the statute by the other. Pears v. Laing, L. R. 12 Eq. 41, was a decision by Sir James Bacon, V. C., upon very complicated facts, involving the statute of limitations. Certain payments of interest had been made by Ann Heron, a devisee and legatee, after the death of the testator on a mortgage executed by him in his lifetime, and the question was whether the mortgage was barred by the statute. The defense was overruled on two grounds,—the payments made by Ann Heron; and, second, payments made by the trustee who held the title to the entire estate, which latter ground was regarded by the judge as controlling and decisive. Upon the facts assumed by the court in passing upon the effect of the payments by Ann Heron, the decision seems to have little bearing upon the present discussion. In Harlock v. Ashberry, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 539, it was held by Sir George Jessel, M. R., that payment by a tenant of part of a mortgaged estate of rent due, made to the mortgagee on his demand, but without authority of the mortgagor, was not a payment within 8 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 27, § 40, or 1 Vict., chap. 28, which will take a case out of the statute. See also Ohinnery v. Evans, 11 H. L. Cas. 115.

The question presented in the case before us is important. It should be determined, in the absence of express authority, in the light of the principles upon which partial payments are held to be an answer to the statute. The guiding and controlling consideration is that the payment must be made by a party to or bound by the obligation, or by his authorized agent. If the payment by one is relied upon to take the contract out of the statute as to another, it must be shown that the party who made the payment was in fact or in law the agent of the other in respect to his liability. When the person paying is bound those in privity with him may be bound also. There is lacking, in respect to the payment relied upon in this case to bind Mrs. Waterman, (1) Any agency on the part of the Lamb heirs to act for her, or to bind her interest in the land; (2) any power growing out of or incident to their relations to the land or to the debt, from which the law will imply an authority, and (3) the admission, inferable from the payment construed in the light of the circumstances, was an admission simply that the mortgage was a subsisting lien on the land then owned by them. Our conclusion is that the judgment of the general and special terms should be reversed, with costs in all courts as to Mrs. Waterman, and that the judgment of the General Term be affirmed with costs as against the other appellants.

(444 N. Y. 544.)

A residuary bequest to certain churches according to the number of members, to buy coal for the poor of the churches, is a direct gift to the churches and does not create a trust for unascertained or indefinite beneficiaries.

(February 5, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendants, certain churches, from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of a Special Term for New York County sustaining the residuary clause in the last will and testament of George Merkle, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lemuel Skidmore, for appellants Bedford Street Church et al.:

It is not essential to the validity of a bequest to a religious corporation that it should be given generally for all the purposes for which it may be legally used, or for any to which the trustees may see fit to devote it.

Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. 525; Theological Seminary Trustees of Auburn v. Kellogg, 16 N. Y. 89; Beckman v. Benson, 28 N. Y. 810, 80 Am. Dec. 269; Prichard v. Thompson, 95 N. Y. 81, 47 Am. As the gift is absolute, the expression "to purchase coal for the poor of said churches" should merely be held to indicate a wish or desire on the part of the testator that the moneys so given should be used for one only out of the many objects of said church corporations.

Mr. William D. Udell, for appellant Jane Street Church:

Courts look with favor upon donations for a charitable or religious purpose, and will endeavor to carry them into effect, if it can be done consistently with the rules of law.

The legatees being so defined that the direction as to the use of the legacy can be carried out, there is no force in the contention made by the contesting defendants that the beneficiaries are too indefinite or uncertain.

Mr. Fernando Solinger, for appellant African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church:

There is neither wanting certain, tangible beneficiaries nor a trustee to meet the bequest and to take the funds in hand in the first instance, also ascertain beneficiaries. There is no uncertainty or want of a person or certain body to take. The bequest to the churches is a direct gift.

Mr. S. St. J. McCutchen, for respondents Adaline M. Merklee et al.:

It was the poor and not the churches that testator had in mind.

Gross v. Moore, 68 Hun, 412, affirmed in 141 N. Y. 559.

No absolute gift to the churches being intended by the testator, he must have purposed trusts of an ascertainable fund (the residue) in trustees (the churches) for a definite purpose (to buy coal) in favor of beneficiaries (the poor of said churches), and such trusts must fail for lack of definiteness in the beneficiaries.

The intention of the testator was clearly to create trusts for the purchase and distribution of coal.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to construe item 20 in the last will and testament of George F. Merklee, deceased, which reads as follows: "Item 20. If, after all the legacies are paid in full, there should be anything left of my estate, the same to be divided and paid to the Methodist Episcopal churches in the Ninth ward of the city of New York, according to the number of members, to buy coal for the poor of said churches." The general term of the First department reversed the judgment of the special term adjudging this to be a valid bequest to the churches named, and held that a trust was sought to be created which was void, as the beneficiaries were unascertained and indefinite. We are unable to agree with the learned general term, and are of opinion that the testator contemplated no trust, but made a valid bequest to the churches. This court, in Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 450, held that a bequest similar in its essential features to the one at bar did not create a trust. In that case the testator gave $25,000 to the Utica Orphan Asylum, to be perpetually invested by the trustees or managers in a certain manner, and the interest and income to be expended for the support and maintenance of the asylum. This bequest was claimed to be invalid upon the ground that it created a perpetuity in violation of the statute prohibiting the suspension of the absolute ownership of personal property beyond two lives in being. After disposing of this objection, and holding that the provisions of the statute against perpetuities did not apply to such a bequest, Church, Ch. J., writing the opinion of the court, uses this language: "The income only of the permanent endowment of such an institution can be used with safety to its very existence. Any other course would frustrate, and, sooner or later, destroy, its usefulness. No mortmain law, restrictive as they have sometimes been, ever prevented the donors from making their gifts in such terms as would preserve the principal from dissipation. It does not create a trust in any such sense as that term is applied to property. The corporation uses the property in accordance with the laws of its creation for its own purposes, and the dictation of the manner of its use, within the law, by the donor, does not affect its ownership, or make it a trustee. A person may transform himself into a trustee for another, but he cannot be a trustee for himself." In the case before us there is nothing in the language em-played by the testator that indicates an intention to create a trust. In the first place, he seems to have been in doubt as to his estate resulting in a residue after carrying out the provisions of his will. His language is: "If, after all the legacies are paid in full, there should be anything left of my estate, the same to be divided and paid to the Methodist Episcopal churches of the Ninth ward of the city of New York, according to the number of members, to buy coal for the poor of said churches." We have here a direct and simple gift made in terms that exclude any idea of trust. There is not even a direction to invest the principal and expend the income. It is admitted that the churches designated are duly incorporated and have the power to take. The validity of such a gift has not been legally open to question in this state since the case of Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. 525, where a bequest to the trustees of the Presbyterian church and congregation in the village of Huntington, in trust for the support of a minister of that church, of the income of an invested fund, was sustained as a valid bequest. It was there held that the provisions of the revised statutes against perpetuities do not affect the property given in perpetuity to religious or charitable institutions. While this case has been disapproved as to another bequest involving the existence of the English system of charitable uses in this state, its decision sustaining the bequest referred to has not only never been questioned, but has been expressly approved in subsequent cases in this court. Vide Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 457; Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 387. In Holland v. Alcock, supra, Judge Rapallo, after commenting upon the present condition of the law on this subject, says: "Under this system many doubtful and obscure questions disappear, and give place to the more simple inquiry whether the grantor or deviser of a fund designed for charity is competent to give, and whether the organized body is endowed by law with capacity to receive and to hold and administer the gift." In the case at bar both these questions must be answered in the affirmative. It is not denied that the gift of money to buy coal for the poor of the churches named is directly within the provisions of the various statutes defining the powers and objects of the corporations interested. They are empowered to acquire real and personal property, in a limited amount, for the use of the church, or other pious uses, and they are permitted to employ such property, among other objects, for the relief of the poor. The fact that the testator has designated the purpose for which this legacy must be used does not indicate a desire upon his part to create a trust. If it were necessary, in order to sustain the bequest, these words of designation by the testator might be treated as merely precatory, but we think it was entirely competent for him to apply his bounty to the whole or any one or more of the various purposes for which the corporations are authorized to hold property. This is fully reasoned by Judge Denio in Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y., bottom page 580.

The fundamental error in this case in the court below, and in cases that are frequently coming to the attention of this court, is the failure to recognize the fact that gifts to religious and charitable corporations to aid in carrying out the purposes for which they are organized, whether by expending the principal of a bequest or the income of a bequest to be invested in perpetuity, do not create a trust in any legal sense, do not offend against the statutes of perpetuities, and are not to be judged by any of the well-known rules pertaining to the law of trusts as applied to private individuals. It would be impossible at this late day to add anything to the learned discussion of the foremost judges and counsel of this state in a legal contest which assailed the case of Williams v. Williams, supra, in so far as it sustained the English doctrine of trusts for charitable uses, and resulted in establishing that the doctrine had no place in our jurisprudence, but that a system created by the statute law of the state of organized corporate bodies with power to administer public charities, and legal capacity to receive and hold property for that purpose, was intended to take its place. Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312. Gifts to these corporations can be made without invoking the aid of trusts. The mortmain policy of this state is very simple, and is illustrated in the charters of our religious and charitable corporations. The amount of property which they may take and hold in mortmain is restricted, but their ownership is absolute, and only qualified by their artificial nature. Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 458.

The respondents urged that the case of Fosdick v. Hempstead, 125 N. Y. 581, 11 L. R. A. 715, is an authority sustaining the views of the general term. The point decided in that case leads to no such conclusion, and the decision is in harmony with the views we here express. In that case a bequest to the town, in trust, in perpetuity, for the benefit of the poor of the town, not confined to those for whose support it was under a statutory liability, was held invalid for want of an ascertained beneficiary. It was further held that, in the absence of a special grant of power by statute, a town cannot act as trustee of property given for charitable purposes. Judge Peckham, after a review of many of the authorities, beginning with the Williams Case, uses this language: "It is this circumstance, that the gift in this case is not for corporate purposes, which takes it out of the principle on which the cases cited were decided. The cases of Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 459; Le Conte v. Buffalo, 88 N. Y. 883; Vail v. Long Island R. Co. 106 N. Y. 288, 60 Am. Rep. 449,—were all instances of a gift to a corporation having power to take for the purposes for which the gift was intended, and hence a direction accompanying the gift that it was to be used only for a corporate purpose, or that the income only was to be used, did not create a trust. It was simply saying that the gift was for the purpose of aiding the corporation in the discharge of some of its corporate functions."

The judgment appealed from should be reversed and the judgment of the special term affirmed, with one bill of costs to the defendant churches.

All concur.

IV. Examination entrusted to agent.

I. In general.

The above case touches questions of practical importance on which the decisions are in some conflict. That a bank is in fault and liable, in the first instance at least, for the loss sustained by its payment of a forged check is unquestionably settled law and is assumed if not decided to be so in all the decisions on this subject. As for instance in Crane v. Dexter Horton & Co. (1893) 5 Wash. 479, in which the question was one of fact respecting the alleged forgery of a check.

The same doctrine is illustrated in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. The Love & Good Will Soc. (1890) 85 Ga. 223, where a bank paying a forged check, knowing the depositor could not write, but relying on the statement of the person presenting the check that he signed the depositor's name with authority to do so, was held liable to the depositor.

Although in Hager v. Buffalo Sav. Bank (1894) 10 Misc. 455, a cashier paying forged checks, especially after his suspicion was aroused, was held negligent and the decision put upon that ground, the authorities are amply sufficient to make a bank liable in such case irrespective of the cashier's negligence, as a payment on a forged check is as to the depositor in reality no payment.

Even lack of care in keeping a check book is held not sufficient to make a depositor liable for the payment of a check forged by his clerk. Mackintosh v. Eliot Nat. Bank (1877) 123 Mass. 368.

A savings bank is also held liable to a depositor for the payment of forged checks to a person having possession of the pass-book where the checks were not witnessed as required by by-law, even if the depositor was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to keep possession of the book. People's Sav. Bank v. Cupps (1879) 91 Pa. 315.

But a question as to which the courts are at variance is as to the effect of a depositor's failure to discover the forgery of checks charged to him by the bank after the account has been balanced and his checks returned to him. One line of cases treats the question from the standpoint of an account stated and hold that the balance shown by the bank statement is prima facie correct, but is not conclusive against the depositor. This is the doctrine of American Nat. Bank v. Bushey (1881) 45 Mich. 135, where a depositor on notification by the bank some time after he supposed that his account was all drawn, that he had a balance there, immediately drew it out, but subsequently claimed that forged checks had been charged against him.

Somewhat more guardedly stated it is held in Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank (1879) 51 Md. 523, 34 Am. Rep. 325, that a depositor is not bound at his peril and under all circumstances to detect the forgery, but that he is simply bound to refrain from any act to mislead the bank to its hurt or injury and not to fail to do any act which duty requires of him for the protection of the bank. It is further declared that after a reasonable time from the return of the checks and his balanced book, the statement is presumed correct, but is only prima facie so. The court holds that knowledge of the depositor or else carelessness and indifferent failure to inform himself by the exercise of ordinary diligence required of business men must be shown to make him liable for the payment of a forged check and that to raise an estoppel the bank must be misled to its injury.

A series of New York cases also hold that the most that can be claimed against a depositor by reason of his failure to discover the forgery of checks is that retaining his account without objection after reasonable time is deemed an acquiescence and an admission of its correctness as by separate the true from the false signatures upon the witness stand in an action by him against the banks for the amount of the forged checks charged against him, and his inability to do so is a circumstance for the jury in weighing the evidence.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money deposited with a bank which was shown to have been paid out on forged checks. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. K. Campbell, for appellant:

The relations of banks with their depositors are those of debtors and creditors.

2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 8d ed. § 568.

The balancing of the depositor's pass-book and its return with the vouchers or paid checks by the bank constitute an account stated, and cast on him the burden of impeaching its correctness.

2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 8d ed. 756; Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811.

There was a duty growing out of the relations of plaintiff and defendant which called for an examination by him of the returned vouchers and pass-book.

account stated, but that this is only prima facie and not conclusive. Welser v. Denison (1884) 10 N. Y. 64, 61 Am. Dec. 731. This case holds also that if the bank has not been induced by the silence of the depositor to take any action and has not lost any rights by reason of his silence, the only effect is to cast on him the burden of proof of any fraud, error, or mistake in the account.

This case is followed in Welsh v. German American Bank (1878) 73 N. Y. 424, 29 Am. Rep. 175, affirming 10 Jones & S. 462; Wachman v. Columbia Bank of the City of New York (1894) 8 Misc. 280, affirming 6 Misc. 62; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank (1874) 5 Jones & S. 23, (1861) 84 N. Y. 209, 38 Am. Rep. 301, affirming 13 Jones & S. 452. See also infra as to forged indorsements.

In Welsh v. German American Bank, supra, it is said that Welser v. Denison, supra, "held that a depositor owes no duty to a bank which requires him to examine his pass-book or vouchers with a view to the detection of forgeries of his name."

And this doctrine is also declared in Wachman v. Columbia Bank of the City of New York (1893) 6 Misc. 62, but this seems to be an extreme statement of the doctrine of Welser v. Denison. That case in fact can hardly be said to decide any more on this point than the case of Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, supra, affirming 13 Jones & S. 452, which states the doctrine to the effect that a depositor's duty is only that of ordinary care, and that such care exercised by himself or his agents is sufficient to relieve him from responsibility, although he fails to discover a forgery of checks until it is too late for the bank to obtain a remedy against other parties.

This doctrine is stated in substantially the same way in Wachman v. Columbia Bank of the City of New York (1894) 8 Misc. 280, affirming 6 Misc. 62.

It is not quite easy to say whether or not the 27 L. R. A.

If plaintiff committed the examination to his clerk, he is bound by the knowledge which the examination by himself would have disclosed.

Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, and Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, supra.

If the depositor was negligent, or failed in his duty in reference to examining his pass-book and vouchers, and if by reason of any negligence on the part of the depositor, or by reason of his delay in examining or reporting errors in his bank account when the pass book and vouchers are returned, the bank sustains damages or loss which it otherwise would not have sustained, the depositor may be held to have ratified the payments by the bank or be estopped to deny them.

It is not necessary that it should be made to appear by evidence that benefit would certainly have accrued to the bank from an attempt to secure payment from the alleged forger.

Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 115, 29 L. ed. 818.

Mr. B. M. Allen, appellee in propria persona:

The balancing of plaintiff's pass-book, and above decisions establish in either of the respective jurisdictions so broad a doctrine as that a depositor owes no duty to make any examination of his account and returned checks among which are forgeries. It is doubtful if the courts within those jurisdictions would consider themselves bound to hold that doctrine. In fact the duty to exercise some care seems to be recognized in the decisions last cited. If that were conceded the question in dispute would be simply as to the degree of care and diligence required.

That such a duty does exist is declared in several well-considered cases which have carefully reviewed the cases above cited. Thus in Janin v. London & S. F. Bank (1891) 14 L. R. A. 820, 91 Cal. 14, it is explicitly declared that a depositor owes to the bank the duty of examining his checks within a reasonable time after they are returned to him in order to discover and give notice of any forgeries, but that his delay in doing so will not throw on him the loss of the payment of a forged check by the bank unless the bank was injured by the delay.

The same doctrine is declared in Weinstein v. National Bank of Jefferson (1887) 69 Tex. 38, in which case it was held that two months' delay in discovering the forgery would not constitute an estoppel without proof that the bank was damaged thereby, and that the question whether or not the bank was prejudiced was for the jury.

The same doctrine is declared in Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan (1886) 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, which is further cited infra under the division as to altered checks.

A depositor who returned a forged check within a few hours after his book was balanced and checks returned was held to act with due diligence, although he knew before that his account was overdrawn where the overdraft was not caused by returning same to him, with the canceled checks or vouchers, had no other effect than to render said balances accounts stated, subject to correction. The plaintiff having received and accepted said balances as a correct statement of his account, the burden of proof is on him to show errors in the same.

First Nat. Bank of Washington v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 843, 24 L. ed. 229; Manhattan Co. v. Lydig, 4 Johns. 877, 4 Am. Dec. 289; Phillips v. Belden, 2 Edw. Ch. 1, 6 L. ed. 285; Kinsman v. Barker, 14 Ves. Jr. 578; Bullock v. Boyd, 2 Edw. Ch. 293, 6 L. ed. 405; Barrow v. Rhinelander, 1 Johns. Ch. 550, 1 L. ed. 242; Sherman v. Sherman, 2 Vern. 278; Perkins v. Hart, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 287, 6 L. ed. 463; Hall v. Huse, 10 Mass. 40; Salem Bank v. Gloucester Bank, 17 Mass. 1, 9 Am. Dec. 111.

The plaintiff was under no obligation to the bank to examine his pass-book and vouchers.

Weisser v. Dennison, 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731; Welsh v. German American Bank, 78 N. Y. 424, 29 Am. Rep. 175; Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576.

The doctrine of estoppel invoked by plaintiff in error cannot prevail, because there is nothing to show that had the bank had earlier knowledge, it could have recouped against the forger.

Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 868; Herman, Estoppel, pp. 8, 334, 335; Dezell v. Odell, 8 Hill, 223, 88 Am. Dec. 628; People v. Brown, 67 Ill. 435; Martin v. Zellerbach, 88 Cal. 300, 99 Am. Dec. 865; McKensie v. British Linen Co. 44 L. T. N. S. 431.

The balancing of the depositor's account and the rendition of the vouchers, including the forged ones, only makes an account stated. The depositor is not bound personally to examine the same. If the examination is confided to a clerk, it is sufficient. If the clerk uses his position to perpetrate forgery, the loss is still on the bank.

Weisser v. Dennison, and Welsh v. German American Bank, supra; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209, 88 Am. Rep. 501; Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Barnes, supra; Morse, Banks & Banking, p. 358; First Nat. Bank of Leavenworth v. Tappan, 6 Kan. 456, 7 Am. Rep. 563.

When forged checks have been paid and charged to the account of the depositor and returned to him, he is under no duty to the bank to so conduct the examination that it will lead necessarily to the detection of the fraud. If he examines the vouchers personally and is himself deceived by the skillful character of the forgery, his omission to discover it will not shift upon him the loss which, in the first instance, was the loss of the bank.

Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, supra.

The plaintiff was not chargeable with notice of the wrongful acts of Tomlin; such acts were not within the scope of his agency or employment.

Weisser v. Dennison, 10 N. Y. 76, 61 Am. Dec. 731; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 478, 9 Am. Dec. 168; Lewis v. Read, 13 Mees. & W. 884; Lyons v. Martin, 8 Ad. & El. 512; Schmidt v. Blood, 9 Wend. 268, 24 Am. Dec. 143; Vanderbilt v. Richmond Turnp. Co. 2 N. Y. 470, 51 Am. Dec. 815.

the forged check. Laborde v. Consolidated Asso. of Planters (1843) 4 Rob. (La.) 190, 39 Am. Dec. 517.

A drawer was held negligent in not returning a forged check or demanding payment where he told the drawee bank to keep still and that bank with knowledge of the forgery told another bank to which payment of the check was made that it was all right, this being done to permit investigation of the forgery. Van Wert Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank (1891) 6 Ohio C. C. Rep. 120.

Failure of the depositor to discover that unauthorized checks had been made by his clerk after the expiration of the time named in a power of attorney held by the bank was not negligence such as to relieve the bank from loss where the checks showed on their face that they were made by the clerk. Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Barnes (1872) 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576.

Analogous to these cases is the decision that after nearly three years' delay a county which has received forged county warrants cannot recover on account of them if it is not shown that the other parties' rights remain unimpaired. State v. Abramson (1898) 57 Ark. 142.

Similar to the question of repudiating a forged check is the case of the delay of an acceptor of a draft in discovering the forged acceptance of a duplicate draft which was returned to him on sending a check to pay his supposed draft before maturity on notice from the holder. This was held not negligence such as to charge him with the loss. First Nat. Bank of Leavenworth v. Tappan (1870) 6 Kan. 456, 7 Am. Rep. 563.

II. As to forged indorsements.

The question of the duty of a depositor to discover and report forged indorsements on his checks is distinguishable from that of his duty to discover the forgery of his signature. Nevertheless, 27 L. R. A.

as the cases have been cited interchangeably in some of the decisions.

The same rule of reasonable diligence may apply, but it would seem that reasonable diligence might often be entirely ineffectual to discover forged indorsements as it cannot be presumed that the depositor is acquainted with the handwriting of the payee or other persons who may indorse his check.

As the depositor of a bank is not presumed to know the signature of the payee of his check he is not guilty of negligence in failing to discover a forgery of the payee's indorsement on receiving his pass-book. Brixen v. Deseret Nat. Bank (1888) 5 Utah, 504. In this case the forgery was not discovered until a year after the check was returned by the bank, but it was held that this did not relieve the bank, at least without showing that it was actually damaged by the delay.

In Atlanta Nat. Bank v. Burke (1888) 2 L. R. A. 96, 81 Ga. 597, it is decided, distinguishing the case of Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan (1885) 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, that the depositor was relieved from any diligence whatever or any obligation to look to see whether the check was paid upon a forged indorsement or not by the fact that the bank reported in his account that it was paid to the person named as payee, and that there was nothing in the account to put him on notice that there was a forged indorsement.

In Third Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Merchants Nat. Bank (1894) 76 Hun, 475, it is held that a bank paying a check on a forged indorsement cannot get rid of its liability by showing negligence in discovering the forgery, and that the depositor is under no duty to unearth the forgery but has a right to presume that all signatures and indorsements are genuine. Yet the case holds that after discovering such forgery it is his duty to give notice promptly, although delay in this respect will

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Allen, a depositor, sued to recover money which had been paid by the defendant bank upon checks to which plaintiff's name had been forged by his clerk, Tomlin. The forgeries covered a period extending from about the 5th of September, 1890, to March 4, 1891, at which latter point of time the forgeries were first actually known to the depositor. It was a rule of the bank about once a month to post up the depositor's pass-book, and render him a statement, showing the deposits and checks and the balance. This rule was observed regularly in this case, and the forged checks, with other vouchers, were delivered to the depositor monthly from September, 1890, to March 4, 1891, with his pass-book. The material defense of the defendant is stated in its special pleas marked D and E, the former of which, after stating the rule of the bank, and the rendition of the monthly statement, and facts to show it acted with due care, avers that the plaintiff was negligent in his duty in not making proper examination of the monthly accounts rendered the plaintiff and vouchers, which would have led to the discovery of the forgeries, and prevented the consequent loss to defendant. The latter plea (E) avers substantially that defendant was furnished with the means in the pass-book and vouchers to detect the forgeries, and was so chargeable with notice thereof, and a neglect of duty on the part of the plaintiff to the defendant in not discovering the forgeries and informing the defendant in time to prevent the successful repetition of forgeries and subsequent loss to defendant. The court overruled a demurrer to these two pleas, and issue was joined upon them. The case was tried without the intervention of a jury, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

It will be seen from this statement of the pleadings that the defendant received the benefit of the principle of law invoked by the defendant in pleas D and E, that a depositor owes a duty to the bank to examine within a reasonable time and with due care the account rendered in the pass-book and the vouchers returned by the bank to the depositor. We will refer to this principle again. As the court found for the plaintiff, it must have found that the plaintiff, under the facts, was not negligent, and was not chargeable with knowledge of the forgeries in time to have prevented loss to the defendant, in consequence of forgeries perpetrated after the return of prior forged checks to the depositor with his pass-book. Were the conclusions of the court authorized by the evidence? If, as matter of law, as is insisted by the plaintiff, Allen, the depositor owed no duty to the bank to examine the vouchers, then the conclusion of the court must be sustained, upon this principle, however negligent the depositor may have been in his examination of the pass-book and vouchers. On this proposition the authorities are not in harmony. The case of Weisser v. Denison, not make him liable unless it results in damage to the bank.

It is also held in Harlem Co-Operative Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Mercantile Trust Co. (1894) 10 Misc. 680, that delay in discovering forged indorsements on a check will not throw loss on a depositor without proof of damage from the delay.

The case of August v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York (1888) 15 N. Y. B. R. 956, following Weisser v. Denison (1854) 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731, held that a depositor's delay in discovering the forgery of indorsements on checks merely threw the burden of proof on him to show that the account stated by the bank was incorrect.

In Bank of British North America v. Merchants Nat. Bank (1881) 13 N. Y. Week. Dig. 374, it is declared that a depositor is under no obligation to examine his pass-book for the purpose of discovering the forgery of indorsements on his checks. This decision is affirmed in 91 N. Y. 106, without discussion of this question, where the court merely decides that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations. See, in connection with these cases, the New York cases cited in preceding division.

In Shipman v. Bank of the State (1891) 13 L. R. A. 791, 126 N. Y. 818, the court found that the failure to discover forged indorsements on checks was not due to any negligence of a depositor who had committed the examination of the vouchers when returned from the bank to a faithful and competent cashier, and said the law imposed no duty on the depositor to do more than he did to ascertain whether the indorsements were genuine, but it was declared in the case that when a bank returns a check to the depositor the latter has the right to assume that the bank has ascertained the fact to be that the indorsement is genuine. It was also 27 L. R. A.

said the drawer is not presumed to know and in fact seldom does know the signature of the payee.

III. As to raised or altered checks.

Where numerous raised checks were included in accounts balanced which were stated several times in about six months before the forgery was discovered and the forger absconded, before notice to the bank, the depositor was held liable for his failure to discover the forgery. Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan (1886) 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811. The court declared that it was the depositor's duty to discover the alteration of the checks within a reasonable time, but that his duty did not extend necessarily to so close and thorough an examination as would preclude the possibility of overlooking an error.

On the other hand, in Cincinnati Nat. Bank v. Creasy (Cin. Super. Ct.) (1897) 18 Week. L. Bull. 410, it is held sufficient for the depositor to give notice of the forgery of his checks as soon as the forgery is discovered, and that the duty to give notice in a reasonable time which has been held to exist in the case of raised checks does not exist in the case of a forgery of the signature of the drawer.

The alteration of the payee's name on a check was considered in the case of Dana v. National Bank of the Republic (1882) 133 Mass. 153, where it was held that the depositor must exercise due diligence in examining his returned checks to discover such forgery.

IV. Examination intrusted to agent.

The cases seem irreconcilable on the question of the effect of intrusting the examination of returned checks and pass-book to the agent if he happens to be the forger.

That it is sufficient to intrust the examination to 10 N. Y. 69, 61 Am. Dec. 731, may be considered as an authority sustaining the proposition that a depositor owes no duty to the bank, in the matter of the examination of the pass-book and vouchers. In the same line, but not so positive, may be cited Welsh v. German American Bank, 78 N. Y. 424, 29 Am. Rep. 175; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 209, 88 Am. Rep. 501; Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576. In the case of Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, supra, we observe the court uses this language: "It does not seem to be unreasonable, in view of the character of business, and the custom of banks to surrender its vouchers, on the periodical writing up of the account of its depositors, to exact from the latter some attention to the account when it is made up, or to hold that the negligent omission of all examination may, when injury has resulted to the bank which it would not have suffered if such examination had been made, and the bank had received timely notice of objections, preclude the depositor from afterwards questioning its correctness." In a yet later case, — Shipman v. Bank of the State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L. R. A. 791, — by a careful reading it will be seen that, while the court held to the rule that the bank must know the signature of its depositors, and must ascertain at its peril that the payee has in fact indorsed the check, it does not affirm the rule that a depositor owes no duty to the bank to examine the account and checks returned. On the contrary, the conclusion of the court is rested upon the fact that the agent of the depositor, whose duty it was to examine the account as stated, and the checks returned, did his duty fully, and that, notwithstanding the performance of his duty in this respect, the forgeries escaped detection. In the case last cited (126 N. Y.), the facts show that it was not the duty of the forger, who was also in the employment of the plaintiff, to examine the pass-book and vouchers, but this duty devolved upon another employé. These New York cases were fully reviewed in the case of Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, in which a different rule is declared, and it is held that "a depositor in a bank, who sends his pass-book to be written up, and receives it back with entries of credits and debits, and his paid checks as vouchers for the latter, is bound personally, or by an authorized agent, and with due diligence, to examine the pass-book and vouchers, and report to the bank without unreasonable delay any errors which may be discovered in them; and, if he fails to do so, and if the bank is thereby misled to its prejudice, he cannot afterwards dispute the correctness of the balance shown by the pass-book. The case of Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, 133 Mass. 156, was one in which one Piper, the clerk of the plaintiff, erased the name of the payee, and inserted the name of "bearer" and himself received the money. This check was returned with the pass-book and monthly statement as a voucher. The court uses this language: "The plaintiffs owed to the defendant the duty of exercising due diligence to give it information that the payment was unauthorized, and this included due diligence, not only in giving notice after knowledge of the forgery, but also due diligence in discovering it. If the plaintiffs knew of the mistake, or if they had that notice of it which consists in the knowledge of facts which, by the exercise of due care and diligence, will disclose it, they failed in their duty, and adoption of the check and ratification of the payment will be implied." And in the case of Weinstein v. National Bank of a faithful and competent employé is found in Shipman v. Bank of the State (1891) 12 L. R. A. 791, 126 N. Y. 318.

The case of Weisser v. Denison (1864) 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731, decides that where a depositor intrusted the examination of his account to a confidential clerk, who was in fact the forger of checks, the clerk's concealment of the forgery was a continuation and carrying out thereof which imposed no more obligation on his employer than the receipt of the money in the first instance. In this case the bank-book had been written up and balanced several times after the forgeries began.

The same doctrine is followed in Welsh v. German American Bank (1878) 78 N. Y. 424, 29 Am. Rep. 175, although it was found in that case that the fraud would not have been disclosed by the examination of the pass-book and vouchers alone without comparing the checks with the accounts of the payee whose indorsement was forged.

In Wachman v. Columbia Bank of the City of New York (1894) 8 Misc. 28, affirming 6 Misc. 62, it was held that the depositor exercised ordinary care by intrusting the duty of examining the book and vouchers to the usual agent in the ordinary course of business, although he was the forger, and that it did not appear unusual to permit a book-keeper who wrote out the body of checks and made the entries on stubs to compare the returned checks with the stubs without any supervision.

In Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank (1879) 51 Mo. 562, 34 Am. Rep. 323, it is also held that the knowledge of 27 L. R.

the agent who did the forgery cannot be imputed to the principal in such a case.

In August v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York (1886) 15 N. Y. S. R. 966, the court seems to depart from the doctrine of the New York cases and holds that the same rule should be applied as if the checks had been returned to the depositor himself and he had failed to examine them, where the book-keeper who forged checks received and examined them on their return. The court said the depositor committing the examination of these accounts to the employé became responsible for the frauds and his knowledge was the knowledge of the depositor; but the effect of such knowledge is held in that case merely to throw the burden of proof on the depositor to show the forgery.

But differing from the above cases and agreeing with the main case of FIRST NAT. BANK OF BIRMINGHAM v. ALLEN it is held in Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan (1886) 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, that while a depositor may intrust the examination of his account to a competent agent or clerk, yet if the agent was the forger and has an interest in concealing the facts the depositor is in no better position than if he had caused no examination to be made, unless he exercises diligence in supervising it.

So in Dana v. National Bank of the Republic (1882) 133 Mass. 156, it is held that an examination made by a clerk who committed the forgery charges the depositor with notice. B. A. R.

Jefferson, 69 Tex. 88, the rule was distinctly recognized that, if loss or injury resulted to the bank in consequence of the negligence of the depositor to examine the account and vouchers within a reasonable time, which duty, if performed, would have led to the detection of forged checks, and prevented the loss, such neglect of duty was available to the bank in a suit by the depositor to recover the amount of the forged checks. So in the case of De Feriet v. National Bank of America, 23 La. Ann. 310, 8 Am. Rep. 597, it was held that a depositor should not recover the amount of a second forged check, he having failed to denounce as a forgery a previous check forged by his bookkeeper of which the depositor had knowledge, and failed to disclose the forgery of the first check to the bank. Other cases might be cited. The weight of authority and the best considered cases hold that the depositor owes a duty to the bank; and when the character of the business, the relations of the depositor and bank to each other, and the purposes for which at prescribed intervals the account is stated, and pass-book and vouchers (the evidence of the bank) delivered to the depositor are taken into consideration, the conclusion of these authorities is supported by sound reason and just principles.

Does the evidence show such omission of duty on the part of the plaintiff as to make him liable, and did loss result proximately to the defendant from such omission? The evidence shows that on each occasion after the return of the pass-book and checks, the plaintiff, with the assistance of his clerk, Tomlin, the forger, examined the account as rendered, and the checks or vouchers. We may conclude the evidence shows that the plaintiff himself personally was without fault in this respect, and, but for the fact that his clerk, Tomlin, was the forger, the false checks would have been discovered by the examinations which were in fact made. The evidence shows that in these examinations Tomlin either called from the pass-book and the plaintiff the checks, or vice versa, and Tomlin, knowing when a forged entry or check was reached, answered in such a way as to deceive the plaintiff. Tomlin, the clerk and forger, had knowledge of the forged checks. Was such knowledge of the agent chargeable to his principal? The case in 183 Mass., supra, holds that the principal is chargeable with notice under such circumstances, and we are of opinion the conclusion is supported by reason and sound principles of law. It is clear that in forging the checks Tomlin did not act within the scope of his authority, but upon what principle can it be said that in the matter of examining the pass-book and vouchers he was not acting within the scope of his authority? He was appointed and directed by the plaintiff to do this very thing. If Tomlin had not been the forger, and in no manner interested in concealing the forgeries, and in making the examination of the pass-book and vouchers had discovered that numbers of the checks were forgeries committed by other persons, would not such knowledge on his part be chargeable to the principal? The law is that the principal is chargeable with the knowledge of such facts as the agent acquired acting within the scope of his business. Is the rule to be changed because of the dishonesty of the agent? His dishonesty cannot change his relationship to his principal, to the detriment of third parties. If the duty would have been within the scope of an honest clerk, it is none the less within the scope of duty of a dishonest clerk. We have held that it was the duty of the depositor by himself or an authorized agent to examine the account and vouchers or checks. If the agent employed by him to perform this duty is culpably negligent, is not the principal to be held liable for such want of due care on the part of the agent? Or if the agent, in making such examination, detects palpable forgeries, is not the principal chargeable with the knowledge of his agent? It can make no difference that the agent himself was the forger, and did not act within the scope of his authority in perpetrating the forgery. He was acting within the scope of his employment in the examination of the vouchers, and it then became his duty to his employer to make known the forgery, as much so as if the forgeries had been perpetrated by some other person, which were discovered by him in the examination made. Our opinion is that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was chargeable with the facts within the knowledge of his agent and clerk at the time of the examination of the pass-book and vouchers, and which should have been communicated to the principal or the bank. Certainly the bank should not suffer because of the fact that plaintiff's dishonest clerk prevented the plaintiff from doing his duty to the bank. 183 Mass., supra.

What is the proper measure of relief to which the bank is entitled in such cases? Some of the courts have held that, if injury results to the bank by the negligence of the depositor, he will be held to have adopted and ratified the payment of the forged checks. By others, under like circumstances, the doctrine of estoppel has been applied, and the depositor held to be estopped from asserting a claim to the money paid on the forged checks. We do not think that either the doctrine of ratification or estoppel can be applied as a just and equitable principle in all cases. Ratification refers to a past act or transaction, and, as now being considered, refers to the unauthorized act of an agent, or the adoption of a past act or transaction as his own act, made or executed by another, who was not an agent. It would strain the doctrine of ratification to hold that a person had ratified or adopted as his own the unauthorized act of another, of which he had no information, or which was promptly repudiated as soon as brought to his knowledge. So, where a bank pays a forged check drawn in the name of one of its depositors, and the depositor is wholly free from neglect or fault, the bank owes the amount to the depositor. There was no act, omission to act, or silence in such a case on the part of the depositor which induced the bank to pay the forged check, or influenced the action of the bank in the payment of the check. No principle of the law of estoppel can be invoked by the bank against the depositor under such circumstances. The depositor owed the bank a duty, which was to examine the pass-book and vouchers with reasonable care and diligence. If the depositor failed in his duty in this respect, and the bank was injured in consequence of such omission of duty, the depositor became liable to the bank for all such damage. The extent of the liability of the depositor is commensurate with the loss sustained in consequence of his neglect of duty; no more, no less. It would be unjust, unfair to the depositor, not sanctioned by any correct principle of law, to permit the bank to invoke the doctrine of ratification or estoppel which would exempt the bank from all liability incurred by its own neglect in the payment of the forged check, and in many cases inflict upon the depositor a greater loss than that caused to the bank by his neglect of duty. The damages sustained by the bank as the result of neglect of duty by the depositor are as susceptible of proof and measurement as arise in any other case of breach of duty imposed by contract. The pleadings may be framed to present the issue in a proper manner.

An account rendered, to which no objection is made after a reasonable time allowed for examination, will be held in law as prima facie correct, but the presumption may be overcome by proof, either when the debtor is sued upon the account, if there is an error to his prejudice, or by the plaintiff by suing for the proper amount. An action for money had and received is not barred in this state until six years have expired, and up to that time a stated account is open to rectification upon proof. Neither will the fact that the bank has by mistake omitted from the account rendered and vouchers returned a proper charge prevent the bank within any reasonable time from correcting the error, and recovering back the omitted check, no injury having resulted to the depositor. Although a depositor may have failed in his duty in not making the examination of his pass-book and vouchers, or did not exercise due care in the examination, or, having knowledge of a forged check, failed to make it known to the bank, and thereby become liable to the bank for an omission of duty, yet if, after this liability has accrued, the forger is arrested, and the money, in whole or in part, is recovered by the bank, the damage to the bank by reason of the negligence of the depositor is not the whole amount wrongly paid out on the forgery, but the difference between that amount and the amount recovered back by the bank. So, also, if the depositor makes timely discovery of the forgery, and discloses it to the bank, the bank is liable for the whole amount of the forged check to the depositor, notwithstanding by all diligence the bank failed to realize anything from the forger. The correct principles by which the respective liabilities of the bank and depositor are determined are these: The bank is bound to know the signatures of its depositors, and the payment of a forged check, however skillfully executed, cannot be debited against the depositor. From the relations the depositor and the bank bear to each other there is a duty also upon the depositor to examine his account and vouchers, and to make known to the bank any improper vouchers or charges returned, and, where injury results to the bank from the failure of the depositor to do his duty in this respect, the law holds the depositor liable for such injury, the result of the depositor's omission.

These principles of law apply in the present case to the forged checks which were paid by the bank in the first instance, and before the plaintiff was chargeable with knowledge of the forgery. Their application violates no established rule of law, gives neither an undue advantage of the other, and holds both responsible for the obligations growing out of their respective relations to each other. The evidence shows that several checks were forged by Tomlin and paid by the bank subsequent to the time that Allen, the plaintiff, was chargeable with notice that his clerk was making such unauthorized use of his name. As to all such subsequent payments of forged checks the bank is entitled to invoke the equitable doctrine of estoppel. As to these, it may be fairly said the bank was induced to pay and did pay in consequence of the silence of the plaintiff when it was his duty to speak. The bank was misled to its injury by the fault of the depositor. A very interesting and instructive collection of leading cases on the questions under consideration may be found in volume 26 of American Law Review for March and April, 1892, page 274. We cannot believe from the evidence that if the plaintiff had promptly made known to the bank the forgeries of his clerk at the time he was chargeable with a knowledge of their existence, the subsequent forgeries could have been successfully carried out. The evidence shows that upon his discovery of the forgery the plaintiff had Tomlin arrested, but his arrest, and even his conviction, would not necessarily reimburse the bank, or exclude the doctrine of estoppel; and, as to the subsequently forged checks, we cannot see that the bank was under any obligation to prosecute the forger. As to the subsequent forged checks, the fault was with the depositor. Our conclusion is the evidence supported the special plea E of the defendant.

We are of opinion the court erred in arriving at the balance of money due the plaintiff. The evidence is not clear as it might be made, but, as we understand the record, it shows that the forged checks, the cause of the present action, had been abstracted from the plaintiff's book, presumably by his clerk, who had access to it and the vouchers at all times. The plaintiff had a check book with marginal space, on which was entered the number of the check, the name of the payee, the amount of check and date, and when the check was taken off the stub showed these memorandums; and plaintiff testified that he was careful in every instance, before signing the check, to see that it corresponded with the stub. The balance against the bank was ascertained by charging to the bank payments made on checks for which there were no corresponding amounts entered on the stub of plaintiff's check book. Under the evidence in this case, we do not think this was sufficient data upon which to base a charge, for the following reasons: Tomlin, introduced as a witness by plaintiff, testified "that he frequently filled out the stubs, and also the checks for plaintiff's signature, but that he (Tomlin) had no authority to sign plaintiff's name; that several times, in attempting to sign plaintiff's name, he had not made what he considered a skillful forgery, and he destroyed such checks without uttering them, and that the stubs corresponding with such checks were left in the check book, filled out. That sometimes when he committed a forgery he wrote the stub for one amount and the check for a different amount." It seems that neither the plaintiff nor the witness Tomlin, by an examination of the stub of the check book, could point out the instances in which forged checks were uttered. The defendant's evidence showed that its cash book did not disclose to whom the money on checks was paid, but only the date and amount; "that there were the same number of stubs on the plaintiff's check book as there were of charges on the bank book, but the several sums on the stubs were not the same, but usually smaller, than the charges on the bank book." Ordinarily it would seem that the plaintiff ought to be able to ascertain to whom he was indebted, and the amount of such indebtedness, and, if he did not have the data himself, the payee, as shown by the stub on the check book, was competent to testify, and ought to be examined on this point. If a genuine check was signed, and the amount raised by Tomlin, and the payee in fact received the amount due him, the drawer's loss would be the difference between the amount expressed in the check as originally drawn and the amount paid by the bank and charged to the drawer. We do not know that any such case exists, but, in view of the evidence that the checks paid by the bank were returned as vouchers to plaintiff, and while in his possession were lost or stolen, and as plaintiff, by an examination of the stubs of his check book alone, could not determine which were genuine and which were false checks, and as there were stub entries corresponding in number but not in amount to those paid by the bank, and as the plaintiff's clerk and witness himself was the forger, and testified that sometimes the check was altered by inserting a larger amount than entered on the stubs of the check book, we are of opinion the payees of the check as shown by the stub should have been examined, if within the jurisdiction of the court. Without some proof that the depositor did not own and draw checks as shown in the stubs, the court was hardly authorized to charge the bank with the full amount of a payment, simply because the stub of the check book showed no corresponding amount, when there was a stub which corresponded in number, but for a less amount. If the stub's corresponding in number was conclusive to show the check was forged because the check called for a larger amount than the stub, it would not follow from this fact alone that the stub also was a forgery. There should be other evidence introduced on this point. The evidence shows that when Tomlin was arrested, in March, 1891, he then had on his person eight of the last forged checks. In ignorance of the fact that the bank had knowingly paid forged checks drawn by Tomlin covering a period from September 6th previous to the date of these eight checks, the bank promptly made good to the depositor the amount of the eight checks found on the person of Tomlin. If the payment of these eight checks by the bank resulted from the omission of duty on the part of the plaintiff properly to examine his pass-book and vouchers prior to that time, and his neglect, if he was guilty of such neglect, in not making known to the bank the existence of previously forged checks, and the money was paid under a mistake of fact, there is no legal reason why the amount of the eight checks does not constitute the basis of a counterclaim available to the defendant under proper pleas. This conclusion would follow from the principles we have laid down as law. There was no error in holding that checks which the stubs of the check book showed were in favor of city employes were forgeries, as we construe the evidence on this point. Plaintiff testified positively that he kept an order book also, with a margin for stubs; that whenever he loaned or advanced money to a city employé he invariably took the order of the borrower on the city treasurer in the order book; and that on the stub of the order book the name of the employé, the date, and amount were entered at the time of giving a check on the bank to such employé, and that there were no entries on the stub of the order book to correspond with the stub of the check book. From these data the plaintiff testified positively as to such checks, and thus supplied the omission which occurred as to the stubs in the check book of which he was unable to say whether he had signed checks or not, and which in number corresponded with checks paid by the bank, the difference being that the amounts did not correspond.

Only one other question remains to be considered. The defendant took some of the checks found on the person of Tomlin, and which were forgeries, and others admitted to be genuine, and arranged them so that nothing but the signatures of the drawer could be seen, and plaintiff was requested to point out the genuine and false checks. The plaintiff objected to this evidence and the court sustained the objection. We think this testimony admissible. It is a circumstance that the jury or court should consider in weighing his evidence. The inability of the plaintiff to distinguish the true from the false signatures would not be conclusive against him. He might be able to show by other evidence that certain checks were forged, although he could not himself determine the question by an examination of the signature. Doubtless in many cases a person's name is so skillfully forged that he could not distinguish it from his own proper signature, and yet he may know from the amount or payee or other facts absolutely that the instrument was forged. We think, however, the fact that he cannot distinguish a signature which he admits to be genuine from that alleged to be false is a circumstance. The rule which prohibits a nonexpert from giving an opinion based upon a comparison of handwriting has no application where the party whose name is signed is himself being examined as to whether the signature in question is his signature or not.

the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, by deed of conveyance regularly executed, sold and conveyed absolutely the "saw timber" growing on certain lands. No mention is made in the conveyance as to when, if ever, the "saw timber" was to be cut and removed, but the "saw timber" is sold and conveyed wholly without condition or limitation. This, the bill avers, is the claim and interest of the defendant. The bill avers, and exhibits show, that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, by deed of conveyance made in October, 1886, sold and conveyed the lands to H. F. De Bardeleben, with the following provision or reservation: "But it is understood and agreed that the timber with right of way to reach same has been sold," etc. On February, 1888, De Bardeleben conveyed to complainant. This is complainant's title. The prayer of the bill is that it be decreed that respondent has no interest in the lands, and that the deed of conveyance by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company of the "saw timber" to them be canceled. The respondent demurred to the bill, assigning several grounds of demurrer, the last of which was "that the bill was without equity." Both parties claim their respective rights and interests from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the respondent by deed of prior date, notice of which, under the averments of the bill, is chargeable to complainant. We regard it as settled law in this state that growing trees are such a part of the realty that the title to or interest in the same can be conveyed or transferred only by written instrument. The rule is not universal, under all circumstances. See Leading Cases in the American Law Reports, with notes by Sharswood and Budd. Murphy v. Hubert, 4 Sharswood & B. Lead. Cas. Real Prop. p. 515. The two deeds from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the first to the respondent, and the latter to complainant, conveyed different and distinct interests of the same realty. The bill does not show that the respondent has at any time, or does now, claim to own any interest except that purchased from and conveyed by the owner thereof. As we understand the averments of the bill, the complainant does not claim that by its deed in October, 1888, it acquired any legal right or title to the "saw timber." As we understand the bill, the prayer for relief is based upon the proposition that, as the deed of conveyance for the "saw timber" did not specify any time within which the timber was to be cut and removed, the law supplied a provision to the effect that it was to be cut and removed within "a reasonable time," and, the respondent having failed to do this within a reasonable time, the right to the "saw timber" was forfeited and became the property of complainant. We will consider this proposition further on. If it be true, as held in some decisions, that a deed of conveyance of trees or timber operates ipso facto as a severance of them from the realty, and that the trees are thereby converted into personalty, the bill is without equity, as regards the "saw timber," as under such a rule there can be no claim by respondent under this conveyance to any part of the realty. Under this view, the case made by the bill is not within the statute under which it is filed. It is simply a contention over personal property, which may be fully settled in a court of law. On the other hand, if the trees until cut remain realty, the case made by the bill is that the respondent is claiming only what it purchased, in which complainant has no interest, unless the respondent has forfeited its real estate by a failure to remove it within a reasonable time, and by the forfeiture the right and title of those who bought and paid for it became vested in the complainant, who never purchased it, and has no deed of conveyance for it. There ought to be some cogent reasons compelling such a conclusion, or decisions to that effect which have established a rule of property, before we should adopt it as law. The case of Hoit v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109, 20 Am. Rep. 119, cited by counsel for appellant in support of the doctrine, is an authority to the contrary. In that case it appears that one Very, in the year 1863, sold the timber standing to one Kingsley, stipulating that, if Very failed to deliver the timber at a designated place by a certain time, the grantee, his heirs and assigns, might enter the premises and take the timber. The grantor failed to deliver. No time was stipulated within which the grantee or his heirs were to enter and take the timber. In 1868 the timber was conveyed to defendants. In 1870, Very conveyed the land to the plaintiff. In 1871 the defendants cut and carried away some of the timber. The plaintiff brought an action of trespass quare clausum and de bonis. The court decided that when trees are sold, and no time is fixed for the removal of the timber, the purchaser has a reasonable time within which to enter and cut and remove the same, and, if he failed to act within a reasonable time, he thereby forfeited the right to enter the premises, and was liable in an action quare clausum; but it was expressly decided that the defendant was not liable de bonis. The opinion is somewhat lengthy, and the respective rights and remedies of the parties fully discussed. There is not a line in the opinion in which it is intimated that the purchaser of the timber forfeited his ownership of the trees, or that the grantor or his vendee of the land succeeded to the ownership of the timber upon the failure of the purchaser to enter and remove within a reasonable time. The court held that in such a sale there was no "foundation for an exception to the general rules of law, or make that a conditional conveyance of trees which would be an absolute conveyance of other property." Says the court: "The deed is absolute; the title passed to the grantee; and the defendants are not liable for the value of their own property removed after the expiration of a reasonable time." The case of Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 566, cited also by plaintiff's counsel, goes no further than Hoit v. Stratton Mills, supra. It lays down the proposition that when there is a conveyance of land and a reservation of growing trees, and no time is fixed for their removal, a reasonable time only is allowed within which the entry can be made. Bingham, the defendant, having paid the purchase price, was in possession of the land under a valid parol purchase of the timber, but without a deed of conveyance. He had only an equitable title, with permission to enter. Heflin purchased the lands, but in his deed of conveyance there was a reservation of the timber sold to Bingham. Heflin sued in ejectment. Bingham disclaimed possession, except as to the interest reserved in the deed to Heflin, and as to this pleaded "not guilty." One of the vital questions was whether Bingham had delayed an unreasonable time under his license to enter and cut and remove the timber. If so, the court held that he was a trespasser, and plaintiff was entitled to recover. If not, then plaintiff was not entitled to recover on this ground. Had the plaintiff recovered in the ejectment suit, on the ground that defendant had delayed an unreasonable time, that would not necessarily have finally determined that the plaintiff became the owner of the growing timber which had been reserved in the deed to Heflin. Heflin never contracted to purchase and never purchased the trees. This part of the realty was never conveyed to him. He had no more right to the trees under his purchase and deed than any other person not a party to the transaction. The right to enter upon the land for the purpose of removing trees may have been lost by an unreasonable delay on the part of the purchaser of the trees, but it would not follow that the purchaser thereby became divested of his property in the trees, or that the vendor became reinvested with the ownership. As was held in the Case of Hoit, supra, the sale of the timber was not conditional, but absolute. The title passed to the purchaser, and we see no reason for giving to words used in a deed of conveyance of trees a different meaning than that given when used in a deed of conveyance of minerals or any other portion of the realty, there being nothing in the instrument to control or vary their usual legal signification. According to the bill, there is no misunderstanding or dispute of facts in the case. There is no claim of ownership or title set up in the bill by the complainant acquired by adverse holding. Complainant's whole case, as we construe the bill and the brief of counsel, is rested upon the proposition that, as defendant failed to cut and remove the timber within a reasonable time, it thereby forfeited whatever of property interest it purchased and acquired by the deed of conveyance from the owner, and the "saw timber" by reason of the forfeiture, became invested in the complainant, although it was expressly reserved from the sale to De Bardeleben, and excepted by De Bardeleben in the deed to complainant. We do not assent to the proposition. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the bill.

Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The amended charter of the city of Anniston confers on the mayor and council of the city large powers intended to promote good government within the corporate limits, and the public peace, order, and convenience. Among other powers, is the power "to license, tax and regulate hacks, carriages, drays, and all other vehicles, and to fix the rate to be charged for the carriage of persons and property within the corporate limits of the city, or to the public grounds or property without the city." Pamph. Acts 1890-91, p. 104. The ordinance the appellant was convicted of having violated was adopted by the mayor and common council in the exercise of the power to regulate hacks. The power of regulation is the more general of the powers the charter confers, and, as applied to business, occupations, or employments, is the power to prescribe rules for the conduct of the business, or the manner in which the occupation or employment is to be pursued. Hackmen, cartmen, and wagoners engaged in the carriage of goods or persons for hire by the common law are regarded as common carriers, and the power lies in the legislature, in the absence of constitutional restraint or limitation to regulate, to prescribe the rules according to which their business may be conducted. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77. The power may be, and is often, delegated to municipal corporations, to be exercised for the promotion of the public convenience. When the power has been delegated in terms of the character employed in the amended charter, the validity of ordinances prescribing the times, places, and manner in which the employment is to be pursued has been uniformly sustained. Com. v. Stodder, 3 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679; St. Paul v. Smith, 27 Minn. 364, 38 Am. Rep. 296; Veneman v. Jones, 118 Ind. 41. Such ordinances are in their nature and essence police laws or regulations, and when adopted in the exercise of an express legislative grant of power, there can be no inquiry into or discussion of their policy or reasonableness. "What the legislature says may be done cannot be set aside by the courts because they may deem it unreasonable or against sound policy." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 828.

The material contention of the appellant is that, if he be subjected to the operation of the ordinance, his principal, the Anniston Transfer Company, in whose service he was engaged when doing the act complained of, will be deprived of a right and privilege which the railroad companies owning and constructing the depot had granted, on a valuable consideration, prior to the adoption of the ordinance. The contract into which the railroad companies and the transfer company had entered purports to be founded on a valuable consideration, and thereby the railroad companies do, "so far as it is lawful," grant to the transfer company the exclusive right, by the officers, agents, and employes, to enter the premises and trains of the grantors for the purpose of soliciting patronage. It is forcibly argued by the counsel for the appellee that the real object of the contract—the object the parties contemplated and proposed to accomplish—was the grant to the transfer company of the exclusive right and privilege to enter the premises and trains of the railroad companies for the solicitation and procurement of the patronage of passengers, and that of consequence the contract is illegal, offending public policy. It is a grave and important question, embarrassed by a serious conflict of authority, whether a railroad company may grant to hackmen, or to others pursuing a public employment, the exclusive right to enter its depot, or to enter and occupy the adjacent grounds, for the purpose of soliciting and obtaining patronage. The authorities have been carefully collected, reviewed, and discussed by Mr. Freeman in the elaborate notes to the case of Kalamazoo Hack & Bus Co. Limited v. Sootama, 22 Am. St. Rep. 699 [84 Mich. 194, 10 L. R. A. 819], and Montana Union R. Co. v. Langlois, 18 Am. St. Rep. 756 [9 Mont. 419, 8 L. R. A. 758]. The necessities of this case do not require a discussion or decision of that question. The contract, whatever may be its objects, or whatever may be the rights it confers, or it was intended to confer, must be deemed to have been entered into in view of and in subordination to the powers of the municipal authorities to exercise the power to regulate the business and employment of hackmen. Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121, 47 Am. Rep. 326. It is observed by Judge Cooley that the clause of the Constitution of the United States forbidding state legislation impairing the obligation of contracts "does not so far remove from state control the rights and properties which depend for their existence or enforcement upon contracts as to relieve them from the operation of such general regulations for the good government of the state and the protection of the rights of individuals as may be deemed important. All contracts and all rights, it is declared, are subject to this power; and not only may regulations which affect them be established by the state, but all such regulations must be subject to change from time to time, as the general well-being of the community may require, or as the circumstances may change, or as experience may demonstrate the necessity." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 707. The charter of the city is essentially a public statute; of it all the courts of the states take judicial notice; and obedience to it is due from all who are within its protection. It is not mere legal presumption, resting upon considerations of public policy, that the law silently incorporates itself into the contracts of parties. The incorporation, when the parties are dealing in good faith, most often comports with their actual intention, or they would have expressed all that the law may imply. The parties could not have contemplated that the municipal authorities would never exercise the power with which they were clothed to regulate the business of hackmen, nor is it to be presumed that they intended any embarrassment or diminution of the power when exercised. The juster presumption is that it was not intended the rights and privileges the contract may confer should endure if they became in conflict with the regulations ordained by the municipal authorities. However this may be, the ordinance is a valid exercise of the power with which the municipal authorities were clothed; a power intended for the protection of the public and the promotion of good order, and its exercise deemed necessary for the public benefit. If thereby pre-existing private rights are restrained or limited, the restraint or limitation is damnum absque injuria. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 141; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 849. The individual shares in the public benefit which it is intended to promote, and this is the compensation deemed by the law adequate.

The act the appellant admitted was a violation of the ordinance, necessitating the judgment of conviction and it must be affirmed.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of the Broome County Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to annul its charter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alfred Ely, for appellant:

This is a purely statutory action.

People v. Miner, 2 Lana. 396.

Acts or omissions of the defendant falling under said section 1798, Code Civ. Proc., or one of its subdivisions, must therefore be charged and proved.

People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 9 L. R. A. 33, 121 N. Y. 608.

Section 1798 does not establish any rule of liability. It simply enumerates the classes of cases in which, if liability exists, the attorney-general may move.

Such actions are not maintainable except some public interest is involved.

People v. Ulster & D. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 240; Re Atty-Gen. v. Central Stamping Co. 81 Hun, 541.

Each and all of the statutory grounds for this action rests solely and only upon what it, the corporation defendant, has done or not done.

Injury to the public must be affirmatively shown.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to have the defendant, a domestic corporation, dissolved, its charter vacated, and its corporate existence annulled. This relief is sought upon two grounds: First, nonuser; second, an unlawful and illegal combination and conspiracy, made in restraint of trade, to limit the supply of milk, and to fix and control the price thereof in the city of New York and elsewhere. The defendant was organized on the 21st day of October, 1882, for the purpose, as stated in its certificate of incorporation, of "buying and selling of milk at wholesale and retail, the purchase of dairies of milk when deemed advisable, and the sale of the same to milk dealers." The complaint charges that the defendant was not engaged in this business. Upon the trial, at the close of the evidence, it was conceded by both counsel for the plaintiff and for the defendant that the question whether the defendant had been engaged in buying or selling milk, under the evidence, was a question of law for the court, and not for the jury. We so understand the evidence. There is no conflict, and we have but to ascertain the meaning and intention of the witnesses. The plaintiff's chief witness was Woodhull, the secretary and treasurer of the defendant. In his testimony he makes use of the expression that the exchange "has bought and sold milk;" but he then proceeds to state that he is familiar with the operations of the Milk Exchange in buying milk of the farmers and selling it to dealers, and then states the manner in which the business was conducted. He says: "It is this: A farmer brings his dairy into the exchange to be sold. I go out and find him a dealer who can use the milk, and write the farmer how to mark his milk. I make the collection of the dealer and pay it to the farmer, and we guarantee him the collection." He further testified that their commission was 8 per cent; that the milk was never shipped to the exchange, but was shipped directly to the dealer; that they sold the milk for the farmer at the exchange price, which they guaranteed to collect, and turn over to the farmer, less their commissions. Numerous witnesses speak of their arrangement made, or attempted to be made, with the exchange for the sale of milk; and in each case it was distinctly stated that the exchange did not buy milk; that they merely looked up a dealer, who would purchase it at the exchange price; and that they guaranteed the collection for 8 per cent commission. We think, therefore, that there can be no question as to the meaning of the witness Woodhull as to the expression made use of by him above referred to, for he immediately proceeded to explain how the milk was purchased and sold; and this evidence establishes the fact that the milk was not purchased by the exchange, but that it was sold in the manner described for the commission stated. The transactions, therefore, constituted a commission business, and were not, strictly speaking, the "buying and selling of milk at wholesale and retail." Whether the engaging in a commission business, such as we have described, is authorized by the defendant's charter, we do not deem it necessary now to determine. It may be that the commission business is so closely allied to that of buying and selling as to make the former legitimate and permissible under the defendant's certificate of incorporation.

We are thus brought to a consideration of the charge of unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade. We have only called attention to the charge of nonuser for the purpose of showing the precise nature of the business conducted by the defendant as bearing upon the latter question. If the defendant was the purchaser of milk, or of dairies of milk, it had the right to fix the price from time to time, that it would pay therefor. If, however, it was engaged only in the selling of milk upon commission, then its duty as a commission merchant, as ordinarily understood, was to get as high a price for the seller as could be reasonably obtained, and it was no part of its duty to otherwise fix the price of milk. It appears that the milk exchange, when organized, or shortly thereafter, had 90-odd stockholders, a large majority of whom were milk-dealers in the city of New York, or creamery or milk commission men doing business in that vicinity; that at the first meeting of the exchange after its incorporation the following, among other by-laws, was adopted: "The board of directors shall have the power to make and fix the standard or market price at which milk shall be purchased by the stockholders of this company, and to declare the stock of any and every stockholder herein who purchases milk at any other than the price so named by the board forfeited, subject to the conditions set forth in article 8, sections 4 and 5, of these by-laws. All stock so forfeited by said board of directors shall be subject to the order of the board of directors, and shall be disposed of as they direct." This by-law remained in force for a number of years, and until after there was an investigation as to the character and nature of the defendant's business, and a report made by a committee of the senate. The by-law was then amended by striking out that part thereof which authorized the forfeiture of the stock of a stockholder who purchased milk at another price than that fixed by the exchange. It was again amended in April, 1890, but that part thereof which provided that the board of directors shall have the power to determine and fix, from time to time, the exchange price of milk, was retained. Acting upon these by-laws, the defendant's board of directors have, from time to time, during its corporate existence, fixed the price of milk to be paid by dealers, and the prices so fixed have largely controlled the market in and about the city of New York and of the milk-producing territory contiguous thereto. These facts are significant, and we are unable to escape the conviction that there was a combination on the part of the milk dealers and creamery men in and about the city of New York to fix and control the price that they should pay for milk. Was this lawful?

In Judd v. Harrington, 189 N. Y. 105, certain parties, who were dealers in sheep and lambs, entered into an agreement, by its terms organizing an association for the declared purpose of guarding and protecting their business interests from loss by unreasonable competition. The agreement was to pool their commissions, except such as should be agreed to be paid to a butchers' association, with which they had agreed only to sell to the butchers, and the butchers to buy only of the dealers, belonging to their respective associations. It was held that the real nature and purpose of the agreement was to suppress competition in an article of food, and to so control the market that they could enhance the price of the article.

company known as the Lockport Coal Exchange. The object of the organization was to prevent competition in the price of coal among the retail dealers in that city by constituting the exchange the sole authority to fix the price which should be charged by the members for coal sold by them. Sheldon and others, members of the exchange, were indicted, charged with the offense of doing an act injurious to trade or commerce. The trial judge submitted the case to the jury upon the theory that, if the defendants entered into the organization for the purpose of controlling the price of coal and managing the business of the sale thereof, so as to prevent competition in the price between the members of the exchange, the agreement was illegal. The jury found the defendants guilty. It was held that the principle upon which the case was submitted to the jury was sanctioned by the authorities. Andrews, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question is, Was the agreement, in view of what might have been done under it, and the fact that it was an agreement the effect of which was to prevent competition among the coal dealers, one upon which the law fixes the brand of condemnation? It has hitherto been an accepted maxim in political economy that 'competition is the life of trade.' The courts have acted upon and adopted this maxim in passing upon the validity of agreements, the design of which was to prevent competition in trade, and have held such agreements to be invalid." Again, he says: "Agreements to prevent competition in trade are, in contemplation of law, injurious to trade, because they are liable to be injuriously used. The present case may be used as an illustration. The price of coal now fixed by the exchange may be reasonable in view of the interests, both of dealers and consumers, but the organization may not always be guided by the principle of absolute justice. . . . If agreements and combinations to prevent competition in prices are or may be hurtful to trade, the only sure remedy is to prohibit all agreements of that character. If the validity of such an agreement was made to depend upon actual proof of public prejudice or injury, it would be very difficult in any case to establish the invalidity, although the moral evidence might be very convincing."

In Arnott v. Pittston & R. Coal Co., 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190, the Butler Colliery Company and the Pittston & Elmira Coal Company were corporations engaged in mining and selling coal. For the purpose of monopolizing the trade and maintaining a high price for coal, the two companies entered into a contract, by which one agreed to take all of the coal which the other should desire to send north of the state line at the regular market price, and agreed not to sell coal to any other party to be shipped in that direction. It was held that the agreement was entered into for the purpose of enhancing the price of coal north of the state line, and that it was against public policy, and void. Rapallo, J., in the opinion, says: "That a combination to effect such a purpose is inimical to the interests of the public, and that all contracts designed to effect such an end are contrary to public policy, and therefore illegal, is too well settled by adjudication."

cated cases, to be questioned at this day." See People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9, 28 Am. Dec. 501; Hooker v. Vanderwater, 4 Denio, 349, 47 Am. Dec. 258; Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 434, 49 Am. Dec. 262; Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87; Leonard v. Poole, 114 N. Y. 371, 4 L. R. A. 728.

Applying the rule thus established to the evidence under consideration it appears to us that a case is presented in which the jury might have found that the combination alluded to was inimical to trade and commerce, and, therefore, unlawful. It may be claimed that the purpose of the combination was to reduce the price of milk, and that, it being an article of food, such reduction was not against public policy. But the price was fixed for the benefit of the dealers, and not the consumers, and the logical effect upon the trade of so fixing the price by the combination was to paralyze the production and limit the supply, and thus leave the dealers in a position to control the market, and, at their option, to enhance the price to be paid by the consumers. This brings the case within the condemnation of the authorities to which we have referred.

It is asserted that this litigation was instituted upon the petition of members of the Milk Producers' Union, and that the purpose of that association was to enhance the price of milk. This may be, but the action was brought by the attorney-general, and the influences that operated upon him to induce his prosecution of the defendant are now unimportant. The questions for our determination are presented by the pleadings, and the parties have the right to have them determined upon the merits. If the Milk-Producers' Union is engaged in an unlawful business, which is a restraint upon trade and commerce, it may be dealt with in another action.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, and judgment absolute ordered in favor of the plaintiff upon the stipulation, with costs.

All concur (Andrews, Ch. J., and Bartlett, J., on the ground of non-user), except Peckham, J., who dissents upon the ground that there was proof sufficient of user, and that the action of the defendant did not fairly tend to enhance the price of milk to the consumer.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Charles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

NOTE.—While the decision in the above case is by such a division of the court that it cannot be said to settle any propositions of law as the majority of the judges who unite for reversal do so upon different grounds, the discussion of the question mentioned in the first headnote seems too valuable to be omitted.

Statement by Sherwood, J.:

Action for damages. The substantial portion of the petition is as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, in the month of ———, 1887, she was engaged by Erwin Spraul, then husband of defendant, but since deceased, as a cook at his residence, and that she continued in her said employment for said Spraul until about the first day of June, 1889; that while she was thus engaged she was under the direction and control of defendant, the wife and agent of said Erwin Spraul. And plaintiff further states that heretofore, to wit, on the eighth day of May, 1889, and while in the service aforesaid, and performing the duties as cook as aforesaid, under defendant's directions, defendant carelessly and negligently ordered plaintiff to climb up a ladder and into the pigeon loft which occupied the upper portion of a shed situated in the rear yard of said Spraul's then residence, No. 3040 South Ninth street, in the city of St. Louis, and fetch some pigeons therefrom, defendant well knowing that it was dangerous for a woman to climb into said loft, and well knowing that the ladder supplied for that purpose, and which she directed plaintiff to use, was not adapted to that use, but by reason of its length could not be used in climbing into said loft with safety; that defendant, knowing the dangerous character of the task she assigned plaintiff, and that the ladder furnished for performing it was not adapted for such use, but unsafe and dangerous for such purpose, nevertheless negligently commanded plaintiff to climb into said pigeon loft. Plaintiff further states that in attempting to comply with said command, and climb up said ladder into said loft, having ascended said ladder to the height of the opening into said loft, and while attempting to enter said opening, she, plaintiff, owing to the improper length of said ladder, fell therefrom to the ground below, thereby fracturing her hip bone in such a manner that she was confined to her bed for many weeks, and will be permanently crippled. Plaintiff further states that she has suffered great pain of body and mind since the happening of said accident, has been prevented from following her occupation, and put to great expense for medicine and medical attendance, all as a result of said accident. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant for $20,000 and her costs." The answer was in effect a general denial, coupled with a plea of contributory negligence. The reply was also in substance a general denial of the allegations of the answer.

Plaintiff's testimony is substantially this: "I am the plaintiff. I know Mrs. Spraul. I worked at her house in St. Louis. . . . I began working December 18, 1887. Worked two years and five months, up to the time I was hurt. Just before I was hurt, she said: 'Anna, go up and get down the pigeons, so that grandmother can clean them before she washes the dishes.' I went there. I stood the ladder as always, and as I wanted to enter I lost my hold and fell. . . . The step of the ladder did not fit with the entrance. I had to stand the ladder against the smaller shed. The right side of the ladder was on the north side of the big shed. The top of the ladder extended over the little shed. The door, when open, did not go back against the shed. A little platform the pigeons sat on was there. Mrs. Spraul had sent me up the ladder before. She asked me why I did not stand the ladder over further, and said I would fall down there some time. I told her I could not stand it any other way, because the ladder did not fit. . . . I used the ladder from which I fell about four or five times. It was the height of the big shed. This was the only ladder about for the purpose of climbing into the shed. The ladder was made in the brewery. . . . I got the pigeons out of the loft four or five times a year. Mrs. Spraul had the ladder made for the purpose of getting the pigeons out. It was not used much otherwise. There was an old ladder there at first. It went to pieces. I have told all Mrs. Spraul said about getting the pigeons. . . . I got the ladder from a corner on the north side of the lot, and set it up against the shed, just the same as I always did. Mrs. Spraul did not tell me how to set it up. I set it up the best way I could. I had to crawl into the opening. I did not get quite to the opening. I opened the door the same as I had always done before. I had to lean over diagonally. It is about a good step. I had made that step as often as I went up. I took hold of the door. . . . I lost the hold of my hands and feet. When I was off the ladder, and wanted to enter the opening, I lost my hold of the loft at the opening. I stood on the ladder and put my hands on the opening. I wanted to step into the hole, and in so doing I lost my hold on the loft, and fell. I had to get off the ladder. I had gotten off the ladder, and got on the pigeon loft. . . . I fell on the bricks, not on the wood lying there. I was hanging by my hands from the bottom of the loft, and fell down. From the bottom of the opening, where I laid my hands, to the walk was about eleven feet. . . . I did the best I could. Nobody told me how to enter. I am thirty years of age. The ladder was new. . . . I could not help letting loose. I held on as long as I could. I called to no one to help me. . . . When I went up there I did not know I was going to fall down, or I would not have went up there. I just noticed that it was dangerous after I had fallen down. I did not take any notice of whether the ladder was perfectly good to do that thing with, or not. The old ladder was better. I could put that under the opening and get right into the loft. The other ladder I had to stand at this place and get in sideways. The old ladder broke, and the new one was made. There was a step ladder there, but I could not use it for this purpose. It was seven or eight feet long, and was used to clean the windows. The top of the ladder, when I fell from it, rested against the small shed, which was seven inches from the opening. With the ladder placed similarly I went into the loft four or five times. I used the ladder in the same way. If I had had a ladder which I could have placed under the opening, I could have gone in that way. The Court: State what caused the accident this time. A. I lost my hold. I caught hold of the opening with my hands, and my hands slipped. I held myself in the corner, in the bottom of the opening, at the side and bottom. I had to go in with my head first. I wanted to put my hands in the corner of the opening,—slip in my head and body in that way. That was the way I always did. I tried it this time, but my hands slipped, and I fell down."

There was evidence that, immediately after the accident, defendant sent another female servant after the pigeons, and that she went up the same ladder and got them. There was evidence, also, that other servants had used the same ladder in getting pigeons down from the loft; that Erwin Spraul, the deceased husband of defendant, had the new ladder made; that after plaintiff had fallen, as aforesaid, defendant had ordered the top of the ladder to be cut off, which was done; that the ladder was higher than the big shed; that the bottom of the opening into the shed where the pigeons were was 11 feet 1 inch; that plaintiff's father, some six weeks before she fell, had told defendant that the ladder "was dangerous," but did not say in what respect; that the main shed was 16 feet 2½ inches high, and the lower shed was 12 feet 10 inches high, and distant about 11 inches from the taller shed, where the pigeons were. At the close of evidence for plaintiff, defendant asked an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which was refused. Thereupon, on part of defendant, evidence of one witness was introduced that plaintiff said to her a short time after the accident: "I fell, unluckily. I have gone up the ladder so often to get pigeons, and nothing happened, and on this day I had to be unfortunate. But I cannot blame anybody." Another witness testified that he asked plaintiff about the matter: "What did you do?" And she said: "I and Susan had made humbug in the yard. I made a false step and fell down." She further said, "I can't blame anybody." Two other witnesses testified to similar statements made by plaintiff as that testified to by the first witness for the defense. Part of this testimony plaintiff denied, to wit, that she admitted she had said it was her own fault, and she did not blame anybody; but as to the testimony of two witnesses that she had "made humbug in the yard," etc., she merely said, "I do not remember talking about this accident," etc. Defendant testified that plaintiff was making fun with Susan (the other hired girl) by putting her foot out, and while making fun made a false step and fell. This testimony of defendant was not denied by plaintiff. Defendant also testified that on one occasion she "used the ladder, in fun, to look into the loft."

Erwin Spraul died before this suit was instituted. It did not appear that defendant had any means or estate of her own at the time of the accident, nor at what time the ladder was sawed off. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for $3,000, and defendant appeals.

This cause has been here once before, and is reported in 114 Mo. 551. The facts, however, were not as fully developed heretofore as at the present time.

Meurs. Broadhead & Hesel and H. A. Haussler for appellant.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Various grounds have been assigned for the reversal of the judgment in this cause, some of which will now be considered. The theory on which this cause was tried in the court below was that defendant was the wife and agent of her then husband, Erwin Spraul, and as such gave the command which, it is claimed, indirectly resulted in the litigated injury. The whole case turns on the point whether, in giving such order, defendant was guilty of a mere omission of duty or negligence, while acting within the scope of her implied authority, derived from her husband, or whether she was guilty of an actionable misfeasance. In a very early case Chief Justice Holt clearly drew the distinction between the nonliability of a person to a third party because of negligence or nonfeasance and misfeasance, or positive wrong, saying: "It was objected at the bar that they have this remedy against Breese. I agree, if they could prove that he took out the bills, they might sue him for it. So they might anybody else on whom they could fix that fact. But for a neglect in him they can have no remedy against him, for they must consider him only as a servant, and then his neglect is only chargeable on his master or principal; for a servant or deputy, quatenus such, cannot be charged for neglect, but the principal only shall be charged for it. But for a misfeasance an action will lie against a servant or deputy, but not quatenus a deputy or servant but as a wrongdoer. As if a bailiff, who has a warrant from the sheriff to execute a writ, suffer his prisoner by negligence to escape, the sheriff shall be charged for it, and not the bailiff; but if the bailiff turn the prisoner loose the action may be brought against the bailiff himself, for then he is a kind of wrongdoer, or rescuer; and it will lie against any other that will rescue in like manner. Lane v. Cotton, 12 Mod. 488; Williams v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 119 Mo. 816; Fugler v. Botha, 117 Mo. 475; Watson v. Kansas & T. Coal Co. 52 Mo. App. 866.

In commenting on the first case just cited, the rule is tersely stated: "That an agent is personally liable to third parties for doing something which he ought not to have done, but not for not doing something which he ought to have done. In the latter case, the agent is liable only to his employer." Ewell's Evans, Agency, 488. On this topic, an eminent commentator observes: "We come, in the next place, to the consideration of the liability of agents to third persons, in regard to torts or wrongs done by them in the course of their agency. . . . And here the distinction ordinarily taken is between acts of misfeasance, or positive wrongs, and nonfeasances, or mere omissions of duty by private agents. . . . The master is always liable to third persons for the misfeasance and negligences and omissions of duty of his servant, in all cases within the scope of his employment. So the principal, in like manner, is liable to third persons for the like misfeasances, negligences, and omissions of duty of his agent, leaving him to his remedy over against the agent in all cases where the tort is of such a nature as that he is entitled to compensation. . . . The agent is also personally liable to third persons for his own misfeasances and positive wrongs. But he is not liable to third persons for his own misfeasances or omissions of duty in the course of his employment. His liability in these latter cases is solely to his principal. And hence the general maxim, as to all such negligences and omissions of duty, is, in cases of private agency, respondet superior. . . . The distinction thus propounded between misfeasance and nonfeasance—between the acts of direct, positive wrong, and mere neglects, by agents, as to their personal liability therefor—may seem nice and artificial, and partakes, perhaps, not a little of the subtlety and overrefinement of the old doctrines of the common law. It seems, however, to be founded upon this ground: that no authority whatsoever from a superior can furnish to any party a just defense for his own positive torts or trespasses; for no man can authorize another to do a positive wrong. But, in respect to nonfeasances, or mere neglects in the performance of duty, the responsibility therefor must arise from some express or implied obligation between particular parties standing in privity of law or contract with each other; and no man is bound to answer for any such violations of duty or obligation, except those to whom he has become directly bound or amenable for his conduct." Story, Agency, 9th ed. §§ 308, 309.

It will be pertinent, in this connection, to briefly note the facts and rulings in some early cases which serve to illustrate what has been quoted from the text-writers. Thus, in Bell v. Cateby, 1 Rolle, 78, Rolle, Abr. 94, pl. 5, it was resolved that if an underbailiff of a liberty levy a debt by virtue of a warrant of feri facias, and then conceal the writ, and make no certificate, an action on the case lies against him, for this reason, that he has done a personal tort. Vide 1 Vin. Abr. 578. In Marsh and Astrey's Case, 1 Leon, 146, an undersheriff was held liable for returning a tenant summoned when he was not, upon the ground that this was a positive act, and not a mere negligence. In Cameron v. Reynolds, Cowp. 408, it was held that an action did not lie against an undersheriff for refusing to execute a bill of sale to plaintiff under a feri facias. And Lord Mansfield said: "It is an action for a breach of duty in the office of sheriff. Whenever that is the case, the action must be against the high sheriff; and, if it proceed from the default of the undersheriff or bailiff, that is a matter between them and the high sheriff." These cases all go to point out the essential difference which exists between "acts of direct and positive wrong," which are misfeasances, and render the agent personally liable, and "mere neglects," or nonfeasances, in which the liability is cast alone on the principal or master. This distinction finds illustration in Harriman v. Stowe, 57 Mo. 98, where the defendant, acting as the agent of his wife, and being a carpenter, built a trap door, and did the work so negligently that a third person fell through the hatchway which the door covered, and was injured; and it was held that the party injured was entitled to recover of the agent on the ground that the act which caused the injury, viz., defectively constructing the trap door, was a misfeasance, as contradistinguished from a mere nonfeasance or omission of duty. And this was thus ruled after extensive and approving citations and quotations from Story and other authorities heretofore cited.

In Horner v. Lawrence, 37 N. J. L. 46, this case arose: Forsyth, owning a strip of woodland through which a railroad ran, procured the wood to be cut, and employed Horner to haul it. Horner, in order to reach said woodland, obtained permission from Lamb, the owner of an adjoining field, where the hogs of Lawrence were being pastured, to pass through the field, and to open a gap in the fence at a certain place, with directions to close it up after he went in and after he came out, as the hogs and cattle in the field might get through on the railroad and get killed; and Horner passed through with his teams, leaving the gap open while the wagons were being loaded, but closing it when he went out. The hogs escaped through the gap, and one was killed and the other injured on the railroad. Held, that the leaving down the bars by Horner was not a mere neglect, but an intentional and willful violation of his authority, and a misfeasance, for which, as a servant or agent of Forsyth, he cannot claim exemption against the party injured. In Mississippi a very marked illustration of the point in hand has occurred, where it was ruled that an agent in charge of a plantation was not liable to the owner of an adjoining plantation for damage resulting from the malicious neglect and refusal of the agent to keep open a drain which it was his duty as such agent to keep open; and that the only liability incurred by the agent was to his principal. Feltus v. Swan, 62 Miss. 415.

As heretofore seen from the authorities cited, they generally announce the doctrine that, in order to charge the agent with liability, such liability must spring from, and have its origin in, an act of direct and positive wrong done by the agent to the injured party. This idea is happily expressed in Delaney v. Rochereau, 34 La. Ann. 1123, where Bermudez, Ch. J., says: "The whole doctrine on that subject culminates in the proposition that wherever the agent's negligence, consisting in his own wrongdoing,—therefore in an act,—directly injures a stranger, then such stranger can recover from the agent damages for the injury. Story, Agency, 308, 309; Story, Bailm. 165; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. ed. 1874, 111, 112; Evans, Agency (notes by Ewell), 437, 438; Whart. Neg. 535, 78, 83, 780." "By Anglo-American law, a servant who, by negligence in the discharge of his duties, injures a third person, is not personally liable to such third person. The maxim respondet superior prevails, the principal is liable for the injury, and the agent is then liable to the principal for damages which the latter may have sustained." Whart. Agency, § 535. Now, in this case, nothing can be clearer than that defendant was acting within the orbit of her duty to her husband when giving the order alleged in the petition. This is the theory of the petition, which claims that the command was negligently given, owing to the fact that the ladder furnished for climbing into the loft, by reason of its length, could not be used for that purpose with safety. So that it readily appears that defendant, in giving the order, was not guilty of an act of direct and positive wrong to plaintiff, but simply of giving an order in her husband's business which, solely owing to the length of the ladder furnished by her husband for the purpose, and she having no other, was a negligent order. But it must be remembered that it was no part of defendant's duty to furnish a ladder of proper length, nor does it appear she had the wherewithal to do so. If it was not her duty, then she cannot be charged with even so much as negligence in failing to provide a ladder of requisite length; for negligence is simply duty violated or unperformed. The mere giving of the order, then, to get the pigeons, was not a negligent order. It was her husband's duty to furnish a ladder of proper length, and it is the rule that a servant is never liable for the negligence of his master, nor can an action be maintained against a servant unless he can be considered as a wrongdoer. A servant is never liable to a third person merely for not doing that which it was the duty of the master to do. Hill v. Caverly, 7 N. H. 215, 26 Am. Dec. 785. Thus, where a master, having an unsafe and insufficient dam across a stream of water, ordered his servant to shut the gate, and keep it shut until ordered to raise it, and the servant obeyed the order, by means of which the water was raised so high that the dam broke away, and an injury was done to a third person, it was held that the servant was not liable. See also Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, §§ 695, 628, 446.

With respect to the use of the word "misfeasance" by Lord Holt in the passage already copied, the learned author heretofore quoted says: "For negligences, Lord Holt tells us, the servant is not liable; for misfeasances he is liable. If we are to understand 'negligences,' in Lord Holt's sense, those imperfections in the discharge of duty which are incident to the labor of all men when under the control of others, and if we are to regard as misfeasances those torts which are committed by the servant out of the line of his employment, when acting on his own responsibility, then we can reconcile the famous passage just quoted, not only with the principles here advocated, but with the analogies of the law in other relations." Whart. Agency, § 586. This view accords with the views of Story and others as to the distinction between "mere neglects" and misfeasances or positive wrongs, and conclusively shows that defendant, not having crossed the boundaries of her implied employment, was in nothing derelict, and in nothing liable so far as concerns plaintiff. There are cases, indeed, where an order, when given by an agent, results in direct injury to a third person, and the agent there will be held liable to the person injured. Thus, in Bell v. Josselyn, 3 Gray, 306, 63 Am. Dec. 741, it was ruled that "an agent who negligently directed water to be admitted to the water pipe in a room of his principal's house, over which he had general management, thereby flooding a tenement below, was personally liable." There it was held that it was an act of mere nonfeasance on the part of the defendant to fail to examine the condition of the pipes before causing the water to be let on, but that the turning on of the water without such precedent examination was a misfeasance, and none the less so because preceded by a nonfeasance, and so the action of tort against the defendant was maintained. In that case, however, the agent was acting in an independent sphere of action,—"pursued his own way,"—and consequently occupied a different and higher plane of liability than the defendant wife in the case at bar, owing to her subordinate position in the household, and the matrimonial relations she sustained; because when the agent, by the negligent performance of his ordinary duties, injures a third person, only the principal is liable if the agent's individuality is absorbed in that of the principal; for wherever there is liberty there is liability, and vice versa. Whart. Agency, §§ 587, 588. This further difference between the case instanced and the present one consists in the fact that the order in that case was as much a direct and positive wrong as though the fingers of the agent had turned the water on instead of his tongue.

There are cases, too, of omission which may result in liability, and this illustration is given in the Digest in the discussion of the Aquilian law: "One servant lights a fire and leaves the care of it to another. The latter omits to check the fire, so that it spreads, and burns down a villa. Is there any one liable for the damages? The first servant is chargeable with no negligence, and the second chargeable only with an omission. Of course, if we apply to this case the maxim that a mere omission cannot be the basis of a suit, there can be no redress." In such case the eminent author from whom quotations have already been made says: "It is clear that in the case before us the non-action of the second servant is equivalent to action. He undertakes the charge of the fire, and in the imperfect performance of this charge he acts aggressively and positively. So, also, is it in the well-known case of a physician who undertakes the care of a patient. Whart. Neg. § 80. Of course, no such "aggressive and positive" omission can be laid at the door of defendant, and consequently no such liability as springs from an omission of that sort.

There are cases where a servant is liable to his fellow servant for negligence resulting in injuries to the latter; but it is believed it will be found upon examination that no such liability attaches except where some physical act is done by the servant, and results to the damage of his fellow, or where the servant occupies an independent plane, and his orders to his fellow servants are equivalent in force, effect, and resultant injury to a physical act, as in Bell v. Josselyn, supra. Where the servant acts as the master's representative, "without liberty," he is not responsible for injuries to his fellow servant resulting from his negligence, unless those injuries are either directly or in effect positive physical wrongs, for which he would be legally liable were he acting without instead of with orders. Whart. Neg. 2d ed. §§ 245, 246; Whart. Agency, § 585. The case of Osborne v. Morgan, 187 Mass. 1, affords apt illustration of the principle which renders liable an agent who, acting in an unfettered way, has the general conduct and control of affairs, and gives an order which necessarily and immediately results in injury to an inferior fellow servant. There, the order given by the general superintendent should not have been given, because, as said by Devens, J., "A single careful glance would have shown the hazardous condition in which the machinery was to be left. . . . and which the execution of the order made dangerous." There, the order was the equivalent of a direct and physical wrong, as much so as though the hands of the general superintendent had removed the closet, instead of the hands of his subordinates. In that case, too, an instruction was approved that "the plaintiff must show, in regard to the defendant he would hold, that that defendant had a duty in regard to the use of the apparatus, in keeping it in repair, and in condition to use, put upon him by the corporation." Rogers v. Overton, 87 Ind. 410, is another instance where an inferior fellow servant suffered injury as the direct result of an order of his superior fellow servant, for which the latter was held liable.

There are cases, also, where husband and wife, either one or both, as the circumstance happened, have been held liable for their joint or several torts. Many of these cases have been exhaustively cited and reviewed by Burgess, J., in Flesh v. Lindsay, 115 Mo. 1. But in none of those cases, and in none which a careful research has been able to discover, has a single instance been found where a wife, in giving her orders in and about her household affairs to one of her domestics, has been held liable for injuries resulting to such servant. And the fact that no such precedent can be found is cogent evidence that such a rule of law does not exist. Venable v. Wabash Western R. Co. 112 Mo. 103, 18 L. R. A. 68, and cases cited. And certainly the nonliability of the defendant wife ought to be the dominant principle in surroundings such as this record presents. Here defendant was environed by the confines of a narrow and limited authority. She was "subdued to the very quality of her lord." She was the mouthpiece of her husband, as much so as if she had said, "Anna, my husband says go up and get down the pigeons," in which case it would hardly be contended that defendant could have been held liable to an action. The premises considered, it seems to me that the circumstances in evidence, as disclosed by the record, show no liability on the part of defendant, when considered as acting as the implied agent of her husband.

2. There are other reasons tending toward the same conclusion of defendant's nonliability. It is well-settled law that an employer is not bound to furnish his employes the safest known appliances, tools, or machinery, the latest approved patterns of tools and improvements therein, etc., nor does he render himself liable by failing to discard tools or appliances which are not such, and to supply their places with those which are more safe. 2 Thomp. Neg. 988; Blanton v. Dodd, 100 Mo. 64. In cases like the present, it seems that, the risk of injury being but small, the use of very primitive and inefficient implements is allowable, and such use will fill the measure of ordinary care. The master is not the warrantor of the tools furnished his servants; having exercised ordinary care in the selection of the implements, his liability, so far as mere selection is concerned, ceases. Beach, Contrib. Neg. 2d ed. §§ 351, 352, and cases cited.

3. Again, no principle is more frequently enunciated or more often applied in the adjudicated cases than that which holds that an employé, in engaging in the service of another, assumes the risks incident to such employment; and this is especially true of seen dangers and patent defects. Where ordinary inspection and carefulness will enable the employé to avoid the danger, there he will be required to use such inspection and carefulness. "But it is held that, wherever the employé's means of information are equal to or greater than those of his employer, the employer . . . will not be liable in case of injury from a defect of that sort. But this 37 L. R. A.

is, perhaps, but little more than to say that the servant, as well as the master, is bound to use ordinary care. For patent dangers or defects the master, as a rule, is not liable, and in many cases it has been held that they need not be pointed out, even to minor employes, if the latter be capable of discerning them." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 359. The learned author gives some instances where employers have been held exempt from liability. Thus: "One who works on a raised platform without railing takes the risk of falling off; and a laborer employed to wheel earth along the edge of a bank, when the posts are coming out of the ground, is presumed to know the danger, and to assume the risk of the bank caving in. Where a servant who was killed by falling through a hatchway knew when he entered the employment that there were no guards around it, he took all risks incident to the employment. So, also, a workman employed by a railroad company to stand in a dangerous place to signal trains assumes the obvious risks of the position, and a railroad-track walker, who knew that coal was customarily overloaded on tenders, could not recover for injuries from the fall of a piece of it; and a section hand cannot complain of the increased risk in being ordered out to work on a foggy day, nor, while pushing a hand-car, of falling into a properly constructed waterway, nor the risk from special trains not running on schedule time. One, however, whose employment in a railroad yard requires him to move damaged cars, takes the risk of mistaking damaged cars for sound ones." Id. § 360. This doctrine is firmly rooted in this court, and has received its frequent sanction. Thomas v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 109 Mo. 187, and cases cited; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 675; and the quite recent case of Wilson v. Tremont & S. Mills, 159 Mass. 154. The rule is generally applied in actions brought by employé against employer, but no reason is perceived why the rule should not be equally applicable to the circumstances of the present case. As already seen, the plaintiff was fully conversant with the alleged defect in the ladder—its length; for otherwise it was sound. She had ascended it four or five times before, and gotten the pigeons out of the loft without trouble, and this thing occurred four or five times a year, as plaintiff says she had been using the new ladder a year or more when the accident happened. She had also used the old ladder before it had been discarded. So that it is simply indisputable that, if ever the doctrine of the assumption of obvious risks is to be applied, it ought to be applied in the present instance. Being thus applied, the result seems to be inevitable that plaintiff, on this ground alone, has no cause of action, and no standing in court.

For the reason aforesaid, the judgment should be reversed, and the petition dismissed.

All concur, except in the last paragraph.

A rehearing was subsequently held before the court in banc after which on March 19, 1895, the following opinion was handed down:

Barclay, J., concurring:

Plaintiff, according to her testimony, was employed as a servant to do general housework. In her petition she states that she was employed as a cook, and that, "while performing the duties as cook, . . . under defendant's directions, defendant carelessly and negligently ordered plaintiff to climb up a ladder, and into the pigeon loft," etc. Plaintiff was hurt by falling to the ground while attempting to execute the order of defendant to get the pigeons. The order, by plaintiff's account, was accompanied with a remark about having the pigeons cleaned before the dishes were washed; so that it is evident that the pigeons were wanted for cooking, and that the plaintiff was directed to get them for that purpose. The allegation of the petition is that plaintiff was the servant of Mr. Spraul, the defendant's husband; but that is evidently only a statement of the effect of the employment, for in her testimony plaintiff states that the defendant actually engaged her for service in the family. Defendant had general direction of the household affairs. Plaintiff had been working as a domestic in the Spraul family, as above described, two years and five months, when her mishap occurred. During that time she had "got the pigeons out of the loft four or five times a year," as she said. She also admitted that she had previously used the same ladder to reach the loft (from which she fell) "four or five times." Prior to using that ladder, she had used, for the same purpose, an older one, since discarded. The pigeon loft was in the upper part of a shed in the yard of the Spraul premises, as has been described. The ladder plaintiff had to use was not defective. It was made for the purpose, and was new. The only supposed defect charged against it is that it was too long to reach the loft unless placed at a great angle, so plaintiff had to set it sidewise against another shed. Plaintiff admitted that defendant had cautioned her as to the use of the ladder. Her words were thus given by plaintiff as witness: "Mrs. Spraul had sent me up the ladder before. She asked me why I did not stand the ladder over further, and said I would fall down there some time. I told her I could not stand it any other way, because the ladder did not fit." Defendant, at the time of the accident, did not direct plaintiff how to use the ladder. Plaintiff was then using the ladder according to her own methods. The ladder did not give way. Plaintiff was not even standing on it when she fell. She says: "When I was off the ladder, and wanted to enter the opening [of the loft], I lost my hold of the loft at the opening. I stood on the ladder, and put my hands on the opening. I wanted to step into the hole, and in so doing I lost my hold on the loft, and fell. I had to get off the ladder. I had gotten off the ladder, and had got on the pigeon loft." Later on she said: "If I had had a ladder that fitted, I would not have fallen. I did the best I could. Nobody told me how to enter." Without referring to other features of the case (particulars of which are given in the principal opinion filed), it appears to me that on the state of facts above disclosed the plaintiff cannot maintain this action against this defendant. The appliance in question was a simple one. It required no more than ordinary knowledge for its use. It was sound. The only danger to plaintiff arose from the mode and manner of its use; and the mode and manner of using it, on the occasion in question, were within plaintiff's own control. She had used it with safety before, and undoubtedly knew as much about its use for such purposes as did the defendant. In my opinion, plaintiff cannot recover for an injury arising from the manner in which she saw fit to place the ladder in executing the order of defendant to get the pigeons. The latter was a duty which, it seems to me, obviously came within the fair range of plaintiff's employment as a domestic servant. That, indeed, is the very claim made in her petition. Hence (without considering other questions) my concurrence is given to a reversal of the judgment on the general ground that defendant is chargeable with no breach of duty, as indicated in the closing lines of the opinion delivered by my learned colleague, Judge Sherwood.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan
v.

Catherine J KETCHUM.

(.....Mich.....)

A purpose to exhibit, loan, and circulate an obscene picture is not shown by proving the mere sitting for a negative of it.

(January 4, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Circuit Court for Ingham County made during the trial of an information charging defendant with procuring an obscene picture of herself for the purpose of exhibition, loan, and circulation, which resulted in conviction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. A. Ellis, Atty. Gen., and L. B. Gardner, Pros. Atty., for the People.

Messrs. William A. Fraser and Jason E. Nichols for defendant.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was convicted under an information which charged her with having procured a certain obscene picture of herself for the purpose of exhibition, loan, and circulation. Counsel for the people claim that the evidence shows that the defendant employed two itinerant photographers to make negatives of her residence; that subsequently these negatives were found among the effects of said photographers, and that Exhibit A was also found at the same time and place. Exhibit A was a negative of a woman in a practically nude condition, and it is claimed to be a negative of the person of the defendant. Exhibit B was a photograph made from this negative by direction of the prosecuting attorney or sheriff. A witness named Cole testified that he saw a picture identically like Exhibit B in Mohr's cigar store. There was no evidence that any photograph was made from the negative except that made by the officer's direction, unless the picture described by Cole was such.

There was testimony tending to show that the photographers did some work upon nude fancy pictures for Mohr's saloon. The court instructed the jury, in substance, that the negative is a picture, within the meaning of the law; that, if the defendant voluntarily sat in a nude condition, to enable it to be taken, she assisted in obtaining it, and therefore procured it; and that an intention to circulate photographic prints from the negative would be an intention to circulate the picture, within the statute. He left the question of the intent with which it was procured to the jury. We have no doubt that a negative is a picture. We think also that the court was right in holding that sitting for the negative was procuring the negative. The purpose for which the picture was obtained is an essential element of the offense, and must be proved like any other element. There can be no presumption of a particular purpose; it must be a legitimate inference from the evidence. The facts that Wigle & Webb had the negative, and that Cole saw a picture printed from it, do not sufficiently prove it. The natural inference from these facts would be that she sat for a negative to obtain a picture or pictures of herself. While it may be admitted that the usual purpose of procuring photographs is exhibition to friends, it does not necessarily follow that such is the purpose. Nor is there any reason for thinking that she designed that Wigle & Webb should dispose of any to other persons. The purpose does not appear, unless from the fact that one was seen, or from the assumption that she expected or designed to give prints to her friends. There is nothing to show either. If there were testimony tending to show that she did exhibit or circulate the picture, we might legitimately infer that she intended, when she procured it, to make such use of it. But in this case she is not shown to have done more than sit for a negative, and that only appears from the fact that the negative was found in the possession of the photographers, with whom she had done business in relation to other pictures. Upon this record the court should have directed a verdict of not guilty.

Conviction set aside, and a new trial ordered. The other Justices concurred.

I. General doctrine.

A partnership in real estate can be created by parol, and particularly is this so after the partners have acted as such to the final determination of the adventure and divided the profits between them, as in such a case they are in no position to deny the existence of a valid copartnership. Getty v. Devlin (1873) 54 N. Y. 403. Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 52 Barb. 349, followed.

Section 1897 of the Georgia Code provides, a partnership may be created, either by written or parol contract, or it may arise from a joint ownership, use, and enjoyment of the profits of undivided property, real or personal.

The above section of the code has been held to contemplate that lands may be partnership property, but need not in a stricter sense than they were held to be such property prior to the adoption of the code. Sutlive v. Jones (1878) 61 Ga. 678.

A partnership may exist as to a single transaction or enterprise. Kayser v. Maugham (1885) 8 Colo. 222.

And that as well as in a series. Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (2 Daves) 322.

An express agreement providing for a partnership as such is not necessary to create the relation. Kayser v. Maugham, supra.

It may be implied from the acts and interests of the parties, although the words "partnership" or "partner" may never have been used by the parties in connection with the business. Ibid.

Yet a partnership in profits and losses does not necessarily imply a partnership in the property out of which the profits arise. Howe v. Howe (1868) 99 Mass. 71, following French v. Styring (1857) 2 C. B. N. S. 357, 26 L. J. C. P. 181, 3 Jur. N. S. 670.

Ordinary partners may purchase real estate and hold it for partnership purposes. Warner v. Beers (1840) 23 Wend. 103, 159, following Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 159, 3 Am. Dec. 231.

So real estate may be purchased and sold as merchandise, and as such become the sub stratum of a partnership. Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1852) 10 Cush. 458; Ludlow v. Cooper (1854) 4 Ohio St. 1; Baldwin v. Richardson (1870) 33 Tex. 16.

The word "res" being used without qualification, and designating as well things real as personal. Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 433.

An unincorporated company or firm may hold land and incur or convey as it pleases. Oli-ver's Estate (1890) 9 L. R. A. 431, 136 Pa. 43.

The only difference growing out of the rules of law in reference to the conveyance and transmission of real estate. Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 52 Barb. 349.

At law it is deemed the property of the person in whose name it stands, and so in equity in the absence of an agreement or proof of purchase with partnership funds for partnership purposes. Hogle v. Lowe (1877) 12 Nev. 236.

The principle that a joint undertaking among two or more persons, who are to participate in the profit and loss resulting from it constitutes a that the holder of the legal title is a member of a firm which is using the property for partnership purposes.

4. The grantees of land "subject to incumbrances" is not bound to pay a mortgage thereon which did not constitute a part of the consideration of his purchase, and which was not made in good faith for a real indebtedness.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Fourth District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for partnership, is generally averred without reference to the property to which their dealing relates. Sage v. Sherman (1849) supra.

A copartnership which is entered into and commenced immediately is not invalid, although one of its declared objects is the purchase of real estate for the purposes of the firm and is a site for the transaction of its business. Smith v. Tarlton (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 386, 5 L. ed. 665.

Yet conceding that a community of interest is in some sense a partnership, it does not follow that all the incidents and liabilities of a commercial partnership attach. Williams v. Gillies (1878) 75 N. Y. 197.

Premises used by partners for the purposes of their trade are prima facie a part of the partnership property, but such presumption may be rebutted. Osborn v. McBride (1876) 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 23, 8 Sawy. 590; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick (1810) 17 Ves. Jr. 298.

An agreement to build a house and divide the profits will not of itself establish a partnership. Demarest v. Koch (1891) 129 N. Y. 218.

The rules of law applicable to commercial partnerships apply to partnerships in real estate. Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 52 Barb. 349. To the same effect, Sumner v. Hampson (1838) 8 Ohio, 328, 365, 32 Am. Dec. 722.

And so far as the partners and their creditors are concerned it is in equity subject to the same general rules as personal property. Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 366, 7 L. ed. 637.

The law-merchant by which one is answerable as a dormant partner, on a contract made by the partnership of which he is a member, is confined to trade and commerce and does not extend to speculations in the purchase and sale of lands. Pitts v. Waugh (1806) 4 Mass. 424.

Yet as between the partners themselves there may be a dormant partnership in the purchase and sale of real estate, but as between the partners and third persons, the law in regard to dormant partnerships will not apply. Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 616.

The nature of real estate as partnership property is not altered by the mere fact that the respective interests of the partners therein differ in some degree from their interest in the business and will not be sufficient of itself to show that they hold as tenants in common and not as partners. Rank v. Grote (1884) 18 Jones & S. 273.

There may be special covenants and agreements entered into between partners, relative to the use and enjoyment of real estate held by them jointly, to which the land will be considered as held subject. Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 159, 8 Am. Dec. 231.

When real estate is purchased by a firm, the title is held subject to all the incidents of partnership property. Trowbridge v. Cross (1886) 117 Ill. 109.

And a partner is to be regarded in such cases as holding only an interest in the stock or capital 27 L. R. A.

of the partnership, which is personal property. Lindley v. Davis (1887) 7 Mont. 206.

While as between the partners in equity, land may be considered as partnership property, yet the debt secured by it is not a partnership debt. Baxter v. Bell (1879) 19 Hun. 368.

It matters little whether the purchase is made with partnership funds, that is with a joint fund previously formed by contribution from each of the parties of the proportional part, or whether each one separately pays his proportional part of the purchase money, the essential thing being whether it is paid as partnership money for a partnership. Bopp v. Fox (1872) 63 Ill. 540.

To make land partnership property it must be purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes; or at least one of these elements must be present. Alkire v. Kahle (1888) 123 Ill. 496; Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 183; Wheatley v. Calhoun (1841) 12 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654; Alexander v. Kimbro (1873) 49 Miss. 529.

If the land is necessary for the partnership purposes, and bought with the partnership assets, it makes no difference whether the real estate is leasehold or in fee; once established that such property is partnership property it comes under the operation of the general principles which arise out of partnership contracts, there being no reason why the operation of such principles should be restricted to any particular class or species of partnership property. Darby v. Darby (1856) 8 Drew. 495, 2 Jur. N. S. 271, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 413.

In all such cases the whole character of the property dealt with must be looked to, and it must be seen what the property is ancillary to, whether the land is ancillary to the trade or whether the trade is ancillary to the land. Steward v. Blakeway (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. 479, 16 Week. Rep. 1104.

Land used in the trade is part of the partnership property and therefore personal estate, while land not used for partnership purposes but let out to tenants, will remain real estate. Waterer v. Waterer (1878) L. R. 15 Eq. 402.

The general doctrine with regard to real estate owned by a copartnership, deducible from the decisions upon the subject, is that real estate purchased by partners with partnership funds for partnership purposes, and appropriated to such purposes is, as between the partners themselves and the creditors, partnership property, and although held by them at law as tenants in common, is considered in equity as personal estate so far as it is required for the purposes of the firm, that is, the payment of the debts and liabilities of the partnership, and the settlement of the claims of the partners as between themselves.

The following cases arranged in order of states illustrate this doctrine: Pugh v. Currie (1843) 5 Ala. 446; Owens v. Collins (1853) 23 Ala. 337; Murphy v. Abrams (1874) 50 Ala. 296; Brewer v. Browne (1880) 68 Ala. 210; Little v. Suedecor (1875) 52 Ala. 167; Ro-

Statement by Magruder, J.:

The original bill in these consolidated causes was filed by certain persons doing a banking business, as partners, under the name of the Robinson Bank, for the purpose of removing the three mortgages, hereinafter named, as clouds upon the title of Abner P. Woodworth, trustee for said bank, to four acres of land in Robinson, in the county of Crawford. Upon the first trial in the circuit court, all the mortgages were set aside. Upon appeal to the appellate court, the decree of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause was remanded. The cause was heard a second time in the circuit court; and at the second hearing the mortgage to Lamport was set aside as fraudulent, and his cross-bill to foreclose the same was dismissed, but the two Emmons mortgages were sustained as valid, and the prayers of the cross-bills and supplemental cross-bills to foreclose the same were granted by the entry of the decree of foreclosure. The second decree of the circuit court has been affirmed by the appellate court, and the present appeal is prosecuted from such judgment of affirmance.

The two causes, here consolidated by agreement, involve two appeals: One is the appeal of the Robinson Bank, which brings up for review the action of the lower courts in sustaining the Emmons mortgages, and refusing to remove the same as clouds. The other is the appeal of Thomas V. Lamport, which questions the action of the lower courts in refusing to sustain his mortgage, and in dismissing his cross-bill. Other questions were involved and other parties were interested in the hearings heretofore had in the circuit and appellate courts, but, as the record now stands, the only question presented is whether or not the trustees of the bank holds the title to the land subject to the lien of said mortgages, or either or any of them.

The material facts which it is necessary to state are as follows:

Prior to April, 1883, said four acres upon which there was a flour mill were owned, two thirds thereof by John Newton, and one third thereof by Henry O. Wilkin. Wilkin sold his one-third interest to one Dyer, who executed a mortgage thereon to secure the purchase money. Dyer died, and the mort-

Although the company is a corporation and the shares are assignable, and one shareholder is not answerable for the acts of another in relation to the partnership concern. Bligh v. Brent, supra.

The rule is founded upon the ground of a trust imposed upon all who hold the legal title on behalf of gage so given by him was foreclosed. This one-third interest was sold under the decree of foreclosure on April 20, 1883, to John S. Emmons, for $8500, and a certificate of sale was issued to Emmons by the master. By arrangement between Wilkin and John S. Emmons, the latter gave to the former, in payment of the purchase money, two notes,—one for $2000, secured upon a farm, and the other for $1500,—dated April 24, 1883, due on or before April 24, 1884, with Willis Emmons, a brother of John S., as surety thereon. Subsequently, suit was brought upon this note for $1500, and judgment obtained against Willis Emmons, who paid the whole of the judgment, no part thereof being paid by John S. Emmons. A few days after the purchase of the one-third interest by John S. Emmons at the master's sale, John Newton sold an undivided one-third interest in the four acres, except three fourths of an acre in the northeast corner thereof, to the appellant, Frank O. Miller, for $3000, and executed a deed therefor to Miller. It would appear from the evidence that Newton resided upon the three quarters of an acre, all partnership objects, and such trust once discharged the residue resumes its former character. Huston v. Neil (1878) 41 Ind. 504.

The doctrine establishing, by equitable fiction, partnership real estate as personality, is in favor of trade and for the benefit of surviving partners and firm creditors, and the Minnesota statutes have not changed the doctrine. Marrett v. Murphy (1876) 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 181.

The theory being that every person who shares in the profits deprives creditors of parties of the means of payment. Williams v. Gillies (1876) 58 How. Pr. 429.

Real property held in the joint names of the firm as partnership stock is regarded at law as held and owned by the partners as tenants in common, where there is no agreement or understanding to the contrary, and will be so treated; in equity, however, it is regarded as held in trust as partnership property, subject to the rules applicable to personal estate and liable to the claims of the partner inter se, and to the partnership debts and liabilities. Galbraith v. Gedge (1856) 16 B. Mon. 681.

Lands bought by a commercial concern for the purpose of the partnership concern are considered in equity as forming a part of the partnership fund and stock in trade, particularly during the lives of the partners. Lyman v. Lyman (1829) 3 Paine, C. C. 11.

The ground of the equitable doctrine appears to be a specific interference of equity in favor of commerce, whereby the trust is separated from the legal estate, the latter being left to pass according to the nature of the property; the trust estate is made subject to the rules of partnership personal property, so far as concerns the interests of the partners in relation to one another, and those who are in privity with them. Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 358, 80 Am. Dec. 448.

Such doctrine is a necessary sequence of the principle, which imposes upon the real estate its character of assets, as well for the settlement and liquidation of the accounts between the partners as to answer the demand of creditors. Whitney v. Cotten (1876) 53 Miss. 689.

Land thus acquired or obtained as a means of collection and taken in payment of a firm debt, acquires many of the incidents of personal property, so far as an adjustment and settlement of the partnership accounts are concerned. Espy v. Comer (1884) 76 Ala. 501.

It is considered personality to the extent that it is under the control of the chancellor in making a final adjustment of the affairs of the partnership, or in marshaling assets among the creditors. Mauck v. Mauck (1870) 54 Ill. 281.

The doctrine is, however, purely equitable, and the legal title with all the characteristics of realty attaches to it, until it is so applied to partnership wants. Espy v. Comer, supra.

Equity interfering for equitable purposes only. Wilcox v. Wilcox (1866) 18 Allen, 262.

And will not act upon doubtful proof, particularly when the rights of strangers or third parties are affected. National Union Bank of Maryland v. National Mechanics' Bank of Baltimore (Md.) Dec. 16, 1894, where the required evidence pointed out the property being that of the individual members.

Three things are necessary to constitute real estate partnership property; first, it must be purchased for that purpose; secondly, it must be appropriated thereto, and thirdly, it must be paid for with partnership funds. Pepper v. Pepper (1887) 24 Ill. App. 818; Messer v. Messer (1879) 59 N. H. 375.

It must have been purchased for partnership purposes and on partnership account, or must in some form have been voluntarily subjected by the legal owner to the equitable rights and liens of all the partners and of the partnership creditors. Chamberlain v. Chamberlain (1878) 12 Jones & S. 116.

Facts must concur in order to constitute real estate partnership property, namely, acquisition with partnership funds or on partnership credit, and it must be for the use of the partnership. Hatchett v. Blanton (1882) 72 Ala. 423, following Ware v. Owens (1868) 43 Ala. 212, 94 Am. Dec. 642; Owens v. Collins (1868) 23 Ala. 397; Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 198.

It should not only have been purchased with partnership funds but it should have been used for partnership purposes. Cox v. McBurney (1849) 3 Sandf. 562; Crawshaw v. Maule (1818) 1 Swanst. 508; Phillips v. Phillips (1833) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 7 Cond. Ch. Rep. 208, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Fereday v. Wightwick (1829) 1 Russ. & M. 45, Taml. 260.

A decree in equity making real estate partnership property is conclusive upon the partners who are parties to the bill, and a sale made thereunder will pass their interests. Foster v. Barnes (1876) 81 Pa. 377.

Where real estate becomes partnership property, fixtures attached by the partners may become part of it. Robertson v. Corsett (1878) 89 Mich. 777; Christian v. Dripps (1887) 28 Pa. 271.

It depends mainly upon the question, whether or not the property has been brought into the firm as part of the joint stock. Brown v. Morrill (1891) 45 Minn. 438; Riedeberg v. Schmitt (1888) 71 Wis. 644.

And the transaction must be construed with reference to the character of the property, and the legal rules applicable to it. Williams v. Gillies (1878) 76 N. Y. 197.

When land is conveyed to the several partners, it is indispensable that it should be actually used for partnership purposes, or that a positive agreement should be proved making it partnership property. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun. 407.

Yet a special agreement that real estate purchased with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes is not necessary for the purpose of constituting it partnership property. Jarvis v. Brooks (1868) 27 N. H. 87, 59 Am. Dec. 369.

Where tenants in common are prima facie also copartners in business, and partnership funds have been expended in the purchase of real property for excepted from Miller's deed. Thereupon, Newton, being the owner of an undivided one third of the four acres, and Emmons, being the holder of a master's certificate of sale of an undivided one third of the four acres, and Miller, being the owner of an undivided one third of three and one-quarter acres of said four acres, formed a partnership, under the firm name of Newton, Emmons & Miller, to engage in the business of milling and buying and selling grain. There were no written articles of partnership. The partnership arrangement was oral merely. The business of the firm was done in the mill upon the land. In August, 1888, the firm was indebted to the Robinson Bank in the sum of $5400 for advances made to it by the bank for use in the grain business, and to pay for improvements in the mill machinery; and, when the bank called for payment of this amount, Newton and Miller each paid one third of it,—$1800,—but John S. Emmons gave the bank his note for $1800, dated August 28, 1888, due four months after date, with Wiley S. Emmons and William W. Walter as sureties thereon; the former being his father, the use of the copartnership, and the same has been used for partnership purposes by agreement to that end, it is to be treated in equity as partnership assets and is liable for the debts due to the creditors of the copartnership. Hiscook v. Phelps (1872) 49 N. Y. 108.

And it is of no consequence whether the partnership is for a definite or an indefinite period. Mitchell v. Read (1872) 61 Barb. 310.

There must, however, be satisfactory evidence of an appropriation of the property to the use of the company, for the purpose of making it a part of the stock in trade. Richards v. Manson (1880) 101 Mass. 484.

The manner in which and the purposes for which it is used, the conduct of the parties in applying the partnership funds in payment and maintenance of the property are facts which authorize a referee to hold it partnership property. Everett v. Schepmoes (1876) 6 Hun. 480.

Usually it is not so unless partnership assets have been used to purchase it, or unless it was put in originally as a part of the joint estate. Reynolds v. Ruckman (1876) 85 Mich. 80.

A stipulation in partnership articles, that at the termination of the partnership the property shall be sold for the payment of debts, shows the original understanding of the parties that real estate was to be treated as partnership effects, and not as an estate in lands held in common. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 536, 18 Am. Dec. 642.

It by no means follows, however, from the operation of such real estate by the firm, the transactions of each operation being entered in the same books, kept entirely distinct and separate from those of the other, that real estate used for partnership purposes is partnership property, a contrary presumption prevailing when the title is not in the firm, to rebut which it must be shown either that it was paid for with firm money, or that an agreement existed to treat it as common stock. Shafer's App. (1884) 106 Pa. 49.

There must be something more than a mere community of interest to make parties partners in land; there must be a joint adventure with an agreement to share in the profits and losses thereof. Bird v. Morrison (1800) 12 Wis. 158.

So when the title is in the name of one member of the firm, the presumption is that it is his individual property until shown to belong to the firm. Jones v. Smith (1889) 81 S. C. 527.

Yet property which has been used and treated as partnership property cannot be presumed to belong to one partner simply because he has paid for it, for the presumption in such case is rather that the property in question was his contribution to the common stock. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

Thus land credited to a partner holding the legal title thereto, charged in the firm books and used for the firm purposes, is partnership property. Bergeron v. Richardott (1882) 55 Wis. 128.

And if the funds be advanced to such partner, or if he gets credit in the firm books for the amount invested in such purchase for firm purposes, it is partnership property though he retain the legal title. Boyers v. Elliott (1846) 7 Humph. 204.

The simple fact that land has been paid for out of partnership funds is not of itself sufficient to stamp it with the character of personality, and subject it to the lien of partnership; it must have been necessary for the conducting of the business of the partnership, and there must be some contract or agreement, either express or implied, that it should be converted into personality. Robertson v. Baker (1866-7) 11 Fla. 192.

But where purchased with funds put in by two partners as their share of capital for partnership purposes and improved, it is partnership property though conveyed to them in common. National Bank of the Metropolis v. Sprague (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 13.

And so it is where contributed to capital stock by one partner, at an estimated valuation inventoried and carried to the stock account, although he has the legal title. Clark's App. (1872) 73 Pa. 142.

Also where the purchase is made by the financial partner for the promotion of the business and improved with firm money. Lacy v. Hall (1861) 87 Pa. 380.

The mere fact that land is bought with partnership funds is ordinarily not sufficient, where the conveyance is made to one alone and the property is never used for partnership purposes. Richards v. Manson (1889) 101 Mass. 484.

And this is so even though the rents and profits thereof may have gone into the partnership business. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 22.

The fact that land was acquired during the existence of the partnership, and in the firm name alone, has been held not sufficient evidence to establish it as partnership stock. Alkire v. Kahle (1888) 128 Ill. 496; Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22.

So the mere use of the property by the firm does not impress upon it the character of partnership property, it not being an uncommon thing for a partnership to use the property of its several members, or of a preceding partnership. Hatchett v. Blanton (1882) 73 Ala. 428.

And such use by the sufferance of the legal owner does not operate to divest his title. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin (1878) 12 Jones & S. 114.

The fact that lands were purchased during the existence of a firm with partnership moneys, the title being taken in the name of one partner, is but a single persuasive circumstance tending to show that there are partnership assets. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1896) 56 Fed. Rep. 409.

And the mere fact that tenants in common are also partners does not of itself invest real estate with any of the characteristics of personality, nor is the fact that it was paid for out of partnership money decisive of the question. Lindley v. Davis (1897) 7 Mont. 206.

Taking a deed in the joint name of two persons who are partners will not of itself render the real and the latter his father-in-law. Subsequently, the bank sued and obtained judgment upon this note, and the judgment was paid, one half by Wiley S. Emmons, and one half by Walter, but no part thereof by John S. Emmons. The firm continued to do business until September 2, 1884, at which time it had become indebted to the bank in the sum of $21,585.32, and to various other creditors in various amounts. It is conceded that the firm was then insolvent.

Miller had executed a note, dated May 1, 1883, payable on or before September 1, 1884, to the order of said Lamport, his brother-in-law, for the sum of $5500. On July 22, 1884, he executed a mortgage to secure this note to Lamport, upon his undivided one-third interest in said mill property, which mortgage was recorded on September 2, 1884. On September 1, 1884, John S. Emmons executed two mortgages on his undivided one-third interest in said property (he having obtained a master's deed),—one to Willis Emmons, to secure him as surety upon said note for $1500, and the other to Wiley S. Emmons and William W. Walter, to secure estate partnership property and liable for partnership debts; there must be some express act or understanding. Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 205.

Again, the mere fact that real estate is held in the joint names of several owners, or in the name of one for the benefit of all, is no evidence of co-partnership between them with respect to it. Thompson v. Bowman (1897) 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 216, 18 L. ed. 738.

Unless the contract under which the partnership is claimed fairly excludes every construction under which the property can retain its usual characteristics of real estate, it should be held not to have created a partnership in the land. Thompson v. Holden (1898) 117 Mo. 118.

But the fact that it is paid for with partnership funds after the death of a partner, the conveyance being taken to the survivor and the heirs of the deceased partner, does not change its character as partnership property. Matthews v. Hunter (1878) 97 Mo. 282.

The mere assertion in an agreement relating to the sale and participation in the profits of real estate, and reference to the land "as said partnership land" is not sufficient to constitute a partnership therein, but the rights, duties, and interests of the parties must be read and construed in order to determine their true relationship, and the manner in which the land was held, in order to determine its character. Thompson v. Holden, supra.

Yet an admission that the real estate was principally, if not wholly, purchased with partnership funds, is strong evidence that it is partnership property in equity, and is ordinarily decisive to the extent of the partnership investment. Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 173.

So the circumstances that payment was made out of partnership funds, especially if the property purchased was necessary to the operations of the partnership business, and was actually so employed, affords a very cogent presumption that it was intended to be held as partnership property, and in the absence of all countervailing circumstances will be absolutely decisive. Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 181; Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 B. L. 173, 67 Am. Dec. 510.

But it is not enough to convert the partners into tenants in common that the lot was not necessary for partnership purposes; if it was acquired for such purposes with the joint funds, it becomes a part of the joint property though the business could have been carried on without it. Erwin's App. (1861) 89 Pa. 535, 80 Am. Dec. 543.

Where the purchase is made and the property used for partnership accommodation, it cannot at common law, in contravention of the Maine statute, become a joint estate. Blake v. Nutter (1841) 19 Me. 16.

In Cape Sable Co's Case (1823-24) 3 Bland, Ch. 606, it was held that even though there be a declaration that the property of the corporation should be held as real estate and descend as such, its personality must be treated as regards the stockholders as such, yet it did not follow that it must be so considered for all purposes.

Yet where the land is purchased for the partnership use, or it has been agreed that it shall be considered partnership property, it is enough that the purchase has been made with partnership funds. Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 3 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 805.

Facts showing that premises leased for oil and mining purposes were treated as partnership property, having gone into the partnership stock, are evidence of a partnership, and such property may be converted into partnership assets for the payment of the partnership debts. Brown v. Beecher (1898) 120 Pa. 590. Shafer's App. (1884) 108 Pa. 49, distinguished.

II. The question of intention.

a. In general.

As to the intention of the partners to work a conversion out and out, see head VIII., infra.

There is no rule that where lands are bought by partners in trade and are paid for out of the partnership assets they of necessity become part of the joint estate, nor, on the other hand, that if they are bought for the purposes of the partnership business they are not joint estate; nor does the form of the conveyance settle the question which must be determined with reference to all the circumstances of the case. Ex parte Neale, Re Laurence, Case of the Bank of England (1861) 3 De G. F. & J. 645.

It would be difficult to state any one part or stipulation which would be decisive of the question, except a stipulation expressed that they were partners inter se, and even this might be controlled by other stipulations and the conduct of the parties in relation to the business. Thompson v. Holden (1898) 117 Mo. 118; McDonald v. Matney (1884) 89 Mo. 358.

Land not being ordinarily a subject of partnership operation, it requires strong evidence to show an intention to convert it into partnership stock. Brooke v. Washington (1851) 8 Gratt. 243, 56 Am. Dec. 143.

The question is, however, to be determined from the intention of the parties, the above general doctrine being applied in all cases where there is not an express agreement or circumstances showing a contrary intention. Lenow v. Fones (1896) 48 Ark. 537; Hyman v. Peters (1899) 80 Ill. App. 184; Nicoll v. Ogden (1892) 29 Ill. 323, 81 Am. Dec. 311; Loubat v. Nourse (1893) 5 Fla. 360; Robertson v. Baker (1867) 11 Fla. 129; Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mon. 631; Hogie v. Lowe (1877) 12 Nev. 266; Duryea v. Burt (1865) 28 Cal. 598; Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 B. L. 173, 67 Am. Dec. 510; Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 173; Ex parte Emily, 1 Rose, Bankr. Cas. 54; Page v. Thomas (1895) 43 Ohio St. 38, 54 Am. Rep. 793; Ludlow v. Cooper (1884) 4 Ohio St. 1; Rank v. Grote (1884) 18 Jones & S 375; Ware v. Owens (1868) 42 Ala. 212, 94 Am. Dec. 642; Buckley v. Buckley (1860) 11 Barb. 74; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471; Providence v. Bullock (1884) 14 R. L. 368; Shafer's them as sureties upon said note for $1800. One of these mortgages was recorded on September 1, 1884, and the other on September 2, 1884. The three mortgages thus described are those which the original bill asks to remove as clouds. Newton has died since this suit was begun, but the proof tends to show that said mortgages were not made with his knowledge. His one-third interest was free of mortgage. The bank learned of the making of these mortgages on September 2, 1884. Its officers on that day had an interview with the members of the firm, and sought to obtain a deed from them of the mill property, offering $16,000 therefor. Sixteen thousand dollars was agreed upon as the value of the property, and was the consideration agreed upon for the transfer, and was finally paid therefor in credits on the firm indebtedness to the bank. On September 2, 1884, Newton and his wife and Miller and his wife executed to Woodworth, as trustee for the bank, a deed conveying "all of the interest of the grantors" in the four acres, except the three quarters of an acre above mentioned. The consideration expressed in the deed is $5833. The

A universal partnership may be created where the intention is clearly expressed. Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 616.

Wherever partners manifest their intention to hold land as partnership stock, either by express convention or by their course of dealing, it will be treated as such in all respects by courts of equity. Sumner v. Hampson (1838) 8 Ohio, 823, 865, 82 Am. Dec. 723.

If the property has been paid for with partnership funds, it is then a question of intention whether the conveyance is to have its legal effect and the parties are to be treated as tenants in common, or whether the land is to be treated as partnership property. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun, 407.

The question as to whether or not real property is partnership stock, being one of intention. Pepper v. Pepper (1887) 24 Ill. App. 316; Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 188; Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1852) 10 Cush. 462.

To be ascertained from the partners' own acts and agreements. Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 353, 80 Am. Dec. 443.

And gathered from the manner in which the members of the firm have dealt with it. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 18, 1894.

The contracts, promises, or mutual understandings of the partners governing. Tenney v. Simpson (1887) 37 Kan. 353; Marsh v. Davis (1885) 33 Kan. 323; Morrill v. Colehour (1876) 82 Ill. 619; Knott v. Knott (1878) 6 Or. 142; Collins v. Decker (1879) 70 Me. 23; York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95; Clark's App. (1872) 72 Pa. 142.

The controlling element being the intention with which the purchase is made. Holmes v. Self (1881) 79 Ky. 297; Providence v. Bullock (1884) 14 R. I. 353.

To be gathered from all the attending circumstances. Flanagan v. Shuck (1885) 88 Ky. 617; Ex parte Neale, Re Laurence, Case of the Bank of England (1861) 8 De G. F. & J. 645.

As where the land was purchased as an article of commerce and for speculation; the intention of the partners stamping its character. Morrill v. Colehour, supra; Boone v. Clark (1880) 5 L. R. A. 279, 129 Ill. 466.

Such agreement or intention may be expressed in the articles, or in writing evidencing its purchase, or verbally. Wilhite v. Boulware (1889) 88 Ky. 169.

It may be implied from the circumstances of the purchase and the conduct of the parties. Ibid.; Richards v. Manson (1889) 101 Mass. 484.

All depends upon the express or implied agreement of the partners. Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 353, 80 Am. Dec. 443; Brown v. Morrill (1891) 45 Minn. 433; Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 32.

And is to be determined by the evidence. Rank v. Grote (1884) 18 Jones & S. 275.

It is a matter of inference where not expressly declared in the partnership deed. Riedeburg v. Schmitt (1888) 71 Wis. 644.

The circumstances of each case, or the actual agreement of the parties, controlling. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

So the intention may be manifested in the acts and declarations of the partners. Shafer's App. (1884) 106 Pa. 49; Erwin's App. (1861) 39 Pa. 535, 80 Am. Dec. 542; Abbott's App. (1865) 50 Pa. 234; West Hickory Min. Asso. v. Reed (1875) 80 Pa. 33; Coliner v. Greig (1880) 137 Pa. 606; Warriner v. Mitchell (1889) 128 Pa. 153; Miller's Estate (1888) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 147.

It may be made a part of the partnership stock by parol agreement of the partners. Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22; Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 353, 80 Am. Dec. 450.

No express agreement in writing or otherwise being essential, even in cases where the legal title to the firm property is not vested in all of its members, but is in one or more. Brown v. Morrill (1891) 45 Minn. 433; Ames v. Ames (1888) 37 Fed. Rep. 30.

It being a question of intention in one case as well as the other. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 18, 1894.

It is enough if from all the acts and conduct of the partners the court can be satisfied that it was the thought and intention of the partners to treat it as partnership property. Ames v. Ames, supra.

The manner in which the accounts are kept, whether the purchase money is severally charged to the members of the firm, or whether the accounts treat it the same as other firm property as to purchase money, income, expenses, etc., are controlling circumstances in determining such contention, and from these circumstances an intention may be inferred. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun, 407; Collumb v. Read, (1882) 24 N. Y. 511.

The manner in which and the purposes for which it is used and the partner's conduct in applying partnership funds in its payment and maintenance, are also matters for consideration. Everett v. Schoepmoes (1876) 6 Hun, 479; Garrett v. Scheffer (1872) 42 N. Y. 656; Buchan v. Summer (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 305.

The intent to consider real estate partnership assets may be implied from the fact that the losses in the transaction are to be sustained by the assets of the firm, and the profits which may accrue are to augment the capital of the firm. Hisecock v. Jaycox (1875) 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 516.

The fact that real estate is purchased and paid for with partnership funds, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is proof of an intention of its being partnership property. Hunt v. Benson (1841) 2 Humph. 459.

The mere fact that the purchase of real property with partnership funds, or to pay a debt owing to the firm, is sufficient presumptive evidence of such intention, and in the absence of anything to the contrary, is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the real estate is in equity personal property. Page v. Thomas (1885) 43 Ohio St. 33, 54 Am. Rep. 793; Hoxie deed contains the words, "The grantee takes subject to incumbrances on the interest conveyed." At that time, John S. Emmons refused to join in the deed, saying that $16,000 was an inadequate consideration. But afterwards, on September 4, 1884, John S. Emmons and his wife executed a quitclaim deed to Woodworth, as such trustee, conveying "one third individued interest" in the four acres above mentioned. The consideration named in this deed is $3,833.83. On September 8, 1884, Newton and Miller confessed judgment in favor of the bank for $16,252.32, and on the next day John S. Emmons confessed judgment in the bank's favor for the same amount. $16,252.32 was the amount of indebtedness remaining due to the bank after crediting $5333 (which was the agreed value of Newton's one-third interest, and the consideration named in his and Miller's deed to the bank) upon the total indebtedness of $21,585.83. Execution was at once issued upon these judgments, and levied upon certain grain and other personal property belonging to the firm, which was sold by the sheriff on or about November 10, 1884, for Cornwall (1890) 6 Bush. 390; King v. Weeks (1874) 70 N. C. 372; Holmes v. Moon (1872) 7 Heisk. 506; Clark's App. (1873) 72 Pa. 142; Shafer's App. (1884) 106 Pa. 49.

Yet the payment of the purchase money from the partnership fund is, however, only prima facie evidence of such intention. Providence v. Bullock (1884) 14 R. L. 358.

But it requires less evidence to overcome the presumption arising from the payment of the purchase money from the partnership fund, where the land is neither intended nor used for partnership purposes. Ibid.

So the rights of the parties must be deduced from their intention as shown by the agreement, read in the light of surrounding circumstances. Thompson v. Holden (1893) 117 Mo. 118.

Each case must be determinable on its own peculiar facts. Ibid.; McDonald v. Matney (1884) 3 Mo. 358.

Which are necessarily a matter of inference and evidence. Brown v. Morrell (1891) 45 Minn. 438; Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 358, 80 Am. Dec. 448; Sherwood v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1875) 21 Minn. 127.

Their application or use for the purposes of the concern, so as to evidence an original understanding of the parties that they are to be treated as such and not as an estate in common, shows an intention. Woodriddle v. Wilkins (1899) 3 How. (Miss.) 360.

The rule being that in order to convert it into personality, or purposes beyond these or for all, there must be an agreement either express or implied to do so. Flanagan v. Shuck (1885) 82 Ky. 617.

The intention may be shown by parol. Warner v. Mitchell (1899) 128 Pa. 161; Shafer's App. (1884) 106 Pa. 49; Erwin's App. (1861) 39 Pa. 535, 80 Am. Dec. 542; Abbott's App. (1865) 50 Pa. 234; West Hickory Min. Assn. v. Reed (1875) 80 Pa. 33.

The facts which will govern the quality of personal estate to partnership land cannot be presumed, but must be alleged and proved, where one who is either a purchaser or creditor is sought to be affected. Kepler v. Erie Dime Sav. & Loan Co. (1882) 101 Pa. 602.

In an action against several defendants as partners, the plaintiff is entitled to lay all the facts of the case before the jury in order to determine the question whether or not the transaction is that of the partnership and as such binding upon the partnership firm. Habig v. Layne (1894) 38 Neb. 743.

Real estate purchased with partnership funds for the use of the firm, without any intention of withdrawing the funds from the firm for the use of all or any of the members thereof as individuals, is in equity to be considered and treated as the property of the members of the firm collectively. Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 428.

Partners, being the owners of the money which pays for the title, have the power of directing its application to suit their own purposes, and to secure the identity of its character in the kind of title they take for it, and therefore if they take the title to themselves as tenants in common, instead of as partners, they by their own election stamp the character of the title taken as to those who afterwards deal with them. Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79.

When, however, during the existence of a partnership, real estate is purchased with partnership funds and the title thereto is taken in the name of one member of the firm the real estate so acquired does not become a part of the firm assets, unless such was the intention of the partners. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1893) 56 Fed. Rep. 409; Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 R. L. 173, 87 Am. Dec. 510; Ludlow v. Cooper (1854) 4 Ohio St. 1; Collumb v. Read (1832) 24 N. Y. 605; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Page v. Thomas (1885) 43 Ohio St. 33, 54 Am. Rep. 738.

Therefore, where there is no positive evidence that real estate purchased by one partner is partnership property, the whole matter resting upon circumstances, such circumstances must be strong and carry with them the full conviction, in order to justify a specific recovery of such property after a great lapse of time by the heirs of a deceased partner. Hart v. Hawkins (1814) 3 Bibb, 502, 6 Am. Dec. 693.

Although land is not purchased with partnership funds, but with the separate funds of the parties in equal proportion, upon an understanding that it is to be considered and treated as partnership property, it will be considered as such. Ludlow v. Cooper, supra.

Property purchased with partnership funds does not of necessity become partnership property, if that is not the intention of the parties; especially in all cases steering wide of fraud and breach of trust. Hoxie v. Carr (1833) 1 Sumn. 173; Ex parte Emly, 1 Rose, Bankr. Cas. 64.

The use to which the property is applied does not necessarily determine the question as to whether it is to be treated as personal or real estate, but it is the intention with which the purchase is made that is the controlling element. Holmes v. Self (1881) 79 Ky. 297.

So the mere fact that property held by the firm as tenants in common is used in and for the partnership business is not of itself sufficient to convert it into partnership stock, there must be some evidence or further agreement to make it partnership property. Alexander v. Kimbro (1873) 49 Miss. 529; Frink v. Branch (1884), 16 Conn. 261.

The use thereof being only an evidence of the intention of the partners to make it personality or realty, and if such intention to make it personality is clearly manifest by the partners in the purchase, the fact that there is a nonuser for partnership purposes will not recommit it to real estate. Holmes v. Self, supra.

The mere fact that partners carrying on a partnership business upon a lot belonging to the members of the firm does not necessarily impress it

$5380.06, and the latter amount was credited upon the execution. The bank took possession of the mill on or about September 3, 1884, and operated it until it was transferred, during the pendency of this litigation, to Singleton B. Allen, originally a member of the banking firm, and appointed receiver in this cause. The books of Newton, Emmons & Miller remained in the mill after the bank took possession, and collections were made on the accounts under the direction of Newton, who had become an employé of the bank. The books showed accounts due to the firm to the amount of $3348.73. The bank paid the wife of John S. Emmons $300 for signing the deed to Woodworth. On January 14, 1885, it gave credit on its books for $16,000, as the consideration of the conveyance to it of the mill property, and on the same day entered upon the margin of the record of the judgments for $16,252.32 each against Newton and Miller and Emmons a receipt dated back to September 4, 1884, for $10,666.66, credited "on this judgment by balance conveyance of the Eclipse Mills and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the tract with the character of partnership property. Ware v. Owens (1868) 42 Ala. 212, 24 Am. Dec. 642.

And although the property may be in the occupation of the firm, that fact alone will not as between the partners themselves, or between the partners and creditors, convert the individual real property of one partner into joint property of the partnership, there must be something which amounts to a representation that it is joint property, or conduct justifying the creditor to treat it as such. Goepper v. Kinsinger (1888) 30 Ohio St. 420.

It would be unreasonable to suppose that partners in farming, a business in which real estate occupied and used is the most important and extensive part, intended, by purchasing lands with partnership funds, or by using the land as partnership property, to blend the land and the stock, produce and implements of husbandry into one common and entire thing, and to treat it as personal property. Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688.

Unless an intention exists between the joint owners to throw their real estate in the firm as partnership stock, and such intention is distinctly manifest, or unless the property is bought out of the social funds for partnership purposes, it will still retain its character of real estate. Wheatley v. Calhoun (1841) 12 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654; Brook v. Washington (1851) 8 Gratt. 248, 56 Am. Dec. 142.

If it is not the intention of the partners to purchase and hold real estate for partnership purposes, there can be no objection to such purchase made in good faith and for their individual account. Marrett v. Murphy (1875) 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 131.

Where land is purchased for partnership use, or it is agreed that it shall be considered partnership property, it is enough that the purchase has been made with partnership funds. Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 168, 5 L. ed. 601, 47 Am. Dec. 305, distinguished in Collum v. Read (1862) 24 N. Y. 512, a case where the land was purchased with partnership funds.

The circumstance that the payment has been made out of partnership funds, especially if the property purchased is necessary for the ordinary operations of the partnership business, and is actually so employed, affords a very cogent presumption that it is intended to be held as partnership property, and in the absence of all countervailing circumstances will be absolutely decisive. Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 173; Thornton v. Dixon (1791) 3 Bro. Ch. 190; Crawshaw v. Maule (1818) 1 Swanst. 508; Smith v. Smith (1800) 5 Ves. Jr. 189; Forster v. Hale (1798) 3 Ves. Jr. 606 (1800) 5 Ves. Jr. 308; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick (1810) 17 Ves. Jr. 298; M'Dermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 438, 10 Am. Dec. 468.

Yet it is not conclusive, although when accompanied by the entry of the transactions of the firm books as a partnership transaction under circumstances importing a daily declaration that it was so regarded, it is convincing evidence. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 18, 1894, following Merritt 97 L. R. A.

v. Dickey (1878) 38 Mich. 41; Way v. Stebbins (1883) 47 Mich. 296; Williams v. Sheldon (1886) 61 Mich. 311; Hoxie v. Carr (1882) 1 Sumn. 173; Balmain v. Shore (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. 500; Forde v. Herron (1814) 4 Munf. 316; N'Dermot v. Laurence, supra.

The circumstance that the conveyance is in the names of the parties as tenants in common may afford some presumption, in the absence of countervailing presumptions, that the conveyance is not designed to be on a partnership account, but per se is very slight and never decisive. Hoxie v. Carr, supra.

It is necessary to show, when the intention of the partners is not manifest, whether the real estate so acquired is used for partnership purposes, or whether the income derived therefrom and the expenses incident thereto are carried into the partnership accounts and treated as partnership matters. The facts that real estate so acquired is used for partnership purposes; that the income derived therefrom and the expenses incident thereto are carried into the partnership accounts and treated as partnership matters,—are controlling circumstances in determining whether lands purchased with the money of a firm and held in the name of one partner, are in fact partnership assets. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1893) 56 Fed. Rep. 409; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471; Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1852) 10 Cush. 458; Collins v. Decker (1879) 70 Me. 28; Columb v. Read (1862) 24 N. Y. 506; York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95; Sherwood v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1876) 21 Minn. 128.

In such cases it will be considered as partnership property, yet there must be distinct evidence of the intention of the members to hold it as real estate, in which case each will have his interest in common with the others. Wilhite v. Boulware (1889) 38 Ky. 160.

Partners being the owners of the money which pays for the title have the power of directing its application to suit their own purposes, and can if they choose always secure the identity of its character in the kind of title they take for it, and if they take title to themselves as tenants in common instead of as partners, they, by their own election, stamp the character of the title as to those who afterwards deal with them. Second Nat. Bank of Titusville's App. (1877) 38 Pa. 308; Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79.

Where real estate is acquired by the partners for their joint use, and for the purposes intended is taken into the firm and used in its operation, the partners occupying the same relation with respect to it as if it had been purchased with their joint moneys, it will be impressed with the character of partnership property. Roberts v. McCarty (1857) 9 Ind. 16, 68 Am. Dec. 604.

So machinery not made expressly for use in the building, and capable of beneficial use upon being removed and set up in some other building, may become a part of the real estate if such is the intention, or it may remain personal estate if the understanding is clearly indicated or deducible from the circumstances. Robertson v. Corsett (1878) 39 of land on which said mill is situated." The proof shows that the firm of Newton, Emmons & Miller put new machinery in the mill, after the formation of their partnership, to the amount of about $11,200.

Messrs. Callahan, Jones & Lowe for appellants.

Messrs. Parker, Crowley & Bogard for appellees.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Robinson Bank, one of the appellants herein, claims that the mill property, including the four acres of land upon which the mill was located, was partnership property belonging to the firm of Newton, Emmons & Miller; that as such it was first liable to be subjected to the payment of the partnership creditors, including the bank; that the mortgagees, Lampport, Walter, and Willis and Wiley S. Emmons, were individual creditors of Miller and John S. Emmons, and only entitled to such surplus as might arise out of the mill property after the payment therefrom of the firm debts.

Mich. 777; Rogers v. Brokaw (1875) 26 N. J. Eq. 496; Blanche v. Rogers (1875) 26 N. J. Eq. 568; Voorhees v. McGinnis (1872) 48 N. Y. 378.

If partners buy land with the joint funds and cause them to be conveyed to themselves in the same proportions in which they are interested in the capital, the presumption is quite as strong that they intended a division of capital, as that they had merely changed the investment. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 307.

Written articles which show a certain proportion of the capital invested in the purchase and improvements of real estate, and machinery for the use of the firm, the balance being used in the general business; a portion of the real estate being purchased on the day of the signing of the articles and the remainder at different times; the grantees in one conveyance being described as partners,—are apparent evidence that the partners understood and intended that the real estate should be regarded as part of the capital or assets of the firm being purchased expressly for and used exclusively in the business. Messer v. Messer (1879) 50 N. H. 375.

An entry made by one of the partners in the books of a firm charging the firm with the value of real estate made upon the understanding that it was to be partnership property, will constitute it partnership property. Boyers v. Elliott (1846) 7 Hun, 204.

But a subsequent entry in the firm books not proved is not sufficient evidence of an intention to treat as partnership property conveyed to partners and others as joint tenants and tenants in specific portions, under an agreement stating the terms of purchase and position of the partners. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 18, 1894.

Where the assumption is that during the continuance of the firm's operation the property in question had been regarded as partnership property, it cannot be doubted that as soon as it is sold and ceases to be used for partnership purposes the proceeds are withdrawn from the partnership stock, even though there is no express agreement to that effect, the acts of the partners fairly showing such an intention, their subsequent conduct being inconsistent with any other supposition than that the purchase money should be the individual estate of the partners. Shafter's App. (1864) 106 Pa. 46.

The Maine Statute of 1821, chap. 38, § 1, provides that lands conveyed to two or more persons shall be held by them as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, unless it is set forth in the conveyance that they hold jointly, or unless it contains other words clearly and manifestly showing that intention. Blake v. Nutter (1841) 19 Me. 18.

One partner may withdraw a part of the partnership funds for a separate purchase on his own behalf; and all may join in a purchase of real estate for purposes wholly independent of the partnership, intending to sell their shares severally on their individual account, and in such a case the mere fact that the payment is made from the partnership funds will not change the nature of the operation of the purchase, and it will take effect as the parties intended. Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 173; Smith v. Smith (1800) 5 Ves. Jr. 189.

The mere fact of a bequest by a testator to his two sons, of real estate and of the business carried on by him thereon, together with the machinery and appliances, will not constitute them partners, but such facts coupled with their election to continue the business and the contribution thereto, by each of his share of such property, will render the relation between them that of partners and the property that of the firm. MacFarlane v. MacFarlane (1894) 82 Hun, 238.

b. Pennsylvania doctrine.

In Pennsylvania, however, so far as creditors and other third persons are concerned, such property would seem not to be held as partnership stock unless the intention is manifested in writing or by deed, the same being recorded, the question being looked upon as coming within the provisions of the statute of frauds.

In order to render real estate partnership stock as to strangers, purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, the fact that the property is held as partnership property must be expressed on the face of the deed, or else some agreement in writing to that effect must have been executed by the members of the firm and duly recorded, and in the absence thereof notice of the character of the real estate as partnership property must be brought home to a purchaser or creditor before he can be affected by it. Kepler v. Erie Dime Sav. & Loan Co. (1882) 100 Pa. 608; McDermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 458, 10 Am. Dec. 468; Hale v. Henrie (1834) 2 Watts, 143, 37 Am. Dec. 239; McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 59, 98 Am. Dec. 191; Lefevre's App. (1871) 60 Pa. 125, 8 Am. Rep. 229; Lancaster Bank v. Myler (1850) 18 Pa. 544; Second Nat. Bank of Titusville's App. (1877) 83 Pa. 203; Ridgeway's App. (1850) 15 Pa. 177, 53 Am. Dec. 586; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 170.

Otherwise it will be liable as property held by them as tenants in common, to their separate debts. Hale v. Henrie, McCormick's App. Kramer v. Arthurs, and Lefevre's App., Ridgeway's App. and Lancaster Bank v. Myler, supra.

As under the statute of frauds all contracts respecting real estate must be in writing. Lancaster Bank v. Myler, supra.

Where a lot adjoining the firm premises was purchased by one partner and intended for partnership purposes, payment being made out of the firm money, the conveyance taken in the name of the partnership; but owing to circumstances not so used, the court held that the beneficial use vested in the firm, the subsequent use differing from that originally contemplated, was not devested; that therefore the lot was partnership property and not held by the partners as tenants in common, the property being worked in its altered uses at the expense of the firm, the profit going into the firm being treated in all respects as partnership prop-

Whether real estate upon which a partnership transacts its business is firm property or the property of the individual members of the firm is oftentimes a difficult question to determine, and one upon which the authorities are not altogether uniform. The mere fact of the use of land by a firm does not make it partnership property. Goepper v. Kimsinger, 89 Ohio St. 429; Hatchett v. Blanton, 72 Ala. 428. Nor is real estate necessarily the individual property of the members of a firm because the title is held by one member, or by the several members in individual interests. 1 Bates, Partn. § 260. Whether real estate is partnership or individual property depends largely upon the intention of the partners. That intention may be expressed in the deed conveying the land, or in the articles of partnership; but when it is not so expressed the circumstances usually relied upon to determine the question are the ownership of the funds paid for the land, the uses to which it is put, and the manner in which it is entered in the accounts upon the books of the firm. 1 Bates, Partn. § 280; 2 Lindley, Partn. *649; 17 Am. &

Where it is the manifest intention of the partners to regard the property as held by them under a tenancy in common, the record not showing to the contrary, it is to be treated as separate estate and as such liable to the separate creditors. Ridgeway's App. (1850) 15 Pa. 177, 58 Am. Dec. 536.

Under articles of partnership containing a provision for the continuation of the partnership after the death of a member and that the real estate of the firm shall be held as personal property, such real estate being acquired with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes, during the continuance of the partnership agreement, all the property of the firm is to be regarded as personal estate. Leaf's App. (1884) 105 Pa. 505.

Where one of two partners acquired title to certain unimproved real estate, the actual consideration for the conveyance being the transfer of four other properties, the title to two of which was in the names of the partners, and those of the other properties in the name of each of the partners separately, the property being subsequently improved and the rent carried to the firm's account, it was held that such property belonged to the partners as tenants in common, as real estate conveyed to individuals who may be partners will not be treated as partnership assets, where partnership purchasers and creditors are concerned, unless the intention so to treat it appears in the deed, or otherwise of record. Black v. Seipt (1877) 12 Phila. 360.

III. In whom the legal title vests.

a. The common-law doctrine.

At law partners, like any other persons, may take a conveyance of real estate to themselves either as joint tenants or tenants in common. Whitmore v. Shiverick (1867) 8 Nev. 238.

It is impossible for a partnership as such to hold the legal title of real estate; only a person can do so, and a corporation only because it is a person in law which a partnership is not; and therefore a deed made to a partnership vests the legal title in such of the members of the firm individually as are named in the conveyance. Holmes v. Moon (1872) 7 Heisk. 506; Moreau v. Saffarans (1856) 3 Sneed, 599, 57 Am. Dec. 532; Percifull v. Platt (1890) 36 Ark. 456; Tidd v. Rines (1879) 26 Minn. 201; Gille v. Hunt (1886) 35 Minn. 337.

The legal title is in the individual partner to whom by name the conveyance is made, the several members composing the firm not being regarded in the view of a court of law as holding real estate as tenants in common, unless it be conveyed to them as such by name, and on the other hand each partner is required to join in the conveyance of real estate in order to pass the entirety thereof to a purchaser. Moreau v. Saffarans (1856) 3 Sneed, 599, 57 Am. Dec. 532; Hogle v. Lowe (1877) 12 Nev. 293; May v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (1892) 44 La. Ann. 444.

Although at law an unsealed instrument would not convey the legal title to a firm, yet it would convey to them the equitable title, unless it be the law that a conveyance made to a partnership in the firm name is a nullity. Frost v. Wolf (1890) 77 Tex. 455; Miller v. Alexander (1852) 8 Tex. 37; Holman v. Criswell (1854) 18 Tex. 38; Martin v. Weyman (1839) 26 Tex. 466; Tom v. Snyers (1885) 64 Tex. 342; Wadsworth v. Wendell (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. 224, 1 L. ed. 1064; McCaleb v. Pradat (1852) 25 Miss. 258; Dreutzer v. Baker (1884) 60 Wis. 180.

In Alabama the rule has been uniformly declared to be that where there is a conveyance of land to a partnership in its common or firm name no legal title vests in the partnership as such; the legal title vests in the several persons composing the partnership as tenants in common, with all the attributes and incidents of a tenancy in common, so far as mere legal remedies can be enforced, and such title is chargeable with an equity whenever the land is wanted to meet partnership debts or to secure equalization in division among the partners, and that until equitable interposition is invoked the status of the title is not there, it remains a legal title in all the partners as tenants in common, the characteristics of joint tenancy being abolished by section 1837 of the Code of 1886. Powers v. Robinson (1890) 90 Ala. 225; Slaughter v. Doe (1890) 67 Ala. 494; Brunson v. Morgan (1894) 76 Ala. 593; Blanchard v. Floyd (1890) 98 Ala. 53.

The legal title must be vested in some person, and a partnership is not a corporation. Percifull v. Platt (1890) 36 Ark. 456.

And will be controlled by the terms of the conveyance. Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 358, 80 Am. Dec. 448.

But a deed taken by a firm in its partnership name is not void. Kelley v. Bourne (1887) 15 Or. 473.

A sale to a partnership is a legally recognized method of sale to all persons interested whether named or not. Turner v. Ontonagon River Imp. Co. (1889) 77 Mich. 603.

The legal title of lands belonging to a firm may be held by one partner. York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95.

A deed conveying real estate to a copartnership in the copartnership name vests the legal title in the partner whose name appears in such partnership, and not in the firm. Arthur v. Weston (1856) 22 Mo. 378.

And the same is the case where the title is to a partnership name, which expresses the name of one party only with the addition of " & Co." Percifull v. Platt, supra.

Such a deed containing no certain designation or description of any other person for the reason that the words " & Co." may describe one person as well as another. Winter v. Stock (1886) 29 Cal. 407, 89 Am. Dec. 57.

A purchase of real estate in the name or style of the partnership not being sufficient to pass the legal title to the members of the firm. Ibid.

And if the whole legal estate is in the deceased partner, it all descends to his heirs, and nothing goes to the survivor except his equities. Percifull v. Platt (1890) 36 Ark. 456.

Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 945, and cases in note. Where real estate is bought with partnership funds for partnership purposes, and is applied to partnership uses, or entered and carried in the accounts of the firm as a partnership asset, it is deemed to be firm property; and in such case it makes no difference, in a court of equity, whether the title is vested in all the partners, as tenants in common, or in one of them, or in a stranger. T. Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. § 265; 1 Bates, Partn. § 281; Johnson v. Clark, 18 Kan. 157; 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 948, and cases cited. If the real estate is purchased with partnership funds, the party holding the legal title will be regarded as holding it subject to a resulting trust in favor of the firm furnishing the money. In such case no agreement is necessary, and the statute of frauds has no application. Parker v. Bowles, 57 N. H. 491; 1 Bates, Partn. § 281.

In the case at bar the land was not purchased with partnership funds. The undivided one-third interest bought by John S. Emmons was paid for by him with his own individual money. Miller also paid for the

The interest in a partnership leasehold estate, however, is in the copartners as such, and not as tenants in common. Rust v. Chisolm (1892) 57 Md. 376.

Yet the possessor of the legal title holds the estate in trust for the purposes of the partnership. Dupuy v. Leavenworth (1861) 17 Cal. 292.

Such a deed to a partnership firm does not take effect as a legal conveyance of the land to the persons composing the partnership property, upon proof of that fact. Arthur v. Weston (1856) 22 Mo. 373.

A conveyance mentioning the partners by name, and describing them as composing the firm the property being paid for with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes, is not void within the statute of frauds, the legal title passing in an undivided fourth part to each of the partners subject to the equitable lien in favor of the copartners. McCauley v. Fulton (1872) 44 Cal. 903.

Although under the Massachusetts General Statutes, chapter 80, section 24, Public Statutes, chapter 82, section 2, a corporation cannot hold land, yet a conveyance made to a voluntarily unincorporated association, a well-known body all the members of which could be ascertained, may be construed as a grant to those who are properly described by the title as tenants in common. Byam v. Bickford (1885) 140 Mass. 81.

A deed tendered to a partnership in its partnership name, under a contract that the conveyance shall be executed to the parties in their partnership name, is sufficient. McMurry v. Fletcher (1882) 28 Kan. 397.

And a court of equity leaves the legal title undisturbed, except so far as may be necessary to protect the equitable rights of the respective partners. Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 582; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 200, 5 L. ed. 618, 47 Am. Dec. 505.

Under a deed of real estate in common form of a warranty deed, given to a trustee for the partnership reciting the payment of the purchase money by such trustee for the firm, the question whether the legal title to the lands vests in the trustee for the firm, or in all the partners as tenants in common, turns upon the meaning of the word "trustee" as used in the grant and habendum, and if the word is merely descriptive of the person of the grantee, the legal title vests in him alone subject to a resulting trust in favor of the firm, whose property has been expended in the purchase, and the effect of the deed is to vest the legal title in him and to create such a trust, and not to raise a use executed by the statute of uses in the partners as tenants in common. Mowry v. Bradley (1876) 11 R. I. 870.

Under an agreement for the purchase of an adverse outstanding title held by a partnership, one partner purchasing and taking the title to himself, such title must be taken as belonging to the partnership, and one partner having made advances equal to his share, he will not be deprived of the benefit of his purchase by refusal to pay his share, and such refusal will not work a dissolution. Eakin v. Shumaker (1864) 12 Tex. 51.

In Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 505, it was stated that where real estate is conveyed to firm partners in their individual names for the sole benefit of the firm, or is so conveyed to them in payment of debts due to the partnership, the legal title vests in the grantees thereof as in an ordinary conveyance of real estate; and by the common law where land is purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes and conveyed to all the partners generally in fee, it will create at law a joint tenancy; so that neither could convey any more than his share of the land during the lease of his copartner, and upon the death of either partner without having severed the joint tenancy by a conveyance, the legal title to the whole of the land would survive to the other partners.

In Donaldson v. State Bank of Cape Fear (1837) 16 N. C. 103, 18 Am. Dec. 577, the parties had acquired real estate, either by purchase upon speculation with partnership funds, or by taking the same as security for debts due to them, the title either by accident or mistake, or because the matter was not considered of importance, not always being made to the partnership by its name, the conveyances sometimes being made to the partnership, at other times to the partners as tenants in common in their individual names, and in other instances to one or the other of the partners in severalty, the copartnership being insolvent at the date of its dissolution. The court held that the conveyances to the partnership vested the property in the concern and not in the members, each taking an entirety and by his own deed conveying only his right to the residue, after a settlement of the partnership accounts.

Where the bill charged a partnership upon the parties in real estate and in the business connected therewith, the amount being shown in the name of one partner and so recorded under the act relating to possessory claims, such partner afterwards selling his interest to the other, taking back a mortgage, the continuing party undertaking to pay the firm debts, such arrangement being subsequently canceled, one half of the property being reconveyed, the partner retaining the other half, the court held that the first sale of the property divested it of its character of partnership or common property, and that the reconveyance of one half left the parties as ordinary tenants in common in the same manner as if it had been partnership property and been divided. Brush v. Maydwell (1850) 14 Cal. 208.

b. Pennsylvania doctrine.

In Pennsylvania the deed or instrument granting the title is to be considered as the guide so far as creditors or third persons are concerned, the record title in that state being conclusive.

Where creditors are concerned, the deed, or other paper of record, is the true index of owner-one undivided one-third interest, purchased by him with his individual funds. None of the money of the firm of Newton, Emmons & Miller was contributed towards the purchase of the one-third interest held by Newton. Indeed, the proof shows that the firm of Newton, Emmons & Miller was formed by an oral agreement after Emmons and Miller had bought their interests. Each partner here held the title to an undivided one-third part of the property. No entries were made upon the books of the firm showing that the real estate was treated as firm assets. The evidence, however, does show that the property was bought for the purpose of being used in the milling business, and that after its purchase it was used for firm purposes, and that the firm gave its notes to pay for repairs, and for placing new machinery in the mill upon the premises. Under these circumstances, was the land partnership property, or the individual property of the partners, holding as tenants in common? It cannot be said that the land is firm property, upon the theory of a resulting trust, because the money of the firm was not used to buy the property. Such ship, not only where all the partners take title in their own names, but even where one with the assent of others buys real estate in his own name with partnership funds. Black v. Seipt (1877) 12 Phila. 360; Lefevre's App. (1871) 66 Pa. 122, 8 Am. Rep. 229.

But the face of the title is not always conclusive as between the partners themselves. Miller's Estate (1868) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 147.

If it does not appear on the face of the deed, or by some recorded agreement in writing, that the land in question is held as partnership land, it does not have that quality and the fact being vital must be specially alleged, and in case of contest must be proved, especially where the proceeding is simply a scire facias, to revive a judgment against an original defendant and one who is his assignee for the benefit of creditors. Kepler v. Erie Dime Sav. & Loan Co. (1882) 101 Pa. 602.

The title to real estate put into a partnership by its owner upon a parol understanding that it shall be part of the partnership fund, the other partner paying a portion of the consideration in cash, both entering into possession and improving it with the firm funds, does not pass to the firm, there being no distinct transfer of possession equivalent to a written contract. McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 54, 96 Am. Dec. 191.

c. How vested at law

At law, upon a conveyance to partners in their individual names they become vested with the legal title as tenants in common subject to all the incidents relative thereto. Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 638; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 56 Ala. 406; Brunson v. Morgan (1884) 76 Ala. 593; Percifull v. Platt (1880) 36 Ark. 456; *Jones v. And there is no such tenancy known in law or equity as copartnership. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin, supra.

Even though purchased with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes. Ensign v. Briggs (1856) 6 Gray, 329. Peck v. Fisher (1852) 7 Cush. 386, followed.

And that without survivorship. Percifull v. Platt (1880) 36 Ark. 456.

As it is not to be construed a joint tenancy at law, being contrary to the policy of the law which gives a ius accrescendi at common law in case of survivorship when no such intent or purpose can be presumed. Howard v. Priest (1848) 5 Met. 582.

And for all purposes outside of a court of equity. Lawrence v. Taylor (1843) 5 Hill, 107.

The law taking no notice of the equitable relation arising out of the partnership. Ross v. Henderson (1877) 77 N. C. 170.

But where the evidence proves that the parties are general mercantile partners, and that the lands are part of the partnership effects, they are joint tenants as copartners. Baird v. Baird (1897) 21 N. C. 524, 31 Am. Dec. 399; Price v. Hunt (1849) 28 N. C. 42.

Partners in the lumber business purchasing timber tracts with partnership funds and for partnership purposes, the deed conveying the property to them making no mention of the fact of the partnership, hold the legal title as tenants in common. Jones' App. (1871) 70 Pa. 166.

So the interests of the associates in a mining partnership in the land are in the nature of a tenancy in common, so far as the title is concerned. Santa Clara Min. Asso. v. Quick Silver Min. Co. (1882) 17 Fed. Rep. 657.

And with respect to property taken and acquired by mortgage of real estate taken as collateral security for moneys due to partnership, the equity of redemption in which is extinguished by lapse of time, the partners become tenants in common. Goodwin v. Richardson (1814) 11 Mass. 469.

Where a house and lot were purchased by a commercial firm, which was subsequently dissolved, one partner conveying his interest in the property to the others, a portion of the money being paid out of the funds of the new firm; the property being adapted to no other use than a residence and occupied as such by the partners, the one partner deposing that it should be considered, as between himself and his partner, as his own property,—the court held that as between the members of the firm it became subject to a complete legal ownership, and the constituent members held as tenants in common, the parties at the time of purchase taking the deed to themselves individually as tenants in common. McGrath v. Sinclair (1877) 55 Miss. 89.

So where the partners owned in their own names a dwelling house, subsequently occupied by one as a home with the consent of the other partner; a declaration claiming the property as a homestead being filed and recorded, it was held upon an attachment issued by a firm creditor, that such propa trust might exist in favor of the firm, regarding it as a person, if the partners had taken the legal title, and the firm had advanced the purchase money. The trust must arise at the time of the execution of the conveyance, and when the title vests in the grantee. Such could not have been the case here, under the facts stated. Van Buskirk v. Van Buskirk, 148 Ill. 9. In view of the fact that the land was bought with individual, and not partnership, funds, and was conveyed in undivided interests to the several partners, and in the absence of any agreement that it should be regarded as firm property, does the conduct of the parties in afterwards forming a partnership, and using the property for partnership purposes, and repairing and improving the mill at the expense of the firm, make the land firm property in a court of equity? A negative answer to this question is found in many of the authorities, as will be seen by reference to the following: Alexander v. Kimbro, 49 Miss. 529; Theriot v. Michel, 28 La. Ann. 107; Reynolds v. Ruckman, 85 Mich. 80; Parker v. Bowles, 57 N. H. 491; Thompson v. Bowman, 78 U. S. 6

erty no longer constituted firm assets and that the partners were tenants in common of the same, and a tenant in common was entitled to homestead exemptions under the Montana laws. Lindley v. Davis (1897) 7 Mont. 308.

So under the English authorities there is no survivorship. Jeffereys v. Small (1868) 1 Vern. 217; Lyster v. Dollard (1792) 1 Ves. Jr. 436, 8 Bro. Ch. 478; Lake v. Craddock (1782) 3 P. Wms. 158; Usber v. Angieward (1685) 1 Vern. 360.

In Reilly v. Walsh (1848) 11 Ir. Eq. Rep. 22, it was held that the right of survivorship between two persons who carried on the building trade, with a provision for the lease of the ground, would not be interfered with where it was not shown that they were general partners.

IV. Immaterial to whom legal title is conveyed.

In equity it is unimportant in whose name the purchase may have been made, or the conveyance taken: if purchased in fact with partnership funds and for partnership purposes, it will be treated in that jurisdiction as belonging to the firm. Moreau v. Saffarans (1856) 8 Sneed, 595, 67 Am. Dec. 582; Dudley v. Littlefield (1842) 21 Me. 418; Taylor v. Farmer (1896) (Ill.) 6 West. Rep. 710; Galbraith v. Tracy (1894) post, 28 L. R. Equity looking upon lands purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes as partnership property. Owens v. Collins (1858) 28 Ala. 387.

It is immaterial to whom the legal title may be conveyed, whether to the partners by name as individuals, or to one of them, or to a third person. Ofutt v. Scott (1872) 47 Ala. 104.

When purchased with partnership funds and actually appropriated to and used in the business. MacFarlane v. MacFarlane (1894) 82 Hun, 238; Greenwood v. Marvin (1888) 111 N. Y. 423.

And it is not material in what manner it is bought, or in what name it stands. Little v. Suedecor (1875) 52 Ala. 167.

The fact that the title to real estate bought by a partner acting for the firm is taken in his name, will not deprive it of the character of partnership property. Bowen v. Billings (1882) 18 Neb. 439.

And in some cases, as between the partners themselves, real estate may be shown to be firm property, although the title may be in one only or in all as tenants in common, even though the record shows a conveyance to two. Miller's Estate (1893) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 147.

No matter what the nature of the conveyance may be. Spalding v. Wilson (1893) 80 Ky. 589.

The person holding the legal title doing so for copartnership purposes. Batty v. Adams County Comrs. (1894) 16 Neb. 44; Dupuy v. Leavenworth (1861) 17 Cal. 263; Buckley v. Buckley (1850) 11 Barb. 45; Kendall v. Rider (1861) 35 Barb. 100.

Even though the conveyance, which was taken to the partners jointly, does not describe them as partners, they must be regarded as such in controversies, as between themselves and the firm and private creditors. Willis v. Freeman (1861) 35 Vt. 44, 82 Am. Dec. 619.

There being no agreement or design that it shall be held for their separate use. Ferguson v. Hanauer (1892) 56 Ark. 179.

The decisive presumption in the absence of proof to the contrary is that it is intended to be held as partnership property. Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Summ. 181; Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 R. J. 173, 87 Am. Dec. 510; Hunt v. Benson (1841) 2 Humph. 450; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 205, 5 L. ed. 615, 47 Am. Dec. 205; Smith v. Tarlton (1847) 2 Barb. Merrick* (1842) 4 Met. 541.

So a conveyance of property to one member of a firm in payment of a debt due to the firm, will inure to the benefit of the firm. Gannett v. Cunningham (1852) 34 Me. 62.

So it has been held with respect to real estate belonging to a mining partnership acquired for mining purposes, whether purchased with partnership funds or contributed by the individual partners as a part of the stock. Duryea v. Burt (1865) 28 Cal. 569.

The same conclusions were arrived at in the following cases: Houston v. Stanton, 11 Ala. 412; Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Murphy v. Abrams (1874) 50 Ala. 298; Powers v. Robinson (1890) 90 Ala. 225; Rovelsky v. Brown (1891) 92 Ala. 522; Hatchett v. Blanton (1882) 72 Ala. 423; Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 618; *Dupuy v. The general doctrine of all these cases is that a purchase of the land with partnership funds is necessary to make it firm property. T. Parsons, in his work on Partnership (4th ed.), says: "Although it [real estate] be held in the joint name of two or more persons, if there be no proof that it was purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, it will be considered as held by them as joint tenants or tenants in common.

So, if not paid for by partnership funds, then it is probably his property who does pay for it, whatever use he permits to be made of it." Sections 265, 266. In Hatchett v. Blanton, supra, the supreme court of Alabama says: "Steering clear of all cases of fraud, or of the use by one partner, without the approbation of his associates, of partnership funds in the acquisition of real Property bought by a partner in a firm, acting for the firm, belongs to the partnership as soon as the sale is complete, because the purchaser is the firm. Bowen v. Billings (1882) 13 Neb. 439.

If purchased and held as partnership property, the delivery of a deed to one partner will be a deliv-ery to the partnership. Henry v. Anderson (1881) 77 Ind. 361.

A charge that where a partner in a firm pur-chases real estate with partnership funds and takes a deed to himself, the presumption of law is that the partner so purchasing credits his copartner with his part of the land bought, or paid for the property and charges himself with it, and is enti-tled to the property in his individual right, will not be sustained. King v. Weeks (1874) 70 N. C. 372.

And if from the testimony the jury may prop-erly find that the tenant rented the property of the firm, and so understood and paid the rent to the firm as landlords, and continued to hold under the firm, it is of no consequence who is the real owner if the firm act as such. Williams v. Shelden (1896) 61 Mich. 311.

Where the evidence is clear that real estate is partnership property, purchased virtually with partnership funds and used for partnership pur-poses, though standing in the name of the individ-ual partner, it is held by the partners as tenants in common in trust for the partnership and as such is liable for the firm debts. Matlack v. James (1860) 13 N. J. Eq. 126.

Real estate contributed to the capital of the company at an estimated valuation by one partner, inventoried and carried into the stock account, be-comes in equity partnership property, although the legal title remains in the partner. Clark's App. (1872) 72 Pa. 143.

So if the partnership funds be advanced to one partner for lands for business purposes, or if he gets credit on the books of the firm for the land, intending to invest it in the business, it is in equity the property of the partners though he retain the legal title. Boyers v. Elliott (1846) 7 Humph. 204.

estate, the two facts must concur to constitute real estate partnership property—acquisition with partnership funds, or on partnership credit, and for the uses of the partnership." In Thompson v. Bowman, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "In the absence of proof of its purchase with partnership funds for partnership purposes, real property standing in the names of several persons is deemed to be held by them as joint tenants or as tenants in common." *Buchan v. Am. Dec. 305. The theory of some of the cases is that real estate bought with separate, and not partnership, funds, cannot be converted into firm property by a verbal agreement between the partners, because no trust can be created in lands, unless by writing, in view of the statute of frauds, except such as results by implication of law. Parker v. Bowles, supra. There are cases which hold that, even though the land was originally bought by the several partners with their individual funds, and deeded to them as

So a resulting trust by one partner of lands purchased by him with partnership funds in his own name in favor of the other partner, may be proved by parol evidence. Baldwin v. Johnson (1831) 1 N. J. Eq. 441; Marsh v. Davis (1885) 33 Kan. 326; Scruggs v. Russell (1858) McCabon, 39; Paige v. Paige (1897) 71 Iowa, 318, 60 Am. Rep. 799; York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95; *Cotton v. When there is an undoubted partnership, oral evidence may be received to prove that lands are the property of the partnership. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

The fact of a part performance of the contract requiring a court of equity to admit such evidence Idid.

Such a partnership so far as the rights of third parties are involved being proved in the same manner as any other partnership. Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (2 Daves) 322.

It may be supported by parol testimony, even in regard to a particular transaction, if such be the intention. Re Ransom (1863) 17 Fed. Rep. 361; Fairchild v. Fairchild, supra; Traphagen v. Burt (1876) 67 N. Y. 30; Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 552; Smith v. Danvers (1852) 5 Sandf. 609.

The rule that the deed is the badge of ownership where purchasers and creditors are concerned not holding where the contests are simply between the partners; the real ownership may be shown by parol evidence to be in the firm. Black v. Seipt (1877) 12 Phila. 800; Abbott's App. (1865) 50 Pa. 234.

But parol evidence is admissible under the Pennsylvania doctrine even as against creditors if the objecting creditor cannot call to his aid the principle of estoppel. Miller's Estate (1893) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 147.

Where the title is held by the partners jointly, and is entirely consistent with the character of partnership property, the fact of a partnership and that the property was held for partnership purposes may be shown by parol. Bird v. Morrison (1860) 12 Wis. 153.

So when the existence of a firm is established by an instrument in writing, any one concerned in the firm assets, whether a creditor or a partner, is at liberty to prove, by extrinsic evidence or by parol, that certain lands held by one of the partners are in fact the property of the firm. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1863) 56 Fed. Rep. 409.

And direct testimony by the surviving partner, together with declarations made by the deceased partner that real estate was considered the property of the firm, are sufficient to establish its character as firm property. McKinnon v. McKinnon, supra, reversing (1861) 46 Fed. Rep. 713.

So a partnership involving transactions in real estate, and resulting substantially in an interest or the fruits of an interest in real estate, can be established by parol not being within the fourth section of the statute of frauds. Kilbourn v. Latta (1886) 5 Mackey, 304, 60 Am. Rep. 373.

In New York there may be a copartnership in real estate, and it is not necessary to the existence of such a partnership that it should be evidenced in writing, and signed by the partners; but it may be created by parol, and where such partnership exists the partners may establish their interests in land, the subject of the partnership, without such interest being evidenced by any writing. Williams v. Gillies (1877) 53 How. Pr. 429; Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 552; Teschmacher v. Lenz (1894) 82 Hun, 594; Traphagen v. Burt (1876) 67 N. Y. 30; *Leary v. The question being one of fact upon all the evidence in the case, determinable by parol evidence independent of the particular form which the transaction took, or the manner in which the title was taken. Greenwood v. Marvin (1888) 111 N. Y. 423; Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 54 N. Y. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 52 Barb. 849; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun, 407.

It is admissible for the purpose of showing that the title to the property, although in one member of the firm, is really in the firm and for its benefit. Jones v. Smith (1880) 31 S. C. 527; Scruggs v. Russell (1858) McCabon, 39.

And also to prove that it was paid for out of partnership funds. Scruggs v. Russell, supra.

So in the case of a lease, with the right to take oil and minerals, taken in the name of one partner and so appearing on the record, such lease being a mere chattel. Brown v. Beecher (1888) 120 Pa. 560.

Where a partnership is constituted under a parol agreement, it may be shown that its property consists of lands, and it may own, possess, and enjoy the same. Allison v. Perry (1880) 130 Ill. 9. To the same effect, Wallace v. Carpenter (1877) 85 Ill. 590; York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95.

The unauthorized execution of a deed in the name either of a partnership or of an individual, may be ratified by parol. Holbrook v. Chamberlin (1874) 116 Mass. 155, 17 Am. Rep. 146; Cady v. Shepherd (1881) 11 Pick. 400, 22 Am. Dec. 379; Swan v. Stedman (1842) 4 Met. 548; McIntyre v. Park (1858) 11 Grar. 102; McDonald v. Eggleston (1853) 26 Vt. 154, 60 Am. Dec. 303.

And in the case of a deed of lands made in the firm name, parol evidence is admissible to mark the identity of the grantees named as composing the firm. Lindsay v. Hoke (1852) 21 Ala. 542.

So, although the original agreement of partnership in real estate is not in writing, some of the partners withdrawing, others substituted being recognized by the continuing members in written transactions, the evidence is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds. Rowland v. Boozer (1846) 10 Ala. 680.

It is also competent to prove by parol that the land described in the petition is partnership property. York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95.

And in the case of a conveyance to one by deed tenants in common, yet it will be regarded in equity as firm property where it is improved out of partnership funds for firm purposes, and actually used for such purposes, or where the firm puts valuable and permanent improvements upon it for firm purposes, and which are essential to the firm. In some instances the land is held to be the property of the partners, and the improvements to be the property of the firm. 1 Bates, Partn. §§ 281, 282. The use of the property is not conclusive of its character as real estate or personality, but is only evidence of the intention of the parties. Id. § 285. When the intention of the partners to convert the land into firm property is inferred from circumstances, the circumstances must be such as do not admit of any other equally reasonable and satisfactory explanation. T. Parsons, Partn. § 267. And, where it is sought to show a conversion of the land into personality by agreement of the partners, such agreement must be clear and explicit. 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 954, and cases cited. In Alkire v. Kahle, 123 Ill. 496, land was conveyed during the existence of the partnership absolute on its face, an attempt to show by parol evidence that it is in fact a conveyance to him for the use of himself and his copartner as tenants in common may be rebutted by parol evidence showing that it is owned by them as partnership property. Black's App. (1879) 80 Pa. 201.

A partnership may exist between dealers and speculators in real estate for the purpose of buying and selling land, and it is not necessary to the existence of the partnership that it should be evidenced by a written agreement signed by the partners; such a partnership may be created by parol. Bissell v. Harrington (1879) 18 Hun, 81, following Chester v. Dickerson (1878) 54 N. Y. 1.

The terms of such a contract may be established by parol evidence, when material, in an action to recover money alleged to have been fraudulently obtained thereunder by one partner from the other. Davenport v. Buchanan (S. Dak.) Dec. 15, 1894; Bates v. Babcock (1892) 96 Cal. 479; Pennybacker v. Leary (1884) 65 Iowa, 220; Flower v. Barnekoff (1890) 11 L. R. A. 149, 30 Or. 132; Treat v. Hiles (1897) 68 Wis. 244, 60 Am. Rep. 858; Richards v. Grinnell (1884) 63 Iowa, 44, 50 Am. Rep. 727; Newell v. Cochran (1899) 41 Minn. 874; Holmes v. McCray (1875) 51 Ind. 353, 19 Am. Rep. 735; King v. Barnes (1888) 109 N. Y. 267; Wallace v. Carpenter (1877) 85 Ill. 500.

A deed conveying the title to a partnership in the partnership name to two parties the others not being named or proven, vests the legal title in the two parties named as trustees for the partnership, unless the fact that the given names are not proven renders the deed void for uncertainty, but an ambiguity of such a kind is capable of explanation by parol evidence, the parties to be designated as grantees thus being made certain. Holmes v. Moon (1872) 7 Heisk. 506.

In Pennsylvania, however, real estate conveyed to the partners as tenants in common will be bound by the individual judgments rendered against the partners, and parol evidence will not be admitted to prove the contrary. Holt's App. (1881) 96 Pa. 257.

In a case where the greater portion of the partnership capital to be contributed by each partner is to be derived from the leasing or sale of the donation claims owned by them separately, but is not bought to be derived from the sale or rent of real property, some personal property being owned by each, the labor of the partners going into the community, such partnership may be proven by parol. Knott v. Knott (1878) 6 Or. 142.

Where it was sought to establish a copartnership in relation to a house used and occupied by the defendant, the evidence of a witness who testified that the house was sold to one of the plaintiffs but he could not say whether the purchase was for himself or on account of the firm, and that an account which the vendor had contracted with the firm was credited with the sum agreed to be paid, was held admissible, as it tended to establish the existence of a partnership, its weight being for the consideration of the jury. Hanks v. Hinson (1837) 4 Port. (Ala.) 509.

A mortgage deed describing the grantees as a firm is admissible in evidence to show that plaintiffs were partners at the time, and that the mortgage was executed to them in the firm name, and entitled the plaintiff to recover in ejectment as against the defendant. Morse v. Carpenter (1847) 19 Vt. 613.

It is not enough that the articles of copartnership are in writing, nor that they are expressly for buying and selling real estate; parol evidence must still be resorted to in order to show that the particular land in question is a part of the partnership transaction. Gedde's App. (1877) 84 Pa. 482.

Evidence showing that a partnership existed, that the partnership funds were used in the purchase of real estate which was conveyed to one partner, who used the partnership money in the purchase of such lands, was held sufficient to uphold an implied trust in favor of the partnership, the money having come from that source, parol evidence being sufficient to prove that the money belonged to the partnership. McCully v. McCully (1888) 78 Va. 154; Brooke v. Washington (1861) 8 Gratt. 243, 56 Am. Dec. 142.

Where the partnership articles provided for the purchase of property, and for the erection of business premises thereon, it was held that parol evidence was admissible for the purpose of proving that property afterwards purchased and conveyed to one partner, the business premises being erected thereon and used for the purposes of the business and improved with partnership means, was partnership property. Bird v. Morrison (1890) 12 Wis. 153.

In Essex v. Essex, 20 Beav. 442, the court admitted evidence of a parol contract as to the continuance of a partnership relating to real estate.

A partnership agreement between two parties to be jointly interested in the speculation of buying, improving for sale, and selling land, may be proved without being evidenced by any writing signed by, or by the authority of the party to be charged therewith, within the statute of frauds, and such an agreement being proved, either partner may establish his interest in land, the subject of the partnership, without such interest being evidenced by any such writing. Dale v. Hamilton (1848) 5 Hare, 369, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 123, 11 Jur. 163.

Where the master's report in an action for a partnership account showed that the property where the business was carried on was partnership property but was claimed by one partner as his separate estate, the patent being issued to him while other patents were issued to the other partners in their respective names, such partner making no separate claim therefor, the property was decreed partnership estate, parol evidence being admitted to prove the same. Newton v. Doran, 8 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 353.

b. When not admissible.

When land is purchased with partnership funds and for partnership purposes, there is an implication of law that the land is held for the partnership.

to "Cato Abbott and Henry Robinson, composing the firm of Abbott & Robinson;" and it was held not to be partnership property, because it was not shown to have been either purchased with partnership funds, or used for partnership purposes; but we do not regard that case as holding that the mere use of the land for partnership purposes constitutes it firm property. In Mauck v. Mauck, 54 Ill. 281, land which had been bought and held for firm purposes was said to be firm property, and to partake of the character of personality; but in that case a part of the business of the firm was to buy and sell real estate, and, although the land was said to belong to the firm, it does not appear that it was not purchased with partnership funds. In Faulds v. Yates, 57 Ill. 416, 11 Am. Rep. 24, the land was bought for the use of the partnership, but after the partnership was formed, and with the money of two of the partners. In Bopp v. Fox, 63 Ill. 540, land, bought by four partners with their individual funds, and conveyed to them in their individual names, was held to be partnership property, because, two weeks before the pur-but where it is purchased with the separate funds of the partners it cannot by a verbal agreement between themselves be converted into partnership property, because no trust in lands can be created unless by writing, except such as arises or results by implication of law, parol evidence not being admissible to prove any declarations of trust or agreement of the parties for a trust, although it is received to establish the fact from which the law will raise or imply a trust. Parker v. Bowles (1876) 57 N. H. 451; Farrington v. Barr (1858) 36 N. H. 86; Moore v. Moore (1859) 38 N. H. 383; Otis v. Sill (1849) 8 Barb. 102.

A bill alleging that the property was purchased with partnership funds for the purposes of the partnership in the name of one individual partner, will not be sustained by evidence showing the purchase by one partner with his individual funds. Owens v. Collins (1853) 23 Ala. 337.

Verbal testimony to establish the existence of a partnership in the lands and negroes, for the purpose of planting, is inadmissible. Gantt v. Gantt (1851) 6 La. Ann. 577.

In the above case the contention was that at the time of the formation of the partnership, the land was public property and not the joint property of the owners, and that the slaves were the separate property of the partners, and therefore a partnership in the improvements and crops might be proved by parol, but the court held that as the settlement on the public lands could only be with a view of acquiring title thereto, and that as the partnership as it was contemplated by the parties was one in which part of the stock consisted of real estate, it could not be proved by parol. Ibid.

A lease taken by a member of a copartnership, not expressly for the firm, the premises being demise to him individually, does not belong to the partnership, and parol evidence that it was executed for the benefit of the partnership is inadmissible. Otis v. Sill (1849) 8 Barb. 122.

In Otis v. Sill, supra, the evidence did not show that it had been taken for the firm and with express reference to its business, although it did appear that the partnership commenced at the date of the lease and that the business was carried on upon the demise premises.

By such parol evidence a trust in real estate would be sought to be created contrary to the provisions of the statute of frauds. Otis v. Sill, supra.

An agreement between the parties at the time of the conveyance by members of a copartnership to one partner absolutely, that such property should be considered as partnership property or be held in trust for the firm, cannot be proved by parol evidence even though such property is subsequently improved by the firm but never used for firm purposes, the proof of such an agreement by parol evidence being contrary to the provisions of the statute of frauds. Bird v. Morrison (1880) 13 Wis. 152.

In Pennsylvania the courts hold that such a partnership cannot, so far as bona fide purchasers, creditors, and other third parties without notice are concerned, be proved by parol evidence inasmuch as the statutes of that state make provision for the recording of titles to real estate, the record itself being evidence.

Where the recorded title is in one of the partners, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that it was partnership property, as against the purchaser or creditor acting bona fide without notice. Warriner v. Mitchell (1839) 128 Pa. 161.

Where they deal on the faith of a recorded title and without notice that it is different from what it appears of record. Coliner v. Greig (1890) 137 Pa. 606.

Where lands are owned by two persons, the face of the deed showing them to be tenants in common, it is incompetent, whenever the rights of third persons are involved, to show by parol that they are partnership property. Geddes' App. (1877) 84 Pa. 432; Lefevre's App. (1871) 69 Pa. 122, 8 Am. Rep. 229; Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79; Hale v. Henrie (1834) 2 Watts, 143, 27 Am. Dec. 289; Ridgway's App. (1860) 15 Pa. 177, 53 Am. Dec. 586.

Such evidence would destroy and contradict the title established by the deed and set up a parol title in its place. Lancaster Bank v. Myley (1850) 13 Pa. 544.

Where real estate was purchased in the individual names of two parties before the partnership, cash on account and the first installment being paid before a third partner joined the firm, the appropriation of the firm funds for the payment of the balance being acquiesced in by such partner, improvements being made thereon with a knowledge that the property stood in the names of the first two partners, the money being chargeable against such partners in the final account, the facts showing an express agreement that such third partner must have a proportion of the property upon a final settlement, upon his paying for the same, such parol agreement will give him no title, and even if such were the case it would be as an individual and not as a partner, no resulting trust for a partnership being created. Lefevre's App. (1871) 69 Pa. 122, 8 Am. Rep. 229.

Where the face of the title indicates nothing to show that the property belongs to the firm, but on the contrary that the partners are entitled to an undivided fourth part as tenants in common; as to purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors the agreement of partners to make real estate part of the common stock must be in writing, and appear of record, and it cannot be shown by parol that real estate thus conveyed is partnership property. Harding v. Devitt (1873) 10 Phila. 96; Lefevre's App. supra.

As to purchasers of the title and creditors having liens, a deed to persons in fact partners but taking the title to themselves as tenants in common must stand as the foundation of their rights and govern, and cannot be changed by parol evidence. Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79; Hale v. Henrie (1834) 2 Watts, 143, 27 Am. Dec. 289; McDermott v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 433, 10 Am. Dec. 468; Ridgway's chase, the four purchasers made, not a mere executory agreement to form a partnership at a future time, but a "present, verbal agreement of partnership," and then afterwards bought the land, and began the erection of a mill for the purpose of carrying on the milling business as a firm "already formed under the verbal agreement." It was there held that the essential question was whether the purchase money "was paid as partnership money for a partnership purpose," and we said, "We consider this was essentially a purchase with partnership funds for partnership purposes."

The weight of authority seems to us to support the position that where persons who afterwards become partners buy land in their individual names and with their individual funds, before the making of a partnership agreement, the land will be regarded as the individual property of the partners, in the absence of a clear and explicit agreement subsequently entered into by them to make it firm property, or in the absence of controlling circumstances which indicate an intention to convert it into firm assets. We do not think that an application of this rule to the facts of the present case shows the real estate here

VL. Implied and resulting trusts.

As to the admissibility of parol evidence to establish such a trust, see head V. supra.

a. When created in partnership lands.

A partnership in any branch of trade or business may be shown by parol as an existing fact, and whatever real estate is held for the purposes of such business is regarded as an incident thereto, and the law implies a trust in favor of the partnership, however the lands be held in law. Marsh v. Davis (1835) 83 Kan. 326; Bird v. Morrison (1860) 12 Wis. 153.

Where partners take the deed in their individual right as tenants in common, their act tends to mislead both purchasers and creditors trusting the apparent state of the title, and therefore the trust, if valid, will be protected against all creditors, except when affected by the recording acts, or a want of notice. Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79.

In equity it will be treated as joint property held in common, each tenant in common holding his interest in trust for the partnership, for the reason that in equity partners cannot hold in joint tenancy, otherwise the fus accrescendi will intervene in case of the death of one of the partners. Whitmore v. Shiverick (1867) 3 Neb. 288.

Yet the form of equity is merely to declare the trust and compel the legal title to serve the equitable interests. Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 98 Mass. 107.

If the title is taken in the name of one partner, or in the name of the partnership, such conveyance is held in equity as a trust for all the partners, and if the real estate is in fact partnership property, it matters not that the legal title is in one or in all the parties, or in a third person, equity regarding it as held in trust for the partnership, the trust being enforceable by the parties interested, whether partners or creditors. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Ashworth (1881) 26 Kan. 212.

An agreement between parties bona fide, to bring real estate into the stock of the firm and thus impress it with the character of personality, impresses the land with a trust which equity will enforce and consider as actually done, whatever a chancellor will decree to be done, yet it is treated as if it had actually changed its character of land into money. Calkitt v. Thomas (1853) 1 Phila. 463.

A resulting trust in favor of partnership occurs where real estate is purchased for partnership purposes and paid for with partnership funds in the name of one partner. McGuire v. Ramsey (1849) 9 Ark. 518.

The court will imply the partnership character and the trusts resulting therefrom from the fact that the title is held by the partners jointly and consistently with the character of partnership property, being used for such purposes. Re Far- mer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bank. Reg. 207; Bird v. Morrison (1860) 12 Wis. 139; Smith v. Burnham (1838) 3 Sumn. 436.

No equities apply in favor of revesting a copartnership with property which is voluntarily conveyed or caused to be conveyed to a third person which does not apply with equal force in the case of a similar transfer of property by an individual. Winans v. Winans (1894) 99 Mich. 74.

The doctrine has been thus stated:—

If land is acquired as the substratum of a partnership, or is brought into and used by the partnership for partnership purposes, there will be a trust by operation of law for the partners as tenants in common, although a trust may not have been declared in writing, and the ownership may not be apparently in all the members of the firm, or if in all, may apparently be in them as joint tenants. Hanft v. Howard (1857) 55 N. C. 440.

Even though such deed conveys the legal title of the land to them individually as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, yet if upon the face of the deed it appears that they are partners and the land is purchased for partnership purposes, they will hold such land as trustees for the partnership as against all creditors of one of the individual partners, whether claiming by judgment lien against him to secure his individual debts, or in any other manner. Cunningham v. Ward (1868) 80 W. Va. 572.

Such trust relation exists with respect to real estate, as well as to personalty. Gillett v. Gaffney (1877) 3 Colo. 351.

And applies equally to joint tenants, tenants in common, copartners, and all others having a common title in interest. Forrer v. Forrer (1877) 29 Gratt. 134.

These principles are fully enunciated by the opinions of the courts in the following cases, viz.: Larkins v. Rhodes (1837) 5 Port. (Ala.) 195; Houston v. Stanton, 11 Ala. 412; *Little v. in controversy to be firm property. The testimony proves affirmatively that there was no agreement, written or verbal, to put the land into the firm as a firm asset, and that it was treated by the parties as individual property. John S. Emmons insured his interest separately. When he gave his note for $1500, signed by his brother as surety, in part payment of the purchase money for the land, he promised his brother that he would give him a mortgage on his one-third interest when the master's certificate, issued to him at the sale, should ripen into a deed and the mortgage afterwards made was given as soon as the master's deed was obtained. Four months after the purchase, when he borrowed $1800 of the bank upon his note, signed by his father and father-in-law as sureties, he stated to the bank that he intended to mortgage his interest to his sureties to secure them. About this time, Newton, Emmons & Miller paid $5400 in cash for improving the mill; but this amount was contributed by the partners, not out of partnership funds, but by the contribution of their individual moneys, each paying one third. The one third so paid by John S. Emmons was the $1800 borrowed on his note. The bank itself, in procuring deeds

The basis of the equitable trust or lien upon partnership real estate is the agreement and intention of the partners, which may be either express or implied; it may be expressed in the articles of partnership, or in the writing evidencing its purchase, or verbally; it may be implied from the circumstances of the purchase and the conduct of the parties. Wilnite v. Boulware (1839) 88 Ky. 169.

It is not necessary that the trust be expressed, provided it exists and is capable of proof, and the land is in fact and substance partnership property. Jones v. Smith (1839) 31 S. C. 527.

It arises in favor of the purposes for which the land is purchased, and for payment of the partnership debts; such rule being applied in all cases, where there is not an express agreement or circumstances showing a contrary intention. Loubat v. Nourse (1853) 5 Fla. 350.

And it is considered as a trust attaching to the estate at the time of its acquisition, one which a court of equity is bound to execute as against the partners and those claiming under them with notice. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 13 Am. Dec. 642; Bell v. Phyn (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 454; Balmain v. Shore (1804) 9 Ves. Jr. 500.

It derives its existence from the actual or implied agreement of the parties, and from the mutual relation in which they stand to each other. Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 532; Carlisle v. Mulhern (1853) 19 Mo. 56; Willot v. Brown (1877) 65 Mo. 133, 27 Am. Rep. 265.

It results from the relation which the partners bear to each other, and from the fact that the estate is brought into the firm or purchased with its funds for the convenience and accommodation of the trade. Goodburn v. Stevens (1847) 5 Gill, 1; Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

From the investment of the funds of the partner-from the partners in, September, 1884, dealt with them as owners of separate interests. Each member of a partnership has a superior lien on the partnership property for the payment of the firm debts. This equitable lien of the partners is worked out for the benefit of the firm creditors. Haggood v. Cornwell, 48 Ill. 65, 95 Am. Dec. 516. Hence, partnership property must be first applied to the payment of partnership debts; and the true interest of each partner in such property is the balance found to be due to him after the payment of the firm debts, and the settlement of accounts between the partners. Bopp v. Fox, supra. In equity, real estate stands on the same footing in this respect as personal property. Alkire v. Kahle, supra. It results that there can be no dower interest in real estate owned by a partnership until all the partnership debts are paid and the partnership accounts are adjusted. Troubridge v. Cross, 117 Ill. 109. If the land in controversy was firm property in September, 1884, there were no dower interests at that time in the wives of Newton, Emmons, and Miller; and yet their wives were required by the bank ship in real estate for the use of the partnership. Shearer v. Shearer (1897) 96 Mass. 107; Harney v. First Nat. Bank of Jersey City (N. J.) May 15, 1894.

And from the original transaction and at the time it takes place, and at no other time, and is founded upon the actual payment of the money and on no other ground, and cannot be mingled or confounded with any subsequent dealings whatever. Richards v. Manson (1899) 101 Mass. 484.

So it is declared by the fact that they are partners. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin, supra.

It is founded in the equity of the surviving partner, who being charged with the debts of the firm has control of the partnership property as assets for the payment of the firm's debts, and for the restoration to himself upon settlement of the partnership account, of such part of the capital as has been contributed by him to the common stock. Howard v. Priest (1848) 5 Met. 582; Carlisle v. Mulhern (1853) 19 Mo. 56.

And equity will not undertake to disregard the assurances of title under which real estate is held for partnership purposes, but will treat the holder of the title as a trustee for the purposes of the partnership, for the payment of the creditors and the adjustment of the accounts between the partners, according to their interests. Whitney v. Cotten (1876) 53 Miss. 689.

In order to defeat the apparent individual right of the partner holding such title it must affirmatively appear that he acquired and held title under circumstances upon which equity would fix its grasp, for the purposes of declaring and enforcing a trust in favor of those beneficially entitled. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin (1878) 12 Jones & S. 116.

To create such a trust there must, however, be an original agreement creating the trust at the time of the purchase, or at least at the time when the contract for the purchase takes effect and is executed by an appropriation of the property as that of the partnership. Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 173.

The resulting trust can only arise upon the original payment being made with the partnership funds and not from a subsequent agreement to hold the property as partnership stock, such an agreement being void under the statute of frauds. Deloney v. Hutcheson (1823) 2 Rand. (Va.) 183.

A statement that the partners purchased the land upon which their business was carried on for partnership purposes, and hold it as stock, is not equivalent to an allegation that the property in question is purchased with partnership funds inasmuch as such a circumstance is consistent with the fact of each partner paying his proportion of the purchase money out of his individual funds. Ibid.

The purchase must be made at the time with partnership funds, or on partnership responsibility. Alexander v. Kimbro (1873) 49 Miss. 529; Wheatley v. Calhoun (1841) 12 Leigh, 272, 37 Am. Dec. 654.

It must be clearly shown that they so regard the title themselves and have paid for it out of the partnership funds. Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 72, 27 L. R. A.

The fact must be established that it belongs to the partnership. Messer v. Messer (1879) 50 N. H. 375; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Jarvis v. Brooks (1853) 27 N. H. 37, 59 Am. Dec. 350; Cilley v. Huse (1890) 40 N. H. 858; Parker v. Bowles (1876) 87 N. H. 491.

And to sustain the proposition that equity will recognize a resulting or constructive trust, in such cases it must be found that in procuring title to the property the defendant perpetrated a fraud, actual or constructive, upon the plaintiff, or improperly reaped the personal advantage of ownership, through a bargain entered into for the benefit of the partnership; that in some particular he violated the principle requiring the utmost good faith between the parties to that relation. Kayser v. Maugham (1885) 8 Colo. 232.

The implied trust is confirmed by the fact that the property is bought for the use of the firm and actually used in its business, in the absence of an agreement or conduct implying such an agreement, prior or subsequent to or at the time of the purchase, proved, to indicate an intention on the part of the partners to hold the real estate so purchased by them in undivided shares as their separate property. Tillinghast v. Champlin (1856) 4 R. I. 173, 67 Am. Dec. 510.

A mere allegation, however, of an express agreement that lands purchased by one partner in his own name were purchased with the firm's money under an express agreement that they were to become the firm's property is not sufficient; it must be shown that there was an agreement to purchase for the joint benefit of the partners, before the court will entertain the question of a resulting trust in favor of the partners. Russell v. Miller (1872) 26 Mich. 1.

Yet it has been held that a resulting trust cannot be raised where there is no written conveyance, nor where the property is of a perishable nature. Lyon v. Lyon (1878) 1 Tenn. Ch. 225.

Such a trust may be predicated where a partnership exists prior to the time of the acquiring of the real estate, the partnership contract not resting entirely in parol. Kayser v. Maugham (1885) 8 Colo. 232.

Whenever the legal title is in one person, but the beneficial interest, either from the payment of the purchase money or other circumstances, is either wholly or partially in another, a trust will be implied under section 2316 of the Georgia Code. Cottle v. Harrold (1884) 73 Ga. 830.

Such trustee must account to the partners according to their several rights and interests. Faulds v. Yates (1870) 57 Ill. 416, 11 Am. Rep. 24.

Treated in the nature of a trust the rights of all parties are preserved, the legal estate going to those entitled to it, subject only to a trust and equitable lien to the surviving partner, by which so much of it shall stand charged as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes for which it was purchased and subject to this all will take. Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697.

to sign the deeds to its trustee, Woodworth, and one of them was paid $200 for her signature. There is no question about the bona fide character of the mortgages to Willis Emmons and Wiley S. Emmons and W. W. Walter. They paid the judgments upon the notes of John S. Emmons, upon which they were sureties, and those notes were given for borrowed money expended in the purchase and improvement of the mill property. We think the mortgages have been properly sustained as resting upon an undivided one-third interest in the land, which must be regarded, under all the circumstances of this case, as the separate property of John S. Emmons.

But, even if the interest held by John S. Emmons was firm property, there is nothing to show that the holders of the mortgages thereon had notice, or reasonable ground for believing, that it was firm property. The record title was in John S. Emmons, and all the circumstances coming to their knowledge, as heretofore stated, were calculated to create the impression that his real interest was that indicated by the record. Facts showing a partnership in the milling and

To constitute an implied or resulting trust, however, in favor of the copartner on the ground of payments made, it must appear that they were made for the purpose of making the purchase by the firm and for its use. Richards v. Manson (1869) 101 Mass. 484; Homer v. Homer (1871) 107 Mass. 83.

And if it be made to appear that real estate, including chattels real, does in fact belong to a partnership and constitute part of its assets, in whose name it may stand, equity will treat it as such and will decree the person in whom the legal estate vests to be a trustee for those beneficially interested. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin (1878) 12 Jones & S. 116.

So the payments or advances must have been made before or after the time of the purchase, as the trust arises out of the circumstances that the money of the real and not of the nominal purchaser formed at the time the consideration of the purchase and became converted into land. Richard v. Manson, supra.

In such a case the land vests in each partner, and the heirs of each clothed with a trust for the co-partnership capable of being protected and enforced by the court, through as well the general as the special equity powers created by the Massachusetts statutes. Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1882) 10 Cush. 458.

So real estate purchased with partnership funds, in the name of the wife of one of the partners, charges such estate in her hands with a resulting trust in favor of the partners and their creditors. Price v. Hicks (1874) 14 Fla. 565.

The trust, however, need not be expressed, as equity will treat the ownership as a distinct trust, if only the trust exist and is capable of proof, and the land is in fact and substance partnership property. Little v. Snedecor (1875) 52 Ala. 167.

A partner bringing in real estate at a valuation is a trustee thereof for the firm. Wiegand v. Cope-land (1882) 14 Fed. Rep. 418, 7 Sawy. 442.

Every partner who holds the legal title of partnership real estate holds the same in trust for the benefit of the firm, and the trust created by such deed is not enlarged or limited by the use of the word "trustee" in the deed. Paton v. Baker (1883) 63 Iowa, 704.

Such a trust will make the land the property of the partnership in equity and may be established by parol evidence. Sherwood v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1875) 21 Minn. 127; Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 173, 182; Jarvis v. Brooks (1868) 27 N. H. 37, 67, 59 Am. Dec. 899; McGuire v. Ramsey (1849) 9 Ark. 518; Phillips v. Crammond (1810) 2 Wash. C. C. 441; Paige v. Paige (1857) 71 Iowa, 818, 60 Am. Rep. 790.

Where it is sought to enforce the same as a resulting trust, the relief must depend upon the nature of the evidence, and though parol evidence may be given to establish such a trust, it must be clear and certain. Larkins v. Rhodes (1837) 5 Port. (Ala.) 195.

Where real estate is purchased by a partner for the use of the firm with partnership moneys, and is actually occupied by the firm, there is sufficient evidence to prove a resulting trust in the partner in whose name it was purchased for the firm. Scruggs v. Russell (1858) McCabon, 99.

And such is the case when the legal title is held by one partner in excess of his beneficial interest. Collins v. Decker (1879) 70 Me. 23; Shearer v. Shearer (1897) 98 Mass. 107.

The trust being for the purposes of the partnership, is chargeable in equity with all obligations growing out of that relation. Shearer v. Shearer, supra.

Yet all such trusts arising from equitable presumption may be rebutted by parol evidence that it was the intention of the parties that the person with whom the conveyance was made should take for his own benefit. Richards v. Manson (1869) 101 Mass. 484.

Such holding is not contrary to the statute of frauds, nor to the statute of Vermont regulating conveyances of real estate which saves expressly such trusts as may arise or result by implication of law but with the provision that trusts in land generally shall be declared in writing. Thrall v. Crampton (1877) 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 261, 9 Ben. 218.

Section 4120 of the Michigan Compiled Laws relating to resulting trusts has no application to a purchase of real estate by one partner in his own name for the firm's use, even though he purchased with the money of another partner and the property was actually used as firm assets; and in such a case the property is to be treated as belonging to the partnership. Way v. Stebbins (1882) 47 Mich. 286.

Section 5569 of Howell's Michigan Statutes provides that when a grant for a valuable consideration is made to one person and the consideration is paid to another, no use or trust results in favor of the person by whom such payment is made, but the title vests in the person named as the alienee in such conveyance, subject only to the provisions of the next section, and therefore where the legal title was taken in the name of the wife of one of the partners of a firm, and of the co-partner, it was held there was no resulting trust in favor of the husband of the wife. Winans v. Winans (1894) 99 Mich. 74.

The Minnesota Statute of Uses and Trusts, Compiled Statutes, 332-334, which does away with some trusts that would otherwise result, was not intended to cut off trusts of land conveyed to the individual members of the firm as tenants in common, or otherwise than as partners. Arnold v. Wainwright (1861) 6 Minn. 354, 80 Am. Dec. 448.

The creation of trusts as to interests in partnership real estate is not prohibited by the New York statute of uses and trusts. Greenwood v. Marvin (1888) 111 N. Y. 423; Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun. 407; Marvin v. Marvin, Court of Appeals, MSS. opinion by Allen, J., cited in Greenwood v. Marvin, supra; Robbins v. Robbins (1882) 80 N. Y. 251.

But the firm can acquire no interest in the real estate itself, which is conveyed to the partners in equal proportions prior to the articles of partner-grain business were not necessarily notice of a partnership in the land. Now, it is well settled that a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee of firm property, from one of the partners holding the legal title, without notice of its partnership character, will hold it free from partnership claims. T. Parsons, Partn. 4th ed. §§ 277, 278; 1 Bates, Partn. § 291; Dyer v. Clark, 5 Met. 562, 89 Am. Dec. 697; Collyer, Partn. Perkins' ed. § 185. When a firm and its members are insolvent, and the firm has been dissolved, an equity exists in favor of the creditors of the firm in respect of the lands purchased with partnership funds, which is superior to that of the creditors of the individual partners; but there may be cases where an equal or superior equity may be created in favor of a creditor of an individual member of the firm, as where one has furnished to one of the members the capital upon which the business was commenced. Reeves v. Ayers, 88 Ill. 418. By signing the note for $1500 as surety, Willis Emmons enabled John S. Emmons to purchase an interest in the mill property, and if that interest was a partnership asset, he thereby aided in procuring a part of the firm capital. In addition to what has been said, ship, unless there be an express agreement in writing, or unless purchased with partnership funds and an implied trust raised in its favor. Alexander v. Kimbro (1878) 49 Miss. 529.

So the appropriation of the joint funds of a co-partnership by one of the members of the firm, to purchase real estate, conveyed to such partner in his own name, will not create a resulting trust in favor of his co-partner, unless the fund is so appropriated in pursuance of an agreement between the parties at the time of the purchase. Forsyth v. Clark (1829) 3 Wend. 637.

Real estate purchased for the use of the partnership, and so used being necessary for the purposes of the business, and mentioned in the deeds to the several partners as forming part of the partnership effects, is held in trust for the partners as tenants in common, even though such a trust was not declared in writing. Hanff v. Howard (1857) 58 N. C. 440.

A conveyance to J. L. S. & Co., invests J. L. S. with the legal title, but in equity he holds such title in trust for the benefit of the firm. Moreau v. Saffarans (1856) 8 Sneed, 596, 67 Am. Dec. 582.

Where pursuant to a parol agreement between partners for the investment of the profits for their joint benefit the profits are invested by the partner receiving the same, who takes the conveyance in his own name, a trust is raised in favor of the remaining partners. McCully v. McCully (1883) 78 Va. 159.

So where it is discovered by the surviving partner that a title to a portion of real estate conveyed for partnership purposes is defective, and he thereupon purchases such outstanding title in his own name, he purchases for the joint benefit of himself and the heirs of the deceased partner, who are entitled to claim the deceased's share upon paying their proportion of the purchase money. Forrer v. Forrer (1877) 29 Gratt. 134.

A financial partner purchasing real estate for the purpose of promoting the firm business, the same being improved with firm funds, is a trustee thereof for the firm. Lacy v. Hall (1881) 37 Pa. 300.

So a trust will be raised where one advances part of the purchase money out of his own estate and the other pays his share out of the partnership funds and takes the conveyance in his own name. Owens v. Collins (1853) 23 Ala. 537.

And land purchased by a partnership, under an agreement that it shall be paid for by the firm, although the conveyance being taken in the name of one partner only, without the knowledge or consent of the other, the note of such partner given for the price being subsequently paid out of the firm's funds, the land being all the time in possession of the firm, and used as its property for a number of years, is held in trust for the firm. Dewey v. Dewey (1893) 36 Vt. 555.

Again if part of the partnership funds of real estate partnership is taken by one partner and invested in lands in a foreign state with the intention of appropriating the same to his own use and that of his family, the other partner has a right to follow such moneys into the lands, and such partner will be a trustee for the partnership. King v. Hamilton (1854) 16 Ill. 190.

Real estate purchased for the purpose of resale for profit, without any intention or understanding that it shall be purchased for the permanent use of any one or all; one partner furnishing the purchase money to and for the partnership as a loan, the deed being taken in such partner's name by way of security,—the deed is an absolute conveyance for the purpose of transferring the property to the partnership, and so far as intended as a security for the money loaned by such partner only a mortgage, and such partner therefore holds the property in trust for the partnership, and after its determination in trust for the individual members of the partnership, in the shares mentioned in the agreement entered into between them. Tenny v. Simpson (1897) 87 Kan. 383. To the same effect is the case of Simpson v. Tenney (1899) 41 Kan. 561.

A bill in equity will lie against the representatives of a deceased partner, to recover partnership funds fraudulently and without the consent of the copartners taken by one partner and invested in real estate in his own name and for his own use, when such real estate can be traced, a trust, being thereby created for the benefit of the firm; and the same must be accounted for by any person into whose possession it may have come other than a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Kelley v. Greenleaf (1848) 8 Story, C. C. 93.

The court distinguished the case of Kruschke v. Stefan (1893) 88 Wis. 373, from Traphagen v. Burt (1876) 67 N. Y. 80, and Davis v. Davis (1882) 60 Miss. 615, upon the ground that in those cases the real estate was acquired with partnership funds and for partnership purposes by the co-partner without the knowledge or consent of the other partner who procured the title to be conveyed to him when it should have been conveyed to both, in those cases an implied and resulting trust arising out of such breach of faith was enforceable without bringing a suit for dissolution and accounting, while in that case there was no violation of confidence or breach of faith, and therefore an action to compel a conveyance without bringing suit for dissolution and account would not lie.

Where, pursuant to an arrangement between the parties in the purchase of real estate, to be disposed of by them and the profits and losses divided, of which act a letter written by one of the parties to an attorney was evidence, the property being alienated pursuant to the arrangements, and the title vested in the purchasers, the trust is discharged. Montague v. Hayes (1868) 10 Gray, 609.

b. When no such trust created.

A bald parol agreement for a partnership in real estate, as such, cannot be shown to create a trust in land held by one of the partners under a deed absolute on its face. Bird v. Morrison (1890) 12 Wis. 152.

we think the evidence shows that the officers of the bank, if they did not actually make an agreement to that effect, gave John S. Emmons to understand that the bank would protect the mortgages on his interest if he and his wife would sign the deed to the bank. The consideration of that deed was just the amount of the two mortgages, and four witnesses swear that one of the officers of the bank promised to take care of the mortgages. When a person, by his words or conduct, voluntarily causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act upon that belief so as to change his previous position, the former will be estopped to aver against the latter a different state of things. Casler v. Byers, 129 Ill. 657.

As to the mortgage made by the appellant Miller to Lampport, the lower courts have found that that mortgage was not made in good faith, and was not given to secure a bona fide indebtedness. It is claimed that the note for $5500, secured thereby, was given for money loaned to Miller by his wife and by his brother-in-law, Lampport. It is true that the fact of the relationship between the parties is no proof of fraud, although it may be a circumstance to excite suspicion. Wightman v. Hart, 87 Ill. 123. But we are

Such a trust cannot arise in contradiction of the terms of the deed. Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 173.

It will not be created unless it appears that the purchase of the land was made for the firm and for its use. Homer v. Homer (1871) 107 Mass. 82, where the proof was plenary, that it was the understanding that the partner should take a conveyance of the land for his own benefit, and account with the others for the proceeds or reasonable value of it. Richards v. Manson (1899) 101 Mass. 484, followed.

A trust in land cannot be predicated upon proof of an oral agreement to create a partnership for the purpose of purchasing and handling, or improving such lands, the partnership relation not having existed prior to the acquisition of title, no partnership funds being invested in the property, the recognition of such a trust abrogating the statute of frauds. Kayser v. Maugham (1896) 8 Colo. 232.

The mere incidental payment out of such funds of an installment due upon an antecedent contract on individual responsibility cannot raise a trust or give title to anything but reimbursements. Wheatley v. Calhoun (1841) 13 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654.

A memorandum made upon the ledger of a firm relating to a purchase of real estate by one partner in his own name, is insufficient as a declaration of trust, the memorandum importing that the defendant is to hold the land as his own. Homer v. Homer, supra.

If one of two partners buys in his own name and gives his own bond and mortgage, and afterwards pays out of the partnership fund, a resulting trust will not be thereby created, unless it unequivocally appears that there is an agreement at the time of the purchase that the funds shall be so appropriated. Richards v. Manson, supra; Forayth v. Clark (1899) 8 Wend. 698.

Where a mere possessory title is acquired by the use of partnership moneys, and the fee is not acquired by the partners but is subsequently taken by the surviving partner purchasing the possessory title of his deceased partner, such survivor does not acquire an outstanding title as trustee for his cotenants. Blackley v. Coles (1899) 6 Colo. 349, wherein they were treated as mere tenants at will, the interests of the estate being merely personalty.

And where real estate is purchased by a partner at sheriff's sale, a part of the purchase money being paid with an arrangement for the balance, with securities therefor taken in such partner's own name, the deed also being made in his name, the mere fact that a portion of such estate is afterwards used by the firm in its business will not create a trust, even though the amount paid by such partner, with interest accruing on the securities, is paid from the firm's funds, such sums being 37 L. R. A.

charged against such member in the books. Rice v. Pennypacker (1876) 5 Del. Ch. 33.

VII. Equitable conversion.

Real estate may be converted if there is no partnership between those interested in the land, and it may be unconverted though there be a partnership, as where land was held for partnership purposes and there was a definite agreement that at the end of the partnership it should be conveyed as land, the interest of a partnership in such a case being real estate. Re Wilson, Wilson v. Holloway (1893) 2 Ch. 340.

The equitable principle, that lands agreed to be turned into money or money into land, shall be considered in equity as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted, is universal. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 13 Am. Dec. 642; Craig v. Lealie (1818) 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 533, 4 L. ed. 460.

If a firm holds lands by deed impressed on its face to be partnership property of the firm, it is stamped, so far as the partners are concerned, with all the attributes of personality and continues to be such until the partnership is dissolved, the business of the firm settled, and its debts paid. Du Bree v. Albert (1882) 100 Pa. 433; Lucas v. Laws (1866) 27 Pa. 211; Erwin's App. (1861) 39 Pa. 536, 80 Am. Dec. 542; Melly v. Wood (1872) 71 Pa. 433, 10 Am. Rep. 719; Foster's App. (1876) 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553; West Hickory Min. Assn. v. Reed (1850) 80 Pa. 38; Foster v. Barnes (1876) 81 Pa. 377; Davis v. Christian (1869) 15 Gratt. 11. To the same effect, Holladay v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1898) 57 Fed. Rep. 774; Riddle v. Whitehill (1900) 135 U. S. 621, 34 L. ed. 233; Allen v. Withrow (1894) 110 U. S. 119, 23 L. ed. 90; Brown v. Slee (1881) 103 U. S. 823, 23 L. ed. 618.

By agreement, it may be brought into common stock and be considered as personality as among the partners themselves. Wood v. Witherow (1871) 8 Phila. 517; McDermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 440, 10 Am. Dec. 466; Hale v. Henrie (1834) 2 Watts, 145, 27 Am. Dec. 239; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 172.

But in Pennsylvania, in order to work a conversion as against creditors and others, the deed or instrument must be duly recorded. Ibid.

When the partners in their copartnership articles, or at the time of the purchase, agree that real estate advanced as stock or acquired with partnership funds shall form part of the company's property it must in equity be considered as personal property. Sigourney v. Munn (1829) 7 Conn. 11.

The intention of the partners, to be ascertained from their own acts and agreements, is to govern in the question of conversion of lands into partnership stock, and no express agreement in writing is necessary. Arnold v. Waluwright (1861) 8 Minn. 358, 80 Am. Dec. 448.

not satisfied from the evidence that the money alleged to have belonged to Mrs. Miller was not the money of Miller himself. If any funds were loaned to him by Lamport, it is not possible to fix their exact amount separately from those alleged to have been borrowed of Mrs. Miller. The witnesses contradict each other as to amounts, and as to the times and places of payment. There is refusal to answer questions, and failure to explain matters needing explanation. We have examined all the testimony, as contained in the original record, and we cannot say that the circuit court erred in the conclusion reached by it in regard to this mortgage, or that the appellate court has erred in agreeing with the circuit court. It is true that the deed from Miller and Newton to the bank contains the words, "subject to incumbrances," but we think the reference here is to incumbrances which are made in good faith. The facts about the mortgage were not known when the deed was executed. There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether the parties intended to refer to the Lamport mortgage, or to certain liens claimed

A parol agreement will work a conversion. Ibid.; Davis v. Christian (1869) 15 Gratt. 11.

Or it may be so converted by such facts and circumstances attending its acquisition or use as will raise an implication that the partners so intended. Arnold v. Wainwright, supra.

Real estate is capable of being converted into personalty for partnership purposes, and an intention to make such conversion being shown, it becomes as completely a matter of the social effects as if it were personal estate. Brooke v. Washington (1851) 8 Gratt. 248, 56 Am. Dec. 142.

Such conversion is sufficiently shown where real estate is purchased for partnership purposes and paid for with partnership funds, and used solely for the conducting of the partnership business. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 22.

And such is the case although it is conveyed to them in their individual names as joint tenants. Davis v. Christian, supra.

Or where it is originally put into the company as stock by agreement. Frink v. Branch (1844) 16 Conn. 260, following Sigourney v. Munn (1828) 7 Conn. 11; Fereday v. Wightwick (1827) 4 Cond. Ch. Rep. 114, 4 Russ. 114; Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 7 Cond. Ch. Rep. 208, 1 Myl. & K. 649, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Broom v. Broom (1834) 9 Cond. Ch. Rep. 168, 3 Myl. & K. 448; Randall v. Randall (1835) 10 Cond. Ch. Rep. 62, 7 Sim. 271, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 187; Crawshaw v. Maule (1818) 1 Swanst. 496; Edgar v. Donnelly (1811) 2 Munf. 387; M'Dermott v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 438, 10 Am. Dec. 468; Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 585, 13 Am. Dec. 642; Forde v. Herron (1814) 4 Munf. 816.

Real estate bought with partnership funds or acquired in satisfaction of debts constitutes assets of the firm so far as the partners and creditors are concerned, quite as effectually as choses in action or merchandise, the fact of the acquisition working an equitable conversion of them into personal estate. Whitney v. Cotten (1876) 53 Miss. 639.

The conversion of real estate into personalty is a device of equity in order to effectuate the settlement of partnerships, and to devote all their property to the payment of the firm debts, a result highly equitable which the court will never fail to attain. Hewitt v. Rankin (1875) 41 Iowa, 35. To the same effect, Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 98 Mass. 107; Lindley v. Davis (1837) 7 Mont. 206.

It is allowed for the purpose of securing in the interests of the partners themselves the payment of the firm debts and advances made by the partners respectively. Re Codding & Russell (1881) 9 Fed. Rep. 849; Foster's App. (1873) 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553.

But the doctrine has its manifest limitations. Re Codding & Russell, supra.

By such doctrine partnership real estate is personal property only for the purposes of paying the debts of a firm. Weld v. Johnson Mfg. Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 552.

And otherwise it retains its legal character and incidents. Campbell v. Campbell (1879) 30 N. J. Eq. 415.

It is not so converted absolutely for all purposes. Re Codding & Russell, supra.

The rule ceasing when the partnership is settled and its debts are paid. Lindley v. Davis, supra.

For all purposes connected with the partnership, except a sale and conveyance under the stringent provisions of the statute of frauds, partnership real estate is changed from real to personal property. Foster v. Barnes (1876) 81 Pa. 377.

The doctrine of equitable conversion, by which partnership lands remain personal property until the indebtedness is paid and the equities between the partners are adjusted, is an elementary principle of law in Wisconsin. Weld v. Johnson Mfg. Co. supra; Bird v. Morrison (1860) 12 Wis. 133; Pierce v. Covert (1875) 39 Wis. 262; Bergeron v. Richardott (1882) 55 Wis. 129; Martin v. Morris (1885) 62 Wis. 413; Fisher v. Vaughn (1890) 75 Wis. 609; Riedeburg v. Schmitt (1888) 71 Wis. 644; Kruschke v. Stefan (1892) 83 Wis. 373.

The doctrine that converts real estate into chattels is a creature of equity, and parties seeking to avail themselves of it are bound to set up the facts out of which the equity arises. Cowden v. Cairns (1859) 28 Mo. 471; Hoxie v. Carr (1838) 1 Sumn. 176; Maguire v. Vice (1855) 20 Mo. 431.

In equity, the real purposes of the acquisition of such property are considered and by means of trusts real estate is converted, when held for partnership purposes, into personalty so far as is necessary to settle all the equities between the firm and its creditors, and between the partners themselves. Percifull v. Platt (1890) 36 Ark. 455.

And when real estate ought to be treated as partnership property, equity will so decree it at the suit of any one who shows a beneficial interest in having it so declared. Murphy v. Abrams (1874) 50 Ala. 238.

It will be made only when, and so far as required, for partnership purposes. Shearer v. Shearer (1867) 98 Mass. 107.

Being limited in its operation to the administration and adjustment of partnership affairs. Carothers v. Alexander (1890) 74 Tex. 309.

The intention to do so being made very clearly to appear. Thompson v. Holden (1868) 117 Mo. 118.

Such conversion is required only for the payment of claims against the partnership, which are in the nature of debt, balances due to individual partners for advances to the firm, or for payments made on its behalf, which are included as debts, as is likewise capital furnished by one partner to be repaid in specific amounts. Shearer v. Shearer, supra.

The rule grows out of the particular nature of the partnership relation, and is adopted for the purpose of doing justice between the partners, or between them and others having dealings with them, for the purpose of properly adjusting such relations, and is not an arbitrary rule by which a court of equity transmutes real estate into personalty, when it is once owned and possessed by a partner and causes it to take that character, outside and independent of the exigencies of the part-to exist in favor of creditors who had furnished machinery for the mill. But, even if the words refer to the Lampion mortgage alone, it is not certain from the testimony that the amount of that mortgage was a part of the consideration for the execution of the deed. The grantee in a deed, who purchases subject to an incumbrance to secure indebtedness, may not be under obligations to pay such indebtedness, if its amount is not included in, and does not form a part of, the consideration of the conveyance. Drury v. Holden, 121 Ill. 180. The amount named as the consideration in the deed was simply the agreed value of Newton's interest, and did not include any part of this mortgage. The amount of the actual consideration agreed to be paid by the bank for the deed of Miller's interest, to wit, $5333.33 (one third of 16,000), was paid by a credit of that amount on the firm indebtedness of $21,585.23 due from Newton Emmons & Miller to the bank.

The judgment of the Appellate Court and the decree of the Circuit Court are affirmed.

Phillips, J., having heard this case in the appellate court, took no part in its decision in this court.

nerships, and as to persons having no relation to that partnership. Black v. Black (1854) 15 Ga. 445.

Where the partners, before the purchase of land, agree that at a particular period it shall be converted into money, a court of equity will specifically execute such agreement by directing such property to be sold upon the application of either of the partners, on the ground that it is held in trust for the purposes mentioned in the articles of partnership, and that each partner is interested in its conversion into money for the payment of the firm debts. Greene v. Greene (1824) 1 Ohio, 535, 13 Am. Dec. 642.

The rule does not, however, affect the mode of changing the law relating to the transfer of the title which must be in writing. Carothers v. Alexander (1899) 74 Tex. 309.

The mere fact that real estate is purchased with the money of a firm and the title taken in the name of the firm is not enough to convert it into personality as partnership property. Kepler v. Erie Dime Sav. & Loan Co. (1892) 101 Pa. 603, following Lefevre's App. (1871) 69 Pa. 192, 8 Am. Rep. 229.

So the mere fact that real property held by members of a firm as tenants in common, used in the partnership business for partnership purposes, or that there is an agreement to so use it, is not of itself sufficient to convert it into partnership stock; there must be some evidence of further agreement to make it partnership property. Hogle v. Lowe (1877) 12 Nev. 298.

It is at no time during the partnership converted in such an unequalled sense as to give one partner an implied power to dispose of the whole partnership interest in it. Foster's App. (1873) 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553.

The effect of the conversion of partnership real estate into personality, upon the descent or distribution of the share of a deceased partner among his representatives is regarded as incidental merely, and not an end for which the interference of a court of equity is to be sought. Shearer v. Shearer (1897) 98 Mass. 107.

And with respect to the operation of the statutes of descent, equity will not interfere, either by way of counteracting or modifying it by converting real estate into personality. Ibid.

When a partnership is entered into for the purpose of buying and selling lands, in equity the lands acquired for the purpose of being so dealt with are, by the doctrine of conversion, considered as personality just as much as goods forming the stock in trade of a mercantile partnership are, and being so considered will in equity be dealt with by one partner just as freely as one partner in a commercial partnership can deal with goods forming the stock of the firm for partnership purposes. Manitoba Mortg. Co. v. Bank of Montreal, 17 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 692, following Wyllie v. Wyllie, 4 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 278; Darby v. Darby (1856) 3 Drew. 495, 2 Jur. N. S. 271, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 412; Waterer v. Waterer (1879) L. R. 15 Eq. 402.

VIII. Out and out conversion.

The partners themselves may agree that lands held for partnership purposes shall be considered as personal estate, and such an agreement will work an equitable conversion and the same will then go as personal estate on the death of one partner. Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 296; Davis v. Smith (1837) 82 Ala. 198; Thornton v. Dickson (1791) 3 Bro. Ch. 199.

Real estate bought with partnership funds for partnership purposes and for facilitating the business, and as a means of continuing and extending the partnership and its operations, resumes the characteristics of personality for all purposes as between the members of the firm inter se and the creditors, and also for the purpose of distribution between the administrator, heirs, and devisees of a deceased partner. Corwall v. Corwall (1899) 6 Bush, 309.

And where by the agreement real estate is to be sold and converted into money, it will be considered as personal estate in equity, and upon the decease of one partner his administrator may release his share to the surviving partner as against the heirs of such deceased partner. Ludlow v. Cooper (1854) 4 Ohio St. 1.

So an agreement in writing is not in equity necessary for an out and out conversion. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 20 Ohio St. 22.

And there may be cases of a partnership confined to dealings in real estate, where it might be held that being thus a commodity it should be regarded as converted into personality out and out. Holladay v. Land & River Imp. Co. (1893) 57 Fed. Rep. 774; Riddle v. Whitehill (1870) 135 U. S. 621, 34 L. ed. 253; Allen v. Withrow (1884) 110 U. S. 119, 23 L. ed. 90; Brown v. Slee (1881) 103 U. S. 823, 26 L. ed. 618.

When land is purchased to be dealt in as a commodity for the purposes of such dealing, an out and out conversion of it into personality takes place, and each partner can bind the firm by contract for its disposition. Rovelsky v. Brown (1890) 82 Ala. 522; Ludlow v. Cooper supra; Olcott v. Wing (1845) 4 McLean, 15; Pugh v. Currie (1843) 5 Ala. 446; Frost v. Wolf (1890) 77 Tex. 455.

If the partners have evinced the design to treat the lands as personality by putting them into the partnership stock, the conversion into personality is presumed to continue for all purposes, unless the contrary intention is in some way shown; and while the legal title upon the death of a partner will go in the ordinary course of descent without survivorship, yet the equitable interest will, after an ascertainment of its value by sale, be distributed according to the supposed intention of the deceased partner as personal property. Lenow v. Fones (1896) 48 Ark. 557; Randall v. Randall (1835) 7 Sim. 271, 10 Cond. Ch. Rep. 52, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 187; Bell v. Phyn (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 453; Thornton v. Dixon (1791) 3 Bro. Ch. 199; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 3 Barb. Ch. 199, 5 L. ed. 613, 47 Am. Dec. 306.

1. A creditor of an insolvent estate, holding collateral security for his claim, must credit its value upon his demand before he can share in the distribution of the estate, whether the collateral has been turned into money or not.

2. Entering in the partnership books and treating inter sese as partnership property real estate, devised and deeded to the partners individually, standing on the public records in their individual names and not representing partnership funds, will not make it partnership property, as against individual creditors, unless the entries were sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds and the individual creditors were charged with notice by

Real estate may in equity be converted out and out into personality, by the agreement of the partners, or the manner in which it is conveyed to them. Davis v. Christian (1859) 15 Gratt. 11.

Thus where there is an agreement between the partners for a conversion and sale of the lands, after the partnership affairs are closed, and for a distribution of the proceeds, equity regards the lands as personal property, not only for partnership purposes, but for distribution, upon the principle that what the parties had directed to be done shall be taken as already done. Hughes v. Allen (1894) 66 Vt. 86; Lenow v. Fones, supra; Foster's App. (1878) 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553; Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688.

If purposely impressed with that character, Ware v. Owens (1868) 42 Ala. 212, 34 Am. Dec. 642; Lang v. Waring (1850) 17 Ala. 153; West Hickory Min. Assn. v. Reed (1875) 80 Pa. 33.

By the agreement of the partners or otherwise. Roberts v. McCarty (1857) 9 Ind. 16, 68 Am. Dec. 604; Hale v. Plummer (1836) 6 Ind. 121.

But the intention to convert out and out must be made to appear clearly, yet it may be inferred from circumstances, with sufficient clearness. Rammelsberg v. Mitchell (1875) 29 Ohio St. 22.

The line of demarcation between an absolute conversion and a conversion sub modo, is that in the former it must be needed and actually used in the partnership business, while in the latter it is enough that it is purchased with partnership means. Ibid.

Where in entering into articles of partnership it is agreed that all the land put in as common stock shall be to all intents personal property, it will be treated as such, but it does not follow therefrom that land merely conveyed for partnership purposes shall be changed to personality. Wood v. Witherow (1871) 8 Phila. 517.

Yet every such conversion, whether express or implied, complete or partial, is equitable only, and the property can only be conveyed as real estate. Davis v. Christian (1859) 15 Gratt. 11.

Although under the laws of Louisiana real estate can only become personal partnership property by written agreement, yet where it is purchased with partnership funds and is so admitted by deceased partner in his will, and by the parties since his decease, it will be considered partnership property in a suit between the widow and the heirs and the surviving partners, for a winding up and distribution of the partnership estate. Tillotson v. Tillotson (1867) 34 Conn. 335.

It is now well settled in England that by becoming partnership property real estate must be regarded as converted into personality for all purposes. Ripley v. Waterworth (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 423; Phillips v. Phillips (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 649, 7 Cond. Ch. Rep. 203, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Brown v. Brown (1834) 3 Myl. & K. 443, 9 Cond. Ch. Rep. 168; Morris v. Kearsley (1837) 2 Younge & C. Exch. 139; Darby v. Darby (1856) 3 Drew. 495, 2 Jur. N. S. 275, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 413.

Not merely as between the partners inter se but between the real and personal representatives of the deceased partner. Conger v. Platt (1836) 25 U. C. Q. B. 277, following Darby v. Darby (1855) 3 Drew. 503, 2 Jur. N. S. 271, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 413.

IX. Reconversion.

If after satisfying partnership wants there remains a residuum, whether of land or its proceeds, it retains all the attributes of land in every particular in which realty is distinguished from personality. Powers v. Robinson (1890) 90 Ala. 225; Andrews v. Brown (1852) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Lang v. Waring (1854) 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 533; Caldwell v. Farmer (1876) 53 Ala. 405, Word v. Montgomery (1877) 60 Ala. 500; Slaughter v. Doe (1890) 67 Ala. 494; Hatchett v. Blanton (1882) 72 Ala. 423; Espy v. Comer (1884) 76 Ala. 501; Brunson v. Morgan, Id. 593; *Pepper v. C. 273, affirmed Tarbell v. West (1881) 86 N. Y. 280; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain (1878) 12 Jones & S. 116; Rank v. Grote (1854) 18 Jones & S. 275; Delmonico v. Guillaume (1845) 3 Sandf. Ch. 363, 7 L. ed. 627; Buckley v. Buckley (1850) 11 Barb. 74; Greenwood v. Marvin (1838) 111 N. Y. 423; MacFarlane v. MacFarlane (1894) 33 Hun. 238; Dawson v. Parsons (1894) 10 Misc. 423; Leaf's App. (1884) 105 Pa. 505; Martin v. Morris (1885) 63 Wis. 413.

But it must be discharged from the trust, otherwise it cannot be regarded as realty for any purpose. Dawson v. Parsons, supra.

It is then real estate for every other purpose, and is subject to the principles and laws applicable to that species of property. Re Codding & Russell (1881) 9 Fed. Rep. 849.

With the attributes of a tenancy in common. Brewer v. Browne (1880) 68 Ala. 210; Roulston v. Washington (1855) 79 Ala. 529; Espy v. Comer (1884) 76 Ala. 501; Andrews v. Brown (1853) 21 Ala. 437, 56 Am. Dec. 252; Lang v. Waring (1850) 17 Ala. 145; Sykes v. Sykes (1873) 49 Miss. 190; Holmes v. McGee (1859) 27 Mo. 597; Buckley v. Buckley (1850) 11 Barb. 43.

Both at law and in equity, unless the partners have by agreement, either express or implied, impressed upon it the character of personal property for all purposes. Flanagan v. Shuck (1855) 33 Ky. 617.

In Offutt v. Scott (1872) 47 Ala. 104, without directly passing upon the question as to whether the balance due from partnership real estate, after paying the debts and liabilities of the firm, was to be considered as real or personal estate, the court inclined to the opinion that it ought to be treated as real property and to be disposed of as such.

In the absence of an express provision in the con-the use made of the property or otherwise that it had been made partnership property.

3. No estoppel against claiming that real estate of an insolvent firm is individual and not partnership property will arise by signing a request that the court authorize a sale of the assets at a price offered, which contains a statement that a certain dividend will be thereby obtained, although such statement can only be true in case all the proceeds go to firm creditors, if no creditor is misled or injured by the statement.

tract of partnership, the real estate only becomes personality pro tanto. Davis v. Smith (1837) 82 Ala. 198; Espy v. Comer, supra.

Any balance left goes as real estate equitably amongst all, regardless of the accidental position of the legal title. Percifull v. Platt (1850) 86 Ark. 454.

The onus, however, is on the party alleging that it has lost the character of personality to show, not only that the creditors of the partners have been paid, but that as between themselves the accounts of the partners have been settled. Hiscock v. Jaycox (1875) 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 507.

If by agreement real estate is brought into the common stock of the partnership, it is equally within the power of the partners to withdraw it and to reconvert it into the separate property of the individual partners, and such reconversion is binding as between the partners, and in the absence of fraud upon their joint and respective several creditors. Shafer's App. (1884) 106 Pa. 49.

Reconversion of partnership real estate into personality does not, however, take place after the death of a partner, until the partnership accounts and liabilities are wound up and settled and the surplus estate ascertained. Logan v. Greenlaw (1885) 25 Fed. Rep. 299, decided under sections 2011 and 2789 of the Tennessee Code.

And in the settling of balances between the partners themselves the balance of real estate is considered as such. Wilcox v. Wilcox (1866) 13 Allen, 252.

X. Statute of frauds.

a. In general.

As to the validity of a parol partnership for dealing in lands, see note to Bates v. Babcock (Cal.) 18 L. R. A. 745.

With regard to the operation of the statute of frauds upon partnership real estate, there would seem to be some conflict of opinion, both in cases where the property is purchased for partnership purposes with partnership funds and in cases where it is bought for sale and profit, but the weight of authority tends to negative the operation of the statute.

The court of equity has full jurisdiction of all cases between partners touching the partnership property, and will inquire into, take an account of, and administer upon all the partnership property, whether it be real or personal; and in such cases it will not allow one partner to commit a fraud or a breach of trust upon his copartner by taking advantage of the statute. Holmes v. McCray (1875) 51 Ind. 368, 19 Am. Rep. 735; Bunell v. Taintor (1823) 4 Conn. 568.

As regards partnerships formed for the purchase and sale of lands as a business, the statute of frauds may require them to be in writing, yet when partners as an incident to their business purchase and sell lands and pay for them with partnership funds, equity treats such lands as movable partnership property is treated, whenever it may be necessary for the payment of debts of the firm, or for the adjustment and equalization of accounts between the partners. Cauler v. Wharton (1878) 62 Ala. 358; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Hany v. Farmer, cited in Cauler v. Wharton, supra, reported in August, 1877, in manuscript.

In order that the equities of partners, whatever they may be, may be applied to their real estate, it is not necessary to hold that in their transactions with regard to it the statute of frauds is abrogated, or that the links in the chain of title coming through a partner need not be in writing. Carothers v. Alexander (1889) 74 Tex. 309.

The doctrine of part performance stands upon the fraud or hardship, which would be operated by leaving the parties to an action at law for damage for the recovery of money, when their position has been so far changed that the judgment in such a case would furnish no adequate relief. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207; Purcell v. Coleman (1867) 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 513, 18 L. ed. 436.

b. Within the statute.

Partnership real estate is unquestionably covered by the statute of frauds. Re Coddington & Russell (1891) 9 Fed. Rep. 849.

The payment of a part of the purchase money will not take the case out of the statute of frauds. Black v. Black (1854) 15 Ga. 445.

It is not necessary in a partnership for the purchase and sale of land that the partners should be jointly concerned in the original purchase, where their interests are afterwards mingled, but the partners must by contract be jointly concerned in the future sale. Gray v. Palmer (1858) 9 Cal. 616.

Such a partnership should as between the partners themselves be evidenced in writing, for the reason that if such partnership be by parol only, and one partner makes a purchase in his own name, although intended for the firm's benefit, the other on the mere ground of a partnership by parol, cannot take advantage of the contract, as he would acquire an interest in lands by parol, directly in opposition to the statute of frauds. Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (2 Davies) 322.

So far as purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors are concerned, the agreement of partners to make real estate part of the common stock must be in writing, and ought to appear of record. Harding v. Devitt (1873) 10 Phila. 95; Lefevre's App. (1871) 69 Pa. 122, 8 Am. Rep. 229; Warriner v. Mitchell (1880) 128 Pa. 161; Geddes's App. (1877) 84 Pa. 482; Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79; Hale v. Henrie (1834) 9 Watts, 143, 27 Am. Dec. 238; Ridgway's App. (1850) 15 Pa. 177, 53 Am. Dec. 586; Lancaster Bank v. Myley (1850) 18 Pa. 544.

An agreement for copartnership, providing for the constitution of capital stock by a stipulation that the defendant is to bring into such stock his mill and mill tract, the plaintiff to pay an agreed sum for the advance, involves a question for the sale of lands, and is within the purview of the North Carolina Act of 1819, and therefore void unless signed as the act directed such avoidance af-

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In October, 1893, George W. S. Hoffman, W. E. Hoffman, and John W. Hoffman, partners trading under the firm name of W. H. Hoffman & Sons, executed a deed of trust, in which their wives joined, to John B. Ramsay and Simon P. Schott, by which they conveyed all their property, "including all of the joint stock of the copartnership and all of the separate estate of each of the partners, in trust for the payment of partnership and individual creditors according to their respective rights and interests therein." The circuit court of Baltimore city assumed jurisdiction of the trust, and after the sale of the property, which will be more particularly hereinafter referred to, an audit was made, distributing the proceeds of sales, etc. The appellant held at the time of the assignment two notes of the firm, each being for the sum of $5000, and indorsed by George W. S. Hoffman and J. W. Hoffman, individually. With each note there were deposited bonds of the Gunpowder Valley Railroad Company, of the par value of $7500, fecting the entire contract. Clancey v. Craine (1883) 17 N. C. 363.

An agreement between the parties whereby one purchases land for the joint benefit of both, each advancing half of the purchase money, is a contract within the statute of frauds. Parker v. Bodley (1815) 4 Bibb, 102.

In Henley v. Brown (1827) 1 Stew. (Ala.) 144, the court refused to enforce performance of a contract for the purchase and division of real estate, upon the ground that it was virtually a contract to sell and convey within the statute of frauds.

A partnership to buy contracts for the sale of lands is a partnership for the purchase of an equitable interest in lands, and as such is within the provisions of the statute of frauds. Smith v. Burnham (1838) 3 Sumn. 425.

In Henderson v. Hudson (1810) 1 Munf. 510, it is held that the statute of frauds applies to an agreement between a purchaser of lands and another party, that the latter should be admitted as a partner in the transaction, the proof thereof being only parol evidence of subsequent dealings and declarations between the parties.

Even though a partnership for the purchase and sale of real estate can only be established by writing, yet upon a withdrawal of some of the partners and the substitution of others, recognized and treated as partners by the continuing members of the firm by a written instrument, such instrument is sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds. Rowland v. Booser (1846) 10 Ala. 690.

Where a bill was filed for a conveyance of real estate, and a cross-bill alleged a partnership or agreement between the parties, and the answer contended that if such agreement existed it was by parol merely, and therefore null and void so far as it related to real estate, and this was demurred to on the ground that the statute did not apply. It was held upon the authority of Smith v. Burnham, supra, that the demurrer was properly overruled. Thorn v. Thorn (1860) 11 Iowa, 146.

In Kidd v. Carson (1870) 83 Md. 37, the court refused to enforce a parol agreement entered into between partners, for the sale of the land and the credit of the moneys derived therefrom upon certain indebtedness, such an agreement being within the provisions of the statute of frauds, providing that all declarations or creations of trust are to be in writing.

Where trade is ancillary to the estate and the proceeds have been laid out in land, a considerable portion of which does not belong to the trade, the intention of the parties must be taken to be that all the land purchased shall be held in the same way as the land originally belonging to them, and therefore, the shares of the partners are real estate. Steward v. Blakeway (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. 479, 16 Week. Rep. 1104.

An agreement between the lessee of a mine and another, to become partners of the mine, paying the reserved rent and subletting the mine at a royalty and dividing the profits, is within the statute of frauds, and not sufficiently proved by a receipt signed by the lessee and given to the other party for a sum of money, as the latter's share of the head rent of the mine, the same being exactly half that rent. Caddick v. Skidmore (1857) 2 De G. & J. 52, 27 L. J. Ch. 153, 3 Jur. N. S. 1185.

c. Not within the statute.

Where real estate is the subject-matter of a partnership transaction, it is considered in nearly the same manner as personal property, and the real intention of the parties with reference thereto, their contracts, promises, or mutual understandings, will govern without reference to whether they were reduced to writing or not, the statute of frauds having no application. Tenney v. Simpson (1867) 37 Kan. 353; Marsh v. Davis (1885) 33 Kan. 322; Morrill v. Colehour (1876) 82 Ill. 619; Knott v. Knott (1876) 6 Or. 142; Collins v. Decker (1879) 70 Me. 22; York v. Clemens (1875) 41 Iowa, 95; Clark's App. (1872) 72 Pa. 142.

And such a case is not within the provisions of the statute of frauds. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1893) 56 Fed. Rep. 409; Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1852) 10 Cush. 458; Collins v. Decker, supra; Dale v. Hamilton (1846) 5 Hare, 309, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 123, 11 Jur. 133; York v. Clemens, supra; McGuire v. Ramsey (1849) 9 Ark. 518; Jarvis v. Brooks (1853) 27 N. H. 37, 59 Am. Dec. 350; Sherwood v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1875) 21 Minn. 123.

For the reason that it is not a case where the consideration is paid by one person and a conveyance taken in the name of another, the consideration being paid by all. Fairchild v. Fairchild (1876) 64 N. Y. 471, affirming (1875) 5 Hun, 407.

And such an agreement will be enforced by one party against the other, especially where the plaintiff has actually paid and settled for his share. Traphagen v. Burt (1870) 67 N. Y. 30.

A partnership formed by a verbal agreement may become the equitable owner of real estate, whenever the use and ownership of such property is a necessary incident to the partnership business, or a necessary investment of the partnership funds, and such an agreement is not affected by the statute of frauds. Knott v. Knott (1876) 6 Or. 142.

The question is considered in the light of a trust created by operation of law which does not come within the purview of the statute of frauds upon the same principle of enforcing the execution of a trust. Hanft v. Howard (1857) 56 N. C. 440, following Hargrave v. King (1848) 40 N. C. 430; Cloninger v. Summit (1856) 55 N. C. 513.

The statute of frauds does not apply to a purchase in the name of one party for the benefit of the others under an agreement to share equally in the payment therefor to the equal interest of the parties when paid for. Knauss v. Cahoon (1891) 7 Utah, 132.

Where parties contribute equally for the purchase of realty and orally agree to share its profits the conveyance being taken in the name of one, the statute of frauds does not apply and the contract is valid as a partnership transaction. Newell v. Cochran (1899) 41 Minn. 374; Hodge v. Twitcomb as collateral security, with the usual authority to the bank to sell at public or private sale in case of default. The appellant filed its claim for the amount of the notes, together with costs of protest, against the estates of the firm and of the individual indorsers. The National Mechanics' Bank of Baltimore excepted to the allowance by the auditor of the claim of appellant, because it had not credited the value of the collateral security held by it; and the appellant excepted to the audit for the reason, as it alleges, that the real estate held and owned by the three members of the firm was their individual property, and not partnership assets. An agreement was filed, in which certain facts are admitted, and the court below was authorized to pass a pro forma order sustaining the exceptions to the claim of the appellant, and overruling those filed by it. A pro forma order was accordingly passed, and an appeal taken to this court.

The principal questions presented for our consideration are: (1) Is the appellant entitled to a distribution on its whole claim, without crediting the value of the securities (1895) 38 Minn. 399; Stern v. Harris (1890) 40 Minn. 209.

Part performance of such an agreement will take it out of the statute of frauds. McKinnon v. McKinnon (1896) 55 Fed. Rep. 409; Tatum v. Brooker (1872) 51 Mo. 143; Dozier v. Matson (1897) 94 Mo. 328; Self v. Cordell (1870) 45 Mo. 345.

The statute of frauds has no bearing upon the case, real property for the purposes of payment of partnership liabilities being treated as personalty. Taylor v. Farmer (1896) (Ill.) 6 West. Rep. 710.

Thus where the agreement related to the purchase of real estate for the purpose of erecting a mill thereon, one partner to do the work, the other to furnish the money and material, the land to be paid for out of the profits, the outlay reimbursed and the work and labor paid for, the profits and losses to be shared equally, the statute does not apply. Falkner v. Hudt (1875) 73 N. C. 571.

Where a grantee of land agreed with the grantor, in case the purchase money of the sale should exceed a certain price the grantor should receive one half, it was held that the statute of frauds did not apply, the agreement merely pertaining to the purchase price and not to an interest in lands. Miller v. Kendig (1890) 55 Iowa, 174.

The statute of frauds does not apply where the property is purchased for the use of the firm. Teichmacher v. Lenz (1894) 82 Hun, 594.

Within the meaning of the statute of frauds in such cases neither partner conveys or assigns any land to the other; and hence there is no conflict with the statute which is not so broad as to prevent proof by parol of an interest in lands, it simply aiming at the creation of conveyance of an estate in lands without a writing. Holmes v. McCray (1875) 51 Ind. 353, 19 Am. Rep. 735.

The interests of the respective members of the firm in such property are not required to be established by deed or instrument in writing under the statute of frauds. Greenwood v. Marvin (1898) 111 N. Y. 423, following Chester v. Dickerson (1873) 84 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 53 Barb. 846.

While an authority to convey lands must be in writing, under the statute of frauds, yet an authority to make a contract to convey lands is not within the provisions of the statute. Lawrence v. Taylor (1843) 5 Hull, 107.

An agreement in consideration of the loan of money to pay one half of the proceeds of real estate when sold above the purchase money, interest and taxes is not within the statute of frauds and is valid. Mahagan v. Mead (1884) 63 N. H. 130, following Graves v. Graves (1864) 45 N. H. 323.

So an agreement entered into for the joint purchase of certain real estate each to contribute and pay an equal amount therefor, to share in the profit and loss arising from a resale equally, is not an agreement for the sale of real property within section 3544 of the South Dakota Compiled Laws, which require the same or some memorandum or note therefor to be in writing subscribed by the party to be charged, but is an agreement in the 97 L. R. A.

nature of a special partnership for the purpose of dealing in a particular piece of real estate, and therefore not within the provisions of the statute. Davenport v. Buchanan (S. Dak.) Dec. 15, 1894.

And see further, Personette v. Pryme (1881) 34 N. J. Eq. 26; Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 100, 8 Am. Dec. 231, and other cases in Head XX. infra.

XI. Form of conveyance.

A deed made to a partnership described as a partnership name is legal and may be aided by parol proof showing the individuals composing the firm. Blanchard v. Floyd (1890) 93 Ala. 53; Jones v. Morris (1878) 61 Ala. 521; Lindsay v. Hoke (1852) 21 Ala. 542.

A firm name is always held sufficient to designate the true owner of all the persons composing the firm, and is always used in the transaction of the business of the firm, and there seems no reason for holding that a partnership in making a purchase of real estate for the benefit of the firm may not do so in the same manner as they might make other purchases, namely, in the firm name. Sherry v. Gilmore (1883) 53 Wis. 324, a case of a conveyance to partners in the firm name by tax deed. To the same effect, Shaw v. Loud (1815) 12 Mass. 447; Stroman v. Bottenbury (1812) 4 Desauss. Eq. 268; Lady Superior of Cong. Nunnery of Montreal v. McNamara, 3 Barb. Ch. 875, 5 L. ed. 339, 46 Am. Dec. 184; Newton v. McKay, 29 Mich. 1; Staak v. Sigelkow (1890) 13 Wis. 235; Hogg v. Odom (1882) Dudley (Ga.) 185.

But if the deed be to a name adopted by the firm style, which includes the name of no party, it passes nothing at law, and the same is the case where the deed is to one already dead. Percifull v. Platt (1890) 36 Ark. 455.

Yet a deed made to or by a partnership in the firm name, the full name of neither partner being given, although not sufficient to pass the title to the land at law, will operate in equity to pass an equitable estate. Dunlap v. Green (1894) 60 Fed. Rep. 242; Frost v. Wolf (1890) 77 Tex. 455.

And whatever may be the form of the conveyance, it will be held subject to all the equitable rights and liens of the partners which would apply to it if it were personal estate. Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22; Arnold v. Wainwright (1881) 6 Minn. 358, 30 Am. Dec. 450.

The form of the conveyance making no difference, where the property is paid for out of partnership funds and devoted to the uses of the partnership, such property being regarded as partnership property. Cilley v. Huse (1890) 40 N. H. 358; Jarvis v. Brooks (1863) 27 N. H. 37, 59 Am. Dec. 359; Burnside v. Merrick (1842) 4 Met. 541; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 552, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 532.

A conveyance to a partnership firm, "to be held by them as partnership property according to their respective interests in the firm" duly recorded, makes such real estate partnership stock. Du Bree v. Albert (1832) 100 Pa. 433.

But the form of the conveyance does not settle held by it as collateral? (2) Is the real estate held by the members of this firm to be treated as partnership or individual property, so far as the appellant is concerned?

If the appellant had sold the securities held by it between the dates of the assignment and the distribution, there could be no question about the right of the trustees or the creditors to require it to credit its claim with the net proceeds of such sale. The case of Third Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Lanahan, 66 Md. 461, has established that as the law of this state, whatever may be the effect of the decisions elsewhere, cited by the appellant, and it is a just and equitable rule. Such being the case would there be any equity in permitting the appellant to receive a dividend on its whole claim simply because it saw proper to delay realizing on its securities until after distribution was made? We think not. The creditor who holds collateral securities for his claim has the advantage over other creditors to the extent of their value, or what he may realize upon them; but he should not be permitted to have, in addition thereto, what in many cases the question. Ex parte Neale, Re Laurence, Case of the Bank of England (1861) 8 De G. F. & J. 645.

XII. When not considered personalty.

If a purchase be made and a conveyance taken to partners as tenants in common, without any agreement to consider it as stock, although paid for out of their joint funds and to be used for partnership purposes, it will not in the absence of an agreement to the contrary be deemed real estate. Smith v. Jackson (1838) 2 Edw. Ch. 28, 6 L. ed. 206.

The mere purchase of lands with partnership money, and their use for the purpose of carrying on the business of farming, is not sufficient evidence of an intention on the part of the partners to convert the land into personalty. Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688.

So the mere purchase by two parties, who erect dwelling houses thereon in their joint names, together with the confusion of their interest, is not sufficient evidence of a partnership, where the houses are occupied by the parties separately, in the absence of other independent proof of such partnership. Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1862) 10 Cush. 458.

And where it is not sufficiently shown that the partners intend such real estate to resume the character of personalty, as where it is not bought for the purposes of a partnership business, it will not resume the character of personal estate. Galbraith v. Gedge (1855) 16 B. Mo. 631.

Where there was a partnership in the business of a livery stable and saw mill, but no real intention shown that the real estate was to be taken into the partnership stock, or that such property was bought with the social funds for partnership purposes, it was held it still retained its character of real estate. Alexander v. Kimbro (1878) 49 Miss. 529.

Again where real estate is held in trust for the benefit of the partners and conveyed to others, who subsequently execute a declaration of trust specifying the proportions belonging to each of the cestui que trust, the property is no longer considered as personalty, but as real estate and vests in each of the cestui que trust an equitable title out of which the widow is entitled to dower. Nicoll v. Ogden (1862) 29 Ill. 323, 81 Am. Dec. 311.

Upon a dissolution of a partnership, the land will be regarded as real estate as between the partners, where they are all living. Summey v. Patton (1864) Winst. Eq. 62, 86 Am. Dec. 461.

Partnership real estate was not considered as personalty in Ferguson v. Hase (1867) 62 N. C. 113.

So far as creditors are concerned, partnership real estate is not converted into personalty. Moore v. Moore (1893) 158 Pa. 495.

An interest in land held by two persons for a common object was held to devolve as real estate. Re Wilson, Wilson v. Holloway (1893) 2 Ch. 340.

Where a testator and his son carried on business in a freehold dwelling house, in which, when the testator's other son was admitted into the firm, it was agreed the partnership business should still be 27 L. R. A.

carried on, the partnership paying the rent for it to the testator and his first son who were entitled to aliquot shares in it, it was held that although previously to the admission of the second son into the partnership, the house formed part of the partnership capital and was to be considered as personalty, yet by the terms of the subsequent agreement it became real estate. Rowley v. Adams (1844) 8 Jur. 904, 7 Beav. 548.

XIII. The question of notice.

Notice that real estate is partnership property is to be presumed when such property is used in the manufacture of the goods and merchandise. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

In the case of lands not conveyed to the partners jointly, but acquired at different times and from different persons, nothing appearing upon the record to indicate that it is held as property of the partnership, no agreement being shown that it is so held, nor that the complainant knew that the rights of the parties in the land are otherwise than those of tenants in common, a bona fide purchaser from one of such partners is not bound by notice that the property is partnership estate, merely from the fact that the parties are partners and make use of the property for partnership purposes. Reynolds v. Ruokman (1876) 35 Mich. 80.

And where the record was silent as to the uses made by the partners of certain real estate not necessarily incident to the partnership business without some notice that it is treated as partnership property, no one dealing with the individual members of the firm will be expected to regard it as such, and the ordinary use of such property will not put creditors on inquiry or be sufficient notice that it is treated as partnership property. National Union Bank of Maryland v. National Mechanic's Bank of Baltimore (Md.) Dec. 19, 1894.

When land is brought into a concern as stock, it is, as between partners and a person who has knowingly dealt with one of them for it, to be treated as personal estate belonging, not to the partners individually, but to the company collectively. West Hickory Min. Assn. v. Reed (1875) 80 Pa. 38; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 165.

From the Pennsylvania cases of Lancaster Bank v. Myley (1850) 13 Pa. 544; Ridgway's App. (1850) 15 Pa. 177, 55 Am. Dec. 586, and Hale v. Henrie (1834) 3 Watts, 143, 27 Am. Dec. 239, it appears that proof in writing, and even record, is more rigidly required in conveyances to partnerships than in other sales. McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 191.

Real estate purchased with partnership money and held and used for the benefit of the firm for partnership purposes, as between the partners and their creditors must be treated as personal property, and by agreement it may be brought into common stock and be considered as personal among themselves, and if the instrument showing how the land is held, is duly recorded, it will be so as to the rest of the world, and will not be held as a tenancy might be equivalent to double dividends, or even more. If, for example, the collaterals realized 50 per centum of the creditor's claim, and the debtor's estate would only pay 50 cents on the dollar, the creditor with the security would be paid in full, while the others would receive only one half of their claims. Great inconvenience and cost would oftentimes follow the practice contended for in the distribution of insolvent estates, in addition to the undue advantage given the creditor holding the collaterals; for if the whole claim be distributed to, and the dividend exceeded the difference between the value of the collaterals and the amount of the claim, the creditor would have to refund or deduct from his dividend the balance, which would require another audit, thus involving the estate in unnecessary cost and delay. The value of the collaterals would have to be ascertained before the dividend was paid to the creditor, so as to properly protect the insolvent estate; for if this be not done, and the dividend was more than the difference between the value of the collaterals and the amount of the claim, the in common. Wood v. Witherow (1871) 8 Phila. 517; M'Dermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 440, 10 Am. Dec. 468; Hale v. Henrie, supra; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 172.

Upon the question of notice as affecting purchasers and other third parties, see note to Goldthwaite v. Janney (Ala.) post, —.

XIV. When partnership formed for the purchase and sale of real estate.

There is nothing in the nature or essence of a partnership which requires that it should be confined to ordinary trade and commerce, or to dealings in personal property. Chester v. Dickerson (1878) 54 N. Y. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 53 Barb. 349; Dudley v. Littlefield (1842) 21 Me. 418; Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 417; Mead v. Shepard (1867) 54 Barb. 474; Pendleton v. Wambersie (1807) 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 73, 2 L. ed. 554; Thompson v. Bowman (1867) 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 318, 18 L. ed. 736; Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 173.

There may be a partnership in buying and selling land, as well as in any other vendible property. Dudley v. Littlefield, supra; Tyler v. Waddingham (1890) 8 L. R. A. 687, 58 Conn. 375; Brady v. Colhoun (1829) 1 Penr. & W. 140; Morse v. Richmond (1881) 97 Ill. 303; Hulett v. Fairbanks (1883) 40 Ohio St. 233; Dale v. Hamilton (1846) 5 Hare, 369, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 126, 11 Jur. 163; Benness v. Harrison (1854) 19 Barb. 53; Torrill v. Richards (1817) 1 Nott & McC. 20; Sigourney v. Munn (1828) 7 Conn. 11; Robinson v. Crowder (1828) 4 McCord, L. 519, 17 Am. Dec. 722; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 165; Chester v. Dickerson (1878) supra; Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (3 Daves) 322; Shaeffer v. Blair (1868) 149 U. S. 248, 37 L. ed. 721.

The manifest intention of the parties to create as between themselves a joint interest in the proceeds of land constitutes a partnership. Hyman v. Peters (1899) 30 Ill. App. 124, following Nicoll v. Ogden (1862) 29 Ill. 323, 81 Am. Dec. 311.

Each partner of such a copartnership possessing full power and authority to contract for the sale or other disposition of its entire property, though for technical reasons the legal title vests in all the co-partners and can only be transferred by their joint act. Thompson v. Bowman (1867) 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 318, 18 L. ed. 736.

An agreement to share in any profits which may arise out of the purchase of real estate makes the parties entering into it partners as to third persons, no matter what they may be inter se. Williams v. Gillies (1876) 58 How. Pr. 423; Manhattan Brass & Mfg. Co. v. Sears (1871) 45 N. Y. 797, 6 Am. Rep. 177; Leggett v. Hyde (1874) 58 N. Y. 278, 17 Am. Rep. 244.

In Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 417, the question as to whether or not a partnership can be formed in the buying and selling of real estate solely, was questioned, if not finally decided, by the court.

And where persons engage as partners in the exclusive business of buying and selling, and dealing in real estate, the real estate owned by the firm is, in equity and for partnership purposes, to be treated as personalty. Thompson v. Holden (1866) 117 Mo. 118, following Young v. Thrasher (1866) 115 Mo. 222.

The principles governing ordinary partnerships apply to partnerships for the purpose of buying and selling land. Oloott v. Wing (1845) 4 McLean, 15. Equity, however, does not as a general rule enforce contracts to enter into partnership, and it seems clear that it would not compel in any case specific performance of a verbal contract to enter into a partnership to trade in lands. Meason v. Kaine (1866) 63 Pa. 335.

A joint-stock company, if for the purpose of dealing in real estate, is a partnership. Claggett v. Kilbourne (1862) 66 U. S. 1 Black, 348, 17 L. ed. 213.

So an unincorporated company or firm may deal in land and hold the title, incur, or convey it as it pleases. Oliver's Estate (1890) 9 L. R. A. 421, 136 Pa. 48; Brady v. Colhoun (1829) 1 Penr. & W. 140.

If there is a joint purchase with a view to a joint sale, and a communion of a profit and loss, it is a partnership contract, although it is confined to a single thing. Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (3 Daves) 322.

Where every purchase is made with a view to a joint sale on joint account, so that without any general agreement for a partnership the parties are in law partners in every purchase, by such habit of buying and selling, they hold themselves out to the public as general partners in the business. Ibid.

Whether a parol agreement between two persons to purchase a specific parcel of real estate, and pay for the same from their individual means, taking the deed in the name of one, although with a view of selling at a profit, is valid and binding upon the ground that it constitutes a partnership in any commercial sense and is therefore not violative of the statute of frauds, has been questioned. Williams v. Gillies (1878) 75 N. Y. 302, reversing 18 Hun, 422; Patterson v. Brewster (1844) 4 Edw. Ch. 352, 354, 6 L. ed. 902, 904.

Although a partnership may exist in the use and working of land, yet there cannot be one for the buying and selling of real estate, so as to carry with it the rights, powers, duties, and responsibilities of power in the law-merchant. Patterson v. Brewster, supra.

But in Chester v. Dickerson (1878) 54 N. Y. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 550, affirming (1868) 53 Barb. 349, the court disapproved of the doctrine laid down in Pitts v. Waugh (1808) 4 Mass. 424, and the above case of Patterson v. Brewster, to the effect that the law-merchant, respecting dormant partners, did not extend to speculations in land.

Where the purchase was made for the purpose of sale and the acquisition of profit, and not for the purpose of holding the property as land, but as an article of commerce and for speculation, it was regarded as personal property among the partners, the intention of the partners stamping the character of the transaction. Boone v. Clark (1890) 5 L. R. A. 279, 129 Ill. 464. Morrill v. Colehour (1876) 88 Ill. 613, followed.

trustee would have to look to the creditor holding the collaterals for the excess paid him, and possibly the estate would sustain loss, by not being able to recover the amount. The long established practice in proceedings of this kind, in this state, requires the creditor, in presenting to the auditor prima facie proof of his claim, to swear "that no part of the money intended to be secured by such note hath been received, or any security or satisfaction given for the same, except what (if any) is credited," following the language required for authenticating claims in the orphans' court. The claim in controversy in this case was supported by the affidavit of the cashier of the bank to the above effect. Such language is not meaningless, but was evidently inserted for the purpose of requiring the creditor either to surrender the securities, or credit his claim with their value, before it is distributed to. The value of the securities thus held should be ascertained and credited on the claim, before distribution is made. That can easily be done by relevant testimony, taken under authority of the court, when no sale has taken place.

In Wormser v. Meyer (1877) 54 How Pr. 189, the plaintiffs had numerous speculative transactions in real estate on joint account of the defendant, some of which showed a profit which was divided, the defendant taking his share, but a large decline in real estate taking place, other parcels owned by them existed upon which the defendant had paid nothing, the whole money being furnished by the plaintiffs under defendant's agreement to pay, the facts showing no written agreement between the parties, the defendant's refusal denying the agreement and his interest in the lots, and relying upon the statute of frauds as a defense, the plaintiffs claiming that a partnership could be formed to speculate in real estate the same as in merchandise, and that such partnership need not be in writing, and the court upheld the plaintiff's contention.

Where land was purchased in the name of the firm and sold to a third party, the evidence showing that the parties acted together in the purchase and sale of lands, one partner acting for the firm the other expressing himself satisfied with the result of the sale, it was held there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury upon the question of partnership, and as to the consent of the parties to the sale. Bonner v. Campbell (1864) 48 Pa. 285.

In Laffan v. Naglee (1858) 9 Cal. 662, 70 Am. Dec. 678, it was held that there was no difference between a partnership in the purchase and sale of lands, and that of a joint purchase, improvement and leasing the property for profit, all the circumstances necessary to constitute a partnership existing in the latter case, where the partners contribute equal proportions of the costs and then divide the profits arising therefrom, the purposes of the arrangement being the profit to be derived from the property, and not the enjoyment or use of it by the individual partners themselves.

In Davis v. Darling (1894) 80 Hun. 299, the defendant a real estate broker and speculator in real estate, entered into partnership with the plaintiff under a written agreement which declared that the parties associated themselves as copartners in the "Regular Real Estate Insurance & Mortgage Loan Business" and the defendants claimed that the term "Regular Real Estate Business" meant the business of real estate brokers and not the business of operating or speculating in real estate, the court upholding the defendant's contention, the partnership articles further providing for a division of the "net profits arising from the said brokerage business."

Where there was no express indication of an intention to become partners, nor authority for either party without the consent of the other to sell any property or to contract any debts on behalf of both, and no stipulation as to the shares of the losses in case it proved unsuccessful, it was not construed as a partnership contract relating to real estate. Shaeffer v. Blair (1898) 149 U. S. 248, 37 L. ed. 721.

Upon the question whether or not such a partnership is within the provisions of the statute of 27 L. R. A.

XV. Real estate acquired in payment of debts.

Real estate taken for a partnership debt is to be considered as partnership property, and the legal title is held in trust for partnership purposes, and in equity is to be treated as the property of the members of the firm collectively, liable to all the equitable rights of the partners, inter se. Martin v. Wagner (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 515.

If so received under deeds in common form conveying the estate to them by their several names, it is to be considered at law as their several property as tenants in common, but subject to a trust arising by implication of law by which it is liable to be sold and the proceeds brought into the partnership fund for the payment of debts, and the settlement of balances as between the partners. Burnside v. Merriok (1848) 4 Met. 587; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 637; Moran v. Palmer (1865) 13 Mich. 577; Buchan v. Sumner (1847) 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 5 L. ed. 599, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Collumb v. Read (1862) 24 N. Y. 505.

A conveyance of real estate for the debts and benefit of a partnership should run to the individual partners jointly as tenants in common, yet if the deed has been executed in the firm name and no subsequent contract has been made, such deed will be sufficient. McMurry v. Fletcher (1880) 24 Kan. 574.

The purchase by partners of real estate, taken by them to secure a debt under foreclosure proceedings, the land being taken to them jointly without specifying their interests, vests a moiety of the legal title in each, holding in equity according to their respective interests as partners. Putnam v. Dobbins (1865) 38 Ill. 364.

The fact that a mortgage is given to a firm in its firm name does not affect its validity. Orr v. How (1874) 55 Mo. 323.

So a mortgage taken in the name of the partnership carrying on business, under an assumed name, has an actual grantee, although such grantee is merely the name and style of the partnership. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Ashworth (1881) 26 Kan. 212.

A mortgage made to J. K. S., P. W. & J. N. B., doing business under the firm name of S. W. & Co., the parties composing the members of the firm, will pass the estate to the partnership. Morrison v. Mendenhall (1872) 13 Minn. 232.

And the partners can prove that they carried on business in partnership together and were the holders of the same. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Ashworth, supra.

Under a mortgage to a firm under its name "D. B. Dormon & Co." the legal title is in D. B. Dormon, the partner named in the firm's name. Gille v. Hunt (1886) 35 Minn. 367.

Where a firm took the title to an undivided interest in land in payment of a debt, the court held on conflicting evidence that the land was taken for an investment, and that a loss upon the transac-

This was the practice in bankruptcy proceedings, and is not without precedent in other courts. See Re Bridgeman, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 813, Fed. Cas. No. 1,866; Amory v. Francis, 16 Mass. 808; Farnum v. Boutelle, 18 Met. 159; First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Eastern R. Co. 124 Mass. 524; and Bell v. Fleming, 12 N. J. Eq. 18. There was therefore no error in the pro forma decree in regard to that ruling.

In considering the question as to the right of the appellant to have the real estate treated as the individual property of the members of the firm, and not as partnership assets, we must bear in mind the fact that W. H. Hoffman was the original owner of all this property, and that while it was thus owned by him he was in partnership with his three sons, trading under the name of William H. Hoffman & Sons, being the style of the firm subsequently adopted by them. If a deed of trust similar to the one made by the sons had been made in the lifetime of the father, by the members of the original firm, it would hardly be contended that the real estate should be treated as partnership property,— tion was to be considered as a partnership loss. Daniels v. McCormick (1894) 87 Wis. 255.

So a partner, to whom real estate is conveyed in discharge of the debt of the firm holds it in trust for the partnership. Smith v. Ramsey (1844) 6 Ill. 373.

During the existence of the copartnership, and also upon its dissolution by death or otherwise. Martin v. Wagener (1878) 1 Thomp. & C. 515.

Where partners bought property upon a mortgage sale with a view to secure a debt due their firm, and also purchased other real estate upon speculation, paying for it out of partnership funds debiting it to "merchandise account" and also to pay the money upon the mortgage of the premises which was put into the same account, and failed, one of the partners dying intestate, the survivor conveying to trustees all his rights in the real estate for the benefit of the firm's creditors; foreclosures upon the mortgages being executed by the firm and carried through, a balance of the fund remaining in court, it was held that the real estate was to be considered as partnership property and the funds in court were liable for partnership purposes. Smith v. Jackson (1888) 3 Edw. Ch. 23, 6 L. ed. 265.

XVI. Real estate held under lease.

a. In general.

A lease granted to the partners for partnership purposes, and treated and considered by them as a part of their partnership stock, will be regarded as personalty. Cowden v. Cairns (1869) 28 Mo. 471.

So if a partner takes a lease of land in his own name for the purposes of the partnership, he will be considered in equity as a trustee of such lease for himself and his copartners, the lease being deemed an incident of the partnership. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin (1878) 12 Jones & S. 114, cited in Collyer, Partn. § 160.

Leaseholds conveyed by a corporation to a partner and purchased by him with partnership funds are partnership property. Ballantine v. Frelinghuysen (1894) 38 N. J. Eq. 266.

There is, however, no presumption that a leasehold, standing in the name of one of several copartners constitutes partnership assets, notwithstanding that the partnership business is carried on upon the demised premises, the legal presumption being otherwise, and it must expressly appear that such was the purpose and intent of the parties before a trust for all can be inferred. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin, supra.

If a lease is partnership property and used as such, it will, though made by one partner in his own name, inure for the benefit of the firm, the partners being agents of each other in partnership transactions. Moderwell v. Mullison (1853) 21 Fa. 237.

Yet a lease made to the lessees in their individual names is to be regarded at law according to the legal title, and prima facie they hold as tenants in common. Cowden v. Cairns, supra.

Where a lease is partnership property the goodwill of the business enters into the value of the lease and affects the amount of the purchase price. Mitchell v. Read (1881) 84 N. Y. 564.

The sealed lease of partnership real estate executed by one partner only, in the name of the firm, without evidence of prior authority, or of the subsequent ratification of the lease by the other partners, will not pass the estate of the other partners. Dillon v. Brown (1858) 11 Gray, 170, 71 Am. Dec. 700.

Leasehold property, the principal value of which consists in the white lead manufactory, with the steam engine, machinery, and other fixtures with which persons conduct their business together, is subject in equity to the incidents of the personal property of the partnership. Day v. Perkins (1845) 2 Sandf. Ch. 359, 7 L. ed. 625.

So leasehold property purchased with partnership funds, a deed of trust being executed, under which it was sold upon the death of one partner, is partnership property which the survivor is entitled to administer after payment of the debt. Carlisle v. Mulhern (1853) 19 Mo. 54.

In Kyle v. Roberts (1855) 6 Leigh, 495, a partner took a lease in the partnership name by deed, signed and sealed by him in the firm name without authority, the premises being used and occupied by the firm, the rent credited to the lessor on the firm's books. Upon the death of the partner taking such lease, the survivors abandoned the premises. The lessor proceeded in chancery against the survivors and the administratrix of the deceased partner, for specific performance of the lease, producing the deed executed by the partner as evidence. It was held that he was entitled to equitable relief; that the fact that the deed was executed by the partner alone in the firm name ratified by the firm who took the benefits of the lease, was sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to an execution of the agreement to fulfillment of its terms, the agreement being sufficient evidence within the statute of frauds.

Where by the terms of the partnership deed a lease was to be used and occupied by the partners during the partnership only, it was held that upon the termination of the partnership there was an end of the tenancy, and that no notice to quit was necessary prior to bringing an action of ejectment to recover possession. Doe v. Miles (1816) 1 Stark. 181, 4 Campb. 373.

Where two persons take a lease of a farm jointly, the lease survives. Jeffereys v. Small (1688) 1 Vern. 217.

b. The question of renewal.

While one of several copartners may not, during the existence of a continuing partnership of undetermined duration, secure to his individual use and benefit, without the knowledge of the others, the renewal or continuance of a lease of premises held and used by the firm, yet no principle of law or equity precludes partners from severally taking title to land, either in fee or for a term of years, in respect to which no fiduciary relation between certainly not as against the individual creditors of William H. Hoffman. By his last will and testament, the senior Hoffman charged an annuity upon the Gunpowder Mill property, for the purpose of keeping a burying ground, etc., in proper condition, and made certain provisions for his wife. He directed his executors to ascertain the value of the rest of his property, and gave it—with the exception of one twentieth thereof, left to Peter Vondersmith, his son-in-law—to his three sons and his daughter, Lydia A. Smyser, to be divided between them equally, share and share alike. He directed that in the division his son John W. Hoffman should have the property known as the "Gunpowder Mill," chargeable with the annuity aforesaid, together with certain water rights and 400 acres of land connected therewith, known as "Paper Mill Hills;" also a part of the tract of the land known as "Laurel Hills," 100 yards wide on each side of a stream. He also directed that in the distribution his son George W. S. Hoffman was to have the Marble Vale Mill property, containing 218 acres, and his son William E. Hoffman was them exists, and neither nor any of them can claim the right to share with the other or others in the benefits to be derived from the purchase or tenancy of such land. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin (1878) 12 Jones & S. 116.

The doctrine that a trustee cannot obtain an advantage over his cestui que trust applies to the case of a partnership, and upon this ground it is held that a partner cannot obtain the renewal of a partnership lease for his own purposes to commence after the expiration of the original lease, or indeed after the termination of the partnership. Mitchell v. Read (1872) 61 Barb. 310; Leach v. Leach (1836) 18 Pick. 68; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick (1810) 17 Ves. Jr. 290; Clegg v. Edmondson (1859) 8 DeG. M. & G. 787; Clements v. Hall (1858) 2 De G. & J. 173; Clegg v. Fishwick (1849) 1 Macn. & G. 294, 1 Hall & T. 396, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 49, 18 Jur. 993; Struthers v. Pearce (1873) 51 N. Y. 857.

Yet it is difficult, especially in the case of a managing partner, to make out such a case, and the mere intimation of an intention to apply for such a lease after a dissolution is not sufficient to exclude the interest of the partners, although the partnership is at will. Clegg v. Edmondson, supra.

An administratrix of a deceased partner may be entitled to a receiver in respect to an intestate's share of partnership estate, including renewed leases. Clegg v. Fishwick, supra.

Where a lease to a partnership is during the partnership term, renewed in the name of one or more partners, it still continues partnership property, and upon dissolution must be valued as such. Struthers v. Pearce, supra.

If the renewal of such a lease is secret in one partner's own name, he holds as a trustee for the firm. Mitchell v. Reed (1874) 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 252; Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, supra.

A partner taking a renewed lease in his own name, when the right of the renewal belonged to the firm, being compelled to account for its value. Betts v. June (1873) 51 N. Y. 274.

Even though the consideration for the new lease is the covenant of the partner obtaining it. Johnson's App. (1887) 115 Pa. 120; Lacy v. Hall (1861) 37 Pa. 360.

His relation being such as to forbid his treating it for his own individual benefit. Ibid.

And in such cases it is not material that the landlord would not have granted a new lease to the other partners, or to the firm. Mitchell v. Read (1872) 61 Barb. 310.

The renewed lease is in equity considered as a mere continuance of the original subject to the additional charges upon the renewal, for the purpose of protecting the equitable rights of all parties who have any interest, either legal or equitable, in the old lease. Ibid.; Phyfe v. Wardell (1835) 5 Paige, 268, 8 L. ed. 714, 28 Am. Dec. 430; Gibbes v. Jenkins (1845) 8 Sandf. Ch. 131, 7 L. ed. 793.

Common justice and a due regard to the rules of public policy demand that the renewed lease should in such cases be declared to belong to the firm, and that the partner so taking it should be required to account for his portion of its value. Mitchell v. Read, supra.

A new lease taken by a partner in his own name of the business premises of the firm for a term extending beyond the limitation of the partnership will inure for the firm's benefit and such lessee will be held to account for the profits arising from such lease. Leach v. Leach (1836) 18 Pick. 68.

Where a firm holding leases of the premises in part of which the business was done was dissolved and subsequently the partners agreed to carry on the liquidation of the business together upon the premises occupied by the firm, when the defendant and his son with the knowledge of the circumstances procured new leases for the premises, the interest of the partners in the lease was held to form part of the good-will of the business, and as such to form part of the partnership assets, the power of renewal remaining with the firm as part of the good-will, the firm still retaining their joint control over such lease. Spies v. Rosswog (1882) 68 How. Pr. 401.

So the rule is not changed by the fact that the renewal was obtained after the dissolution of the partnership. Johnson's App. (1887) 115 Pa. 129, following Spies v. Rosswog (1884) 96 N. Y. 651.

The right to the renewal of a lease after the determination of a partnership not being an estate but a right, the subject of grant before entry, and where it is shown that if the partnership had acquired this inter esse termini, it might have been disposed of for a large sum of money, such partnership will be entitled thereto and one partner cannot take advantage of it. Mitchell v. Read (1872) 61 Barb. 310.

Where negotiations for the renewal of a partnership lease were pending at the time of the dissolution of the partnership, it was held that one partner might make the lease for his own benefit. Chittenden v. Witbeck (1888) 60 Mich. 401.

XVII. The effect of improvements.

Where money of the firm has been expended in the improvement of real estate purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, it will be treated as partnership property and liable as such to the partnership debts. Hiscock v. Phelps (1872) 49 N. Y. 97.

Improvements made, even on lands owned by one partner, if made with partnership funds, or for the purposes of the partnership, are to be treated as the personal property of the firm. Grisom v. Moore (1886) 106 Ind. 296, 55 Am. Rep. 742; Lane v. Tyler (1861) 49 Me. 252; Averill v. Loucks (1849) 6 Barb. 19.

And especially is this so when the improvements exceed the value of the land, the property being in such a case considered as that of the firm. Lyman v. Lyman (1829) 2 Paine, C. C. 11.

The fact that each partner contributed distinct portions of the improvements makes no difference, to have his Clipper Mill, together with a tract of land called "Gristmill Hills," containing 257 acres; also a tract called "Addition to Grant Mill Hills," containing 7½ acres, and some houses named by him. He provided that the property thus given to his three sons should be taken by them in the distribution at the prices or values fixed by the appraisers, as provided for in his will, and then directed that "all the rest of my property and estate, not hereinbefore devised or specially distributed, . . . shall be sold or disposed of by my said executors, . . . and the proceeds of such sale or sales be so distributed among my said four children as to make the share of each, under these provisions of my will, equal the one to the other." Subsequently, his son-in-law and his daughter conveyed their respective interests to the three sons, "as individuals." It is admitted in the agreed statement of facts that after the father died the three sons continued to trade under the firm name of William H. Hoffman & Sons, and opened on their firm books an account headed "Real Estate," in which they entered all the property so as when brought together they constitute partnership property. Grisson v. Moore (1886) supra.

Improvements made by the erection of a store with partnership funds upon real estate of which the partners were seised as tenants in common, are regarded as partnership property, though the land be owned by one partner alone. Land v. Tyler, and Averill & Loucks, supra; Deming v. Colt (1850) 3 Sandf. 284; King v. Wilcomb (1849) 7 Barb. 203.

Even though made without authority, upon property owned by a deceased and another partner, used in the copartnership business, it ratified by the other partners. Beck v. Thompson (Nev.) May 7, 1894.

Improvements made in partnership real estate of a permanent character, for the purpose of increasing its capacity, add to its permanent value, and must therefore be regarded as capital, and cannot be taken into consideration in estimating the profits of the business. Braun's App. (1884) 105 Pa. 414.

The use by a firm of firm moneys in the improvement of real estate owned by the partners prior to the partnership, separately and as tenants in common, will not be held to be a fraud in law upon the partnership creditors in the absence of facts showing actual fraud. Parker v. Bowles (1876) 57 N. H. 491.

Improvements made with partnership funds on the real estate of one partner, come pro tanto within the same principle. Deveney v. Mohoney (1872) 23 N. J. Eq. 247.

A purchase by the financial partner of a concern, for the purpose of promoting the firm business, of real estate improved with partnership money, is firm property, even though the purchase be taken in the partner's own name out of funds kept by him separate and distinct from the firm's. Lacy v. Hall (1861) 37 Pa. 360.

But permanent improvements erected upon real estate, the property of one member of a partnership, although such property is used as the business premises of the firm, will be presumed to be the individual property of the partner, in the absence of evidence showing that they are made by the firm and paid for out of the firm assets, or contributed by such partner as part of the firm capital. Goepfer v. Kinsinger (1883) 30 Ohio St. 429.

Improvements made by being placed upon land by the partnership, the parties being engaged in the raising of stock upon state lands, which during the partnership were purchased by one member in his own name and with his own money, are not sufficient to raise a trust in favor of the partnership where there is an understanding between the partners that each shall secure and own his own land, the improvements all resting upon the surface. Burgess v. Rice (1888) 74 Cal. 560.

So circumstances showing a sale of an undivided half of real estate by the sole owner in contemplation of a partnership the consideration moving from such partner individually, the partnership being formed at the same time the property being subsequently improved for partnership purposes, 27 L. R. A.

are not sufficient alone to change the state of their respective titles, nor the nature of their tenancy, the deed of conveyance constituting them tenants in common, which they remain, notwithstanding the copartnership and the improvements of the property, for its use and accommodation. Frink v. Branch (1844) 16 Conn. 320.

In the above case the deed had been taken by the partner in his own name and for his own use, without any intimation that a copartnership had been formed, or was even contemplated; the property was not purchased with common funds, or with common capital withdrawn from the power of creditors to make the purchase, nor was there any agreement that such property should become partnership stock, or constitute any part of capital, the only agreement being by parol that the property should be improved in the prosecution of the company's business, for temporary use only. Ibid.

Where valuable improvements have been made upon property leased to a partnership, one of the partners cannot, during the existence of the firm, obtain a renewal of the lease for his own benefit, without the knowledge and consent of his copartners, even though such renewed lease does not commence to run until after the expiration of the partnership. Mitchell v. Reed (1874) 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 253; Mitchell v. Reed (1874) 61 Barb. 310, reversed.

In Lake v. Craddock (1782) 3 P. Wms. 153, partners purchasing as joint tenants, and contributing ratably to the purchase which was for the purposes of improvement, were treated as tenants in common in equity, and though one of the partners absented himself for thirty years he was afterwards let in upon terms.

XVIII. Lands owned by partner prior to partnership.

Individual real property brought into the partnership by the partners at the time of its formation, or afterwards, and by proper agreement of the partners converted into partnership property and appropriated to its uses, becomes a portion of the capital stock of the firm and is treated in equity as personalty, although standing in the name of an individual partner. Hogle v. Lowe (1877) 12 Nev. 238, following Hoxie v. Carr (1832) 1 Sumn. 180; Duryea v. Burt (1855) 28 Cal. 588; Sigourney v. Munn (1823) 7 Conn. 11; Frink v. Branch (1844) 16 Conn. 320; Markham v. Merrett (1843) 7 How. (Miss.) 444, 40 Am. Dec. 78.

Land used in the adopting of a partnership business, held by the partners as tenants in common, prior to and at the time of the formation of the partnership, will continue to retain that character, unless the same be altered by some express contract or agreement of the parties. Robertson v. Baker (1866-7) 11 Fla. 192.

Whether real estate owned by one or more members of the firm at the time of its organization, and which is to be used by the firm thereafter, becomes partnership property for all purposes, derived by them, and continued the same on their books in that way; "that, between the said three sons, all the said real estate was always considered, in their business, as co-partnership property, and was treated between themselves as such, but that the title to the same appeared in the land records of Baltimore county and in the office of the register of wills of Baltimore county as having been derived by them under the will of their said father and the conveyances of said Vondersmith and Smyser, as has been hereinafore stated, and no conveyance was made by them to the said partnership."

depends mainly upon the question whether the person bringing the property into the firm contributes it to the firm as his part of the joint stock and has credit with the firm for the value thereof as the whole or a part of his contribution to such stock. Riedeburg v. Schmitt (1888) 71 Wis. 644.

Where buildings and improvements were erected upon land belonging to one partner prior to the partnership, by reason of partnership funds, and such improvements greatly exceeded the value of the land itself, and the proceeds of its sale were applied to the firm uses, it was held that the whole was partnership property. Lyman v. Lyman (1829) 2 Paige, C. C. 11.

A partnership occupying individual real estate and setting up trade fixtures in it, upon the occupation ceasing has the right to remove the fixtures in the same way that the tenant would have under similar circumstances. Robertson v. Corsett (1878) 89 Mich. 777.

In land purchased by partners with their individual funds a partner holds only such an interest as arises from the fact that it is individual property. Stadler v. Allen (1876) 44 Iowa, 198.

XIX. Position of incoming partner.

In the case of a new partner being admitted into a firm already in possession of real estate purchased for partnership purposes and appropriated thereto, such real estate is partnership property, and the partner by acquiring an interest in the partnership by verbal contract, and acting under such contract as one of the partners with the consent of all, is not to be deprived of his interest in the partnership, either as to the personal or real estate, by reason of the statute of frauds. Marsh v. Davis (1885) 83 Kan. 828.

Such partner having paid his share upon the basis that it belongs to the firm is entitled to an interest therein to the extent of his share. Gordon v. Scott (1858) 12 Moore, P. C. C. L.

Land credited to a firm, upon its dissolution, in the books of the new firm, with the knowledge of the partner holding the legal title, is treated in equity as partnership property of the new firm. Bergeron v. Richardott (1882) 55 Wis. 129.

Where a partner purchases an interest in real estate, and in a business carried on thereon, there being a prior mortgage upon the real estate which was to be removed by the owners, and also a mechanic's lien of which such partner had no notice, such real estate is partnership property, and in such a case the incoming partner will be entitled, as a creditor of the firm, to reimbursements out of the joint fund to the exclusion of the separate creditors, so far as such liens have been satisfied from the real estate, or firm property. Bainey v. Nance (1870) 54 Ill. 29.

Where parties purchased real estate out of their partnership assets, which was used for partnership purposes and was in equity to be considered as personalty, a new partnership being formed, and the real estate continued to be used for the partner-

It must be conceded that there is nothing on the face of the will that would indicate any intention of the testator to vest the property in his three sons, as partners; but, on the contrary, it is apparent that he intended them to own individually certain properties, which he directed to be given them as above stated. The property was, at the time the partnership was formed, the individual property of the three members. So far as the record discloses, nothing has since been done to transfer the property to the firm, or vest any interest in it, excepting the entries in the books, and the fact that the real estate ship purposes, the old partners stipulating for a rent to be paid by the new partnership, it was held upon the death of one of the old partners, that the property was in equity to be considered as part of the real estate. Rowley v. Adams (1844) 7 Beav. 548 8 Jur. 994.

XX. Facts and circumstances held sufficient to constitute real estate partnership property.

The general principles as above laid down have been applied by the courts of the various states to the circumstances as illustrated in the cases following.

A purchase by one partner of the fee in leasehold property held in partnership in his own name, with his own money, will be construed as for the benefit of the partners equally, and the other partners will become entitled to their proportions on payment of their share of the purchase money, the relationship between the partners being one of confidence, and any waiver of the right must be clearly established. Laffan v. Naglee (1868) 9 Cal. 682, 70 Am. Dec. 678.

Real estate conveyed so as to make the partners tenants in common, in the absence of express agreement or circumstances showing an intention to hold it for the partner's support, will be considered in equity as vested in the partners in their partnership capacity. Louhat v. Nourse (1868) 5 Fla. 850.

An agreement between parties that a certain business, in which real estate belonging to one of them is used and is denominated "a lease" the fruit accruing therefrom being styled "rent," will constitute them partners if such fruit comes "only" from the "net profits" and is not to exceed a given proportion. Dalton City Co. v. Dalton Mfg. Co. (1882) 83 Ga. 243.

So where under verbal agreement of partnership, land is purchased for mill purposes and conveyed to them in their several names, each holding the legal title to an undivided one fourth, the land with the improvements made thereon is partnership property, the money paid being partnership money and the purchase for partnership purposes. Bopp v. Fox (1872) 63 Ill. 544; Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 697; Howard v. Priest (1843) 5 Met. 582.

And a purchase of real estate for the erection of business premises under a verbal agreement for a partnership, the same being conveyed to them in their several names, written articles being subsequently entered into, the costs of the erection of the building being paid by each progressively, will inure for the partnership estate. Bopp v. Fox, supra.

So again where one partner contributes a building together with the machinery therein to the capital stock, the others contributing specified sums of money, interest being paid by them on the excess of capital put in by such partner, each has a joint ownership in such building and machinery; and a provision that "losses in all business trans-was considered in the business as copartner-ship property, and so treated between the members, as above stated. We are therefore met with the inquiry whether that is sufficient to authorize a court of equity to treat the proceeds of sale as partnership assets, when called upon to decide between the creditors of the firm and those of the individual members. If this property had been purchased with partnership funds, for the use and on account of the firm, it would be immaterial that the title stood in the name of the individual members, as a court of equity would treat it, for all the purposes of the partnership, as firm property; and hence it would be liable to the partnership creditors, to the exclusion of the individual creditors, until the former are satisfied. In that case there would be an implied or constructive trust in favor of the partners, as such, which would inure to the benefit of the creditors of the firm. But, when it has been acquired in the manner above stated, the question arises whether those dealing with the members of the firm have not the right, in the absence of some notice or knowledge to the actions during the said partnership" shall be borne in such proportions has no effect upon the rule. Taft v. Schwamb (1875) 80 Ill. 239.

Against the purchase of land by partners in a common enterprise, in the name of one of them as an article of commerce, and not as land for the purposes of speculation, the fact that they share in contributing the purchase money and agree to share in the profits, stamps the transaction as a partnership with some of the incidents and obligations growing out of that relation. Boone v. Clark (1890) 5 L. R. A. 279, 129 Ill. 466.

Where property, although not acquired with partnership funds, is purchased with a view to the formation of a partnership, and brought into the firm and used for that purpose, the clear deduction from the nature of the partnership as well as from the conduct of the partners, being that they intended such property should belong to the firm, it will so belong when it appears that the business cannot progress without it, and that the partnership assets are used in defraying the expenses of its repairs, improvements, and protection. Roberts v. McCarty (1857) 9 Ind. 16, 68 Am. Dec. 604.

Real estate which is almost the sole property of the firm, and necessary for its business, the taxes of which are paid by the firm, each partner having contributed half the money going into the firm, of which property the firm has sole possession and use for its business purposes, repairing it when required and improving it, will be considered firm property no matter how acquired. Boober v. Per-rill (Ind.) March 13, 1896, following Roberts v. McCarty, supra.

So where real estate purchased by partners with partnership funds, and on joint account is placed upon the firm books as partnership property and treated as assets of the firm upon its dissolution by the death of one partner, the other having contributed his whole share of the purchase money, although the title is taken in the deceased's name, the surviving partner has an equal equitable interest therein of such a character as can be enforced in a proper proceeding in the courts. Johnson v. Clark (1877) 18 Kan. 157.

In the case of a joint purchase of property, each paying an equal proportion of the purchase money, except a certain amount for which the partners' notes are given, one partner giving the note as security, the notes being subsequently paid in part by the firm and the residue by such partner, a conveyance being taken to them jointly; the property is purchased with a view to constituting it joint stock of the firm, and it is to be so considered and held. Divine v. Mitohum (1844) 4 B. Mon. 438, 41 Am. Dec. 241.

Also where one partner in the possession of partnership funds contracts for the purchase of real estate beyond the extent of such funds, giving his note as security for the balance, inducing the vendor to believe that the same would be paid by his copartner along with himself and that the purchase is for partnership purposes, that the seller was referred to such deceased partner for the payment of the balance, together with the assent of the deceased partner to become a partner by reason of his paying the same in discharge of the note, a partnership is constituted. Hart v. Hawkins (1814) 3 Bibb, 502, 6 Am. Dec. 664.

And where the primary object of the purchase is the erection of a storehouse, and to sell or improve and rent so much of the lands as is not required therefor, the parties previously being partners together, by the purchase they become partners in the whole of the real estate and the property being bought with partnership funds for the purpose of division and resale on joint account,—such a joint venture may constitute a partnership and convert the realty into personalty. Holmes v. Self (1831) 79 Ky. 297, following Lowe v. Lowe (1878) 13 Bush, 688; Darby v. Darby (1856) 8 Drew. 495, 2 Jur. N. S. 271, 25 L. J. Ch. 371, 4 Week. Rep. 413.

Evidence showing that real estate purchased at a commissioner's sale is purchased for the firm for use in its business, the purchase being taken in the name of one person as principal, the other one joining in the purchase money bonds and surety, not for the purpose of vesting the title to the property in the one partner individually, but as a matter of convenience to avoid calling in outsiders to give security, proves it is partnership property. Seller v. Brenner (Ky.) March 22, 1887.

Facts showing that when the parties moved to such estate a written agreement existed between them that they were to own it equally, which agreement was taken to the clerk's office and there left and placed in the care of the deceased partner, who was afraid that it would be in the way of a sale of a portion of the farm if needed; there being repeated declarations by the deceased that the parties are equally interested and that the legal title was left in the one party for convenience,—constitute such land partnership property, the fact that the surviving partner qualifies as administrator not affecting the case. Lucas v. Cooper (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 642.

So where a party, having entered into a contract for the purchase of real estate, agrees to sell it, receiving money in part payment, the purchaser taking possession, repairing and improving the same and carrying on business thereon for a short time, when subsequently the vendor joins him in partnership under a verbal agreement; the property being taxed to the company and the taxes paid out of its funds, the purchase money originally owing by the vendor being paid out of partnership funds; the parties afterwards agreeing to a dissolution; the vendor of the property taking a conveyance to himself; discharging his original bond upon the property to the exclusion of his partner, mortgaging the property to secure partnership debts and his own; the evidence showing that the original contract between the partners for the sale and purchase of the property is abandoned by mutual consent, and an agreement substituted to treat the property as partnership,—the statute of frauds does not prevent equities arising from the attachment of such partnership property, which is contrary, to assume that the public records inform them correctly as to the ownership of the property, notwithstanding the private understanding between the partners themselves. Creditors have sometimes suffered great hardships by courts of equity declaring property standing in the name of one person to be in trust for the benefit of others; but such decisions are rendered to prevent injustice being done those whose money purchased the property, and relief is only granted to them when their claims are established by clear, direct, and explicit proof.

This court has said, "This strictness of proof is required because of the danger of rendering titles depending upon deeds and other written documents insecure." Witts v. Horney, 59 Md. 587. The same reasoning applies to real estate held of record by members of a firm as tenants in common. When it is sought to change such property from individual to partnership property, the record evidence all pointing to it being the former, a court of equity should not act upon doubtful proof, particularly when the rights of strangers or third parties are to be af-liable for the partnership debts and the balance due between the parties, and the legal title cannot be interfered with except for partnership purposes. Collins v. Decker (1879) 70 Me. 23.

And where property bought and held under an arrangement between the parties to share the profit and loss, is sold and mortgages taken back by one partner to secure the whole or portions of the purchase money, such mortgages constitute part of the trust or partnership fund and must be deemed part of the trust property of the partnership. Montague v. Hayes (1858) 10 Gray, 609.

The fact that real estate required for the purposes of the business is purchased and paid for in part out of the joint funds, notes being given in the partnership name for the balance of the purchase money, the estate being regarded as partnership effects, the repairs and improvements being charged to the joint account, are indications of joint property and that the real estate is a part of the capital stock of the firm. Dyer v. Clark (1843) 5 Met. 532, 39 Am. Dec. 697.

A verbal understanding between two parties, at the time of the purchase of real property, that the profit and loss shall be divided after deducting interest, together with a letter to an attorney stating: "We have purchased an estate . . . which has by mutual consent been conveyed to me. I have paid and secured the purchase money. Whatever disposition is made of the property, the profit and loss is to be divided between us deducting interest. You will please make such papers as are necessary to carry this agreement into effect;" and the fact that the partner afterward with the consent of the plaintiff expends money upon the estate and sells it in separate lots,—create a contract between them either in the nature of a trust or a partnership, the letter acted upon by the parties being a sufficient memorandum in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds. Montague v. Hays, supra.

Evidence of a partnership in land consisting in the books of account, the schedules of partnership property made by the partners themselves, or by their direction, and other written memoranda and partnership transactions, is sufficient to create a partnership and trust in such land sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds. Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden (1852) 10 Cush. 453.

Where real estate stands in the name of one partner, but by written articles of copartnership the other is charged on the books of the partnership with one half of the costs, and upon the books the first partner is credited with the agreed value of the property, the estate becomes part of the capital of the firm, even though the legal title is in the partner only. Collins v. Charlestown Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1867) 10 Gray, 155.

In Converse v. Citizens Mut. Ins. Co. (1852) 10 Cush. 87, the question of partnership in real estate arose upon the contention as to whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest in property destroyed by fire the facts showing that plaintiff and his father transacted the business jointly as, inter alia, the holders of real estate, such estate standing in the name of the father, their entire earnings being put into a common stock, the building in question being purchased out of the common stock and removed on to the father's land, and partly occupied by him and part let to a tenant by the joint act of father and son, the property being purchased and fitted up out of the joint stock, the rent going into the common fund and constituting part of the joint property. It was held a partnership was constituted and an insurable interest created in such partner.

Where lands are conveyed in trust for the stockholders of the company according to the articles of association executed by the vendor, whose heirs quitclaim the lands to the plaintiff who brings ejectment for their possession, upon the ground that the deed of trust is absolutely null and void as not complying with the statute of uses and trusts, the facts showing articles of association designed to create a joint-stock arrangement to be subsequently incorporated, but in the meantime partnership being constituted with managing trustees, naming such trustees and several others as partners or stockholders entitled to their shares on certain contributions or payments, the articles pointing out the mode of managing the business and the rights, powers, and duties of those concerned,—in such a case, for all purposes, the transaction is neither more nor less than a sale to a partnership, some of the partners in which are named and the rest are to be determined by admission in the future, and is in no way beyond that which would exist in all partnerships, when all, or where select partners, of the firm may act in a fiduciary relation with their associates. Turner v. Ontonagon River Imp. Co. (1899) 77 Mich. 603.

So in a suit brought by a surviving partner against the administrator and heirs-at-law of his deceased partner, with respect to certain lands claimed to be partnership property, facts showing a purchase in the name of the parties individually; entry in the firm's books of the transactions in like manner as other partnership transactions, the expenses of a journey respecting the same being credited to the deceased partner, with evidence showing sufficient intention to treat the same as partnership property, notwithstanding a statement made by the surviving partner that the deceased's share in the land was one third,—such statement coupled with a statement made as to the interest of the partner in the business, showing no intention to withdraw such land from the rights of the firm creditors. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 17, 1894.

Parties purchasing land and giving their joint and several notes for the purchase money, the title vesting in them jointly; separate portions of the land being cultivated by each, under an agreement that the net earnings are to be applied for the payment of the purchase money, an interest in the land in proportion to the amount paid to become vested in each party, the organization styling themselves by the name of the "Bear Camp Colony" with a president,—such organization confect. The public records will be of but little avail, if the private books and intentions of partners are to entirely control and determine the character of ownership of real estate. If property is purchased with partnership funds, and conveyed to one or more of the partners, as individuals, the entries of the firm books would have great—possibly controlling—weight as to whether it should be treated as partnership or individual property; but courts should require more than private entries and understandings between partners, to overcome the public records, in cases such as this. No one would suppose, from reading the will of William H. Hoffman, that the property belonged to the partnership. Persons dealing with the individual members would be led to believe, from that will, that they owned the property individually; and, inasmuch as it was once the separate property of the members, we are not prepared to break down all the safeguards and protection intended by our registry acts, by announcing as the law of this state that partners can so change the character of real estate, originally owned by stitutes them partners and not tenants in common, and therefore homestead exemptions do not apply to the case of a debt contracted by them for such joint benefit, nor to the security given by them therefor. Hamilton v. Halpin (1890) 68 Miss. 99.

A lease granted of a plot of land with a sulphur spring thereon, with an agreement that the lessor is to make certain improvements therein, the lessee to live upon the premises, erect buildings, furnish the same and care for and manage the place as a health resort for their profit, the lessor receiving half of the net profits after deducting expenses and losses, constitutes a partnership between the parties so as to render the lessor liable to a party fitting up the buildings. Brownlee v. Allen (1855) 21 Mo. 123.

Facts showing the pooling of interests in the property upon certain conditions, for the purpose of development and sale and division of the proceeds to the respective interests of the parties, to which end the plaintiff conveyed to defendant an undivided one-third interest to secure the necessary development of the property, and to engage his efforts in negotiating a sale, the defendant agreeing to develop and to consummate a sale for their mutual advantage, under the express agreement that defendant would bear all expense of development and of negotiating the sale, in consideration of the right to retain two thirds of the proceeds derived therefrom, and to account and pay over to plaintiff one third of the gross proceeds derived from the sale, constitute a partnership relation in respect to the property and the enterprise of which it is the subject. McIntosh v. Perkins (1898) 13 Mont. 143.

Property purchased by one partner with the money of the firm, and held by such partner and his wife, is partnership assets and should be applied in discharge of the firm liabilities, upon the ground that the partners hold to each other the relation of trustee and cestus que trust, and the fact that a trustee invests trust property, or that which it represents, in the name of his wife, gives her no right to the property as against the cestus que trust. Partridge v. Wells (1878) 30 N. J. Eq. 176.

Where a testator, a man of means, and his son entered into copartnership as general real estate dealers and agents, two equal undivided thirds of a tract of land being conveyed to the father and son as tenants in common, the deed indicating nothing showing a partnership, the same, however, being paid for with partnership moneys, the son in the firm books charging one half the costs to his father, the other to himself, no prior account existing in their books with "real estate," a subsequent account with real estate being opened charging all costs of recent purchases, and also two thirds of the property in question, each partner being credited in the ledger with one half of its value, the property being subsequently improved at the expense of the partnership, the rents being accounted for in the partnership and the taxes, repairs, and improvements paid for out of partnership funds, a partnership exists as to such property. Harney v. First Nat. Bank of Jersey City (N. J.) May 15, 1894, following Baldwin v. Johnson (1831) 1 N. J. Eq. 441.

So where the complainant's intestate and the defendant owners in equal shares of real estate agreed that the property should during the joint lives of them and of the widow of the testator, be considered and conducted by them as partnership property, bound for the support of the widow during her life, to contribute jointly to the support of the widow and to the expense of managing the property, and the payment of taxes, keeping an account of the proceeds of the sale of the produce of the property, and of the money required to be expended in the support, the money allowed or advanced to the widow by either, being credited in the partnership accounts, and that on the death of any one of the three there should be an account, the agreement, although by parol, constitutes a partnership and the agreement is not within the statute of frauds. Personette v. Pryme (1881) 84 N. J. Eq. 23.

And evidence showing that the copartnership funds have been used for real estate occupied and enjoyed by the copartnership, and in payment of all expenses incident to its ownership including annual taxes, charges for alteration, improvements, and repairs, a large portion of the property being actually occupied by the firm in its business, sufficiently shows that such property is that of the copartnership. Tarbell v. Bradley (1878) 7 Abb. N. C. 379, affirmed Tarbell v. West (1881) 86 N. Y. 230.

In an action to set aside two deeds of land, upon the ground that it was purchased with the funds of a copartnership composed of the plaintiff and defendant, evidence showing the plaintiff and defendant to be entitled to the net profits of the partnership business carried on by them, and the purchase of the land out of such profits, sufficiently shows that the land is subject to the partnership agreement. Maloy v. Associated Lace Makers Co. (1890) 30 N. Y. S. R. 153.

Where a bond and mortgage executed by three persons on leasehold property, the principal value of which was in a white lead manufactory with steam engine, machinery and other fixtures with which the mortgagors conducted the business together, the premises being insured in the name of two of them; the three depositing the bond and mortgage with the mortgagee for the purpose of raising money on their behalf; such mortgagees giving no consideration but some time afterwards delivering the documents to another as security for a loan of stocks made to him thereon, such stocks not being replaced when due; the two partners assigning the policy of insurance upon request, the nature of the property and the business conducted, and the joint interest of the mortgagors, make them partners. Day v. Perkins (1845) 3 Sandf. Ch. 369, 7 L. ed. 623.

Real estate which, although recorded in the individual names of three members of the partnership firm, is purchased by moneys of the copartnership and charged upon the firm books, occupied them as individuals, and not in any way derived from the partnership, as to give priority to firm creditors over their separate creditors, simply by making entries in their books, and treating it between themselves as partnership property, without giving some notice, or doing some acts equivalent to notice, to their individual creditors. The agreed statement of facts does not show that the appellant had notice of any facts that should have put its officers on inquiry. The statement is not as full as it might have been. It does not even show what business the firm was engaged in. But from the arguments, and what we gather from the record, we assume that they were manufacturing paper. Nor is it definitely stated whether the business was conducted in one or more paper mills, although it is shown that William H. Hoffman died owning real estate consisting of three paper mills, farm lands, etc. It would certainly have been much more satisfactory if the facts had been fully set out, so as to enable the court to understand the exact character and extent of the use of the real estate by the firm. But it is by the firm for the purposes of the business, the expenses of maintaining it being paid by the partnership who kept it insured and entered it as part of the copartnership assets, is treated in every way as partnership property and is to be considered as such. Dawson v. Parsons (1894) 10 Misc. 428.

Where, previous to the final consummation of a partnership arrangement, the defendant purchased lands, afterwards selected as the place of the copartnership business, a certain number of the lots being conveyed to the plaintiff and the other lots to the defendants, part of the capital paid in being applied in payment of the real estate and in the erection of buildings thereon for business purposes, such lands formed part of the partnership estate. Smith v. Danvers (1852) 5 Sandf. 609.

So a contract entered into by one partner for the purchase of land, with a subsequent agreement that the purchase shall be made for the joint benefit of himself and two others, one of whom contributed half and each of the others a quarter of the purchase money, with the understanding that the title should be taken in the name of the one partner with power to mortgage it, the parties paying their proportion of part of their interest on the mortgage, constitutes them partners in the real estate purchased. Williams v. Gillies (1876) 53 How. Pr. 429.

The case of Smith v. Jackson (1833) 2 Edw. Ch. 34, 4 L. ed. 296, was considered in the case of Dawson v. Parsons, supra, as no longer authority in the state of New York, in so far as it held that real estate could only become partnership property by some express agreement between the partners, and that the mere purchasing thereof with joint funds and taking title in their joint names was not enough, the court holding that the purchase with partnership funds and its use for partnership purposes being treated by the members of the copartnership as partnership property, together with the manner in which the accounts are kept, whether the purchase money is severally charged to the members of the firm or whether the account treated it the same as other firm property as to purchase money, incoming expenses, etc., are controlling circumstances in determining such intention, from which an agreement may be inferred. Dawson v. Parsons (1894) 10 Misc. 428.

An agreement at the time of sale of a half interest in a grist mill for a partnership in the mill entered into for the purpose of running it, another partner being subsequently taken in who purchased one third of the mill, upon an agreement that the repairs were to be made at the expense of the firm; the purchase money owing by the two partners to be paid for out of their shares of the profits,—makes the mill partnership property liable to the creditors of the firm. Parker v. Parker (1878) 66 Barb. 205.

A deed in ordinary form of bargain and sale, naming four grantees and describing them as composing a firm of "G. F. & Co.," G. being a member of the firm at the date of the execution of the deed, the partnership not being evidenced by writing, takes effect according to its terms, nor is it material that the lot is paid for with partnership funds and used for partnership purposes, the legal title to an undivided fourth passing to him incumbered only by an equitable lien in favor of the other partners, the deed not being void under the statute of frauds. Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 160, 8 Am. Dec. 281.

And where the grantees formed a partnership prior to the execution of the conveyance agreeing upon the capital, and the proportion thereof to be paid in by each partner, and the amount to be applied to the purchase of partnership real estate, and in its improvement, and in the supply of machinery; real estate purchased pursuant to the agreement, a mortgage being taken to secure a portion of the purchase money, and possession taken of the premises as partners and money actually expended in its improvement, the copartners contributing to the same, constitutes such property in equity that of partnership property. Hiscock v. Phelps (1872) 49 N. Y. 97.

Parties agreeing to purchase land for the purpose of erecting a mill thereon, one partner doing the work, the other finding the money and material, the land being paid for out of the profits, the outlay and work reimbursed and paid for, and the profits and losses being shared equally between them constitute themselves partners. Falkner v. Hunt (1875) 78 N. C. 571.

The members of a land syndicate contributing a certain amount of money, placing it in the hands of trustees to purchase and improve land with power to sell when improved, the proceeds to be distributed among the shareholders; the right of the shareholders to participate in the profits arising from the sale of the land,—constitute themselves partners as to such profits. Horner v. Meyers (1898) 29 Ohio L. J. 408.

An agreement signed by the parties creating an association under the style of "Grant's Pass Real Estate Association," makes them partners inter se for all purposes connected therewith. Kelley v. Bourne (1887) 15 Or. 478.

Real estate contributed to the capital stock of a company at an estimated valuation; afterwards destroyed by fire and rebuilt by mutual consent with partnership funds, the loss falling upon the firm, is partnership property and part of its capital, the contributing partner being credited with its value in the stock account. Clark's App. (1873) 72 Pa. 142.

Where the surplus estate was a portion of the proceeds of real estate purchased for the use of the firm, and wholly paid for out of its funds, and greatly enhanced in value by large expenditure of the firm upon it, treated by the firm as part of their common property; used exclusively in their business; inventoried as a part of their common stock; insured as the property of the firm; mortgaged to secure, and assigned to pay the company's debts and liabilities,—the mere fact that the legal title thereto was originally taken in the name of the members of the firm as tenants in common, and that when their assignment was released it was admitted that the property was acquired under the will of William H. Hoffman, and by the deeds of Mr. Vondersmith and Mrs. Smyser, and that no conveyance was made by the members of the firm to the partnership. As to what uses, if any, this firm, engaged in manufacturing paper, made of the farm, dwelling houses, and other property not necessarily incident to the paper mills, the record is silent; but it is certain that, without some notice that they were treated as partnership property, no one dealing with the individual members of the firm would be expected to so regard it; and the ordinary use of that kind of property, such as cultivating or renting the farms, occupying or renting the houses, etc., would not put creditors on inquiry, or be sufficient notice that they were treated as partnership property. If the paper mills themselves, and such other real estate as would properly be used in connection with them, were treated by the partners as firm property, and were so used as to give notice to creditors of the individual members of the firm that they had been put into the partnership as part of returned to them in that character, could not countervail the decisive presumption arising from the source of the funds out of which it was purchased, and the purposes for which it was bought and to which it was applied, that it was intended to be held as partnership property. Lime Rock Bank v. Phetteplace (1864) 8 R. I. 66.

So real estate divided as assets between the partners, and treated as stock of the partnership, appropriated in the division to partnership purposes, allotted with other property of the firm to pay and discharge the partnership debts, is to be regarded as part of the partnership stock. Murrell v. Mandelbaum (1892) 85 Tex. 22.

And an agreement to purchase lands, to share equally in the payment thereof, to the equal interests of the parties when paid for, the deed being taken in the name of one for the benefit of the others, constitutes the enterprise a partnership. Knauss v. Cahoon (1891) 7 Utah, 182.

Land not purchased for speculation, but for the purpose of carrying on a business (furnace operations) an ordinary and legitimate subject of commercial partnership, is partnership property. Brooke v. Washington (1851) 8 Gratt. 243, 56 Am. Dec. 142.

So real estate purchased by a member of a banking firm in his wife's name, with moneys taken by him from the bank without the knowledge of the other partners, such moneys being part of an overdraft, is firm property. Daniels v. McCormick (1894) 87 Wis. 235.

Evidence showing that by the articles of copartnership a partner contributed a distillery and fixtures as his share to the joint stock, at a fixed valuation, being paid interest on its value as part of the capital stock before any division of profits, the other partners receiving interest upon their capital; a United States lien being subsequently secured by the partners upon the property as that of the firm, which paid the taxes and insurance, the property being entered on the books of the firm to the credit of such partner as his capital invested in the business, is sufficient to constitute such property in equity firm property so as to be subject to the payment of the share of the losses chargeable to such partner, the court approving of the holding in Bergeron v. Richardott (1883) 55 Wis. 129; Riedeburg v. Schmitt (1888) 71 Wis. 644.

Upon oral evidence that real estate, upon which the partners carried on their business and upon which they expended their money, was part of the partnership stock contributed by them, the property will be treated in bankruptcy as that of the firm, if on no other ground, clearly upon that of part performance of the contract. Re Farmer, Ex parte Griffin (1878) 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 207.

The joint note of the partners, or a note made by one and executed by the others, will be sufficient to prove a partnership where one contract is made in the firm name, and the succeeding ones, whether in the firm name or not, are adopted by it and taken on the joint account, even though the securities are not taken in the firm name. Re Warren (1847) 2 Ware (2 Daves) 322.

Attorneys and counselors at law extending their partnership business to speculations in real estate on an extensive scale, the name of the firm being freely used in such transactions, constitute themselves partners therein where it is impossible for the business to be carried on in the manner it is in the partnership name, without its being generally understood that a partnership exists. Id.

A partnership exists where, by the terms of the partnership agreement, real estate is brought in by one partner at a valuation. Wiegand v. Copeland (1882) 14 Fed. Rep. 113, 7 Sawy. 442.

Where the facts showed a purchase at the commencement of the partnership, part of the consideration being then paid, and possession taken and used by the partnership, payment of the balance from the profits of the business; improvements made thereon from the like source; the title standing in the names of the individual partners in proportion to their partnership interests, deeds being from time to time given to the partners and from the settlement of the partnership account,—such property will as to creditors be deemed partnership estate although there is no agreement to that effect. Ames v. Ames (1888) 37 Fed. Rep. 30.

Evidence showing the naked real estate in point of value to be an insignificant part of the firm capital invested in the business, the greater portion being in the plant, improvements, and good-will, the value of the business carried on being largely dependent upon the circumstance that the nature of the articles manufactured was kept on the market, raises a reasonable inference that the real estate, plant, and improvements and the personal property, together with the good-will, all make up an entire thing, which if separated into parts diminishes its value and loses its usefulness as an investment; it is therefore to the interest of the partnership to have the real estate treated as part of the personalty on the dissolution of the firm, for the purpose of securing a prompt and profitable distribution of the firm assets, the presumption being that such is the intention and tacit agreement of the partners. Perin v. Megribben (1892) 6 U. S. App. 343, 53 Fed. Rep. 86.

An agreement between parties to labor together and be equal partners in law and equity of the product of their labor; to bear the expenses and debts incurred by carrying on business, including the raising of stock, the purchase of land and other property sometimes jointly and sometimes individually extending to all business in which any of them might engage, and providing that in case of death before the winding up of the firm the continuing partners should take all the property after the settlement of all debts and claims, constitutes property purchased on the joint account or in the names of the partners individually, partnership property. Houston v. Stanton, 11 Ala. 413.

In Galbraith v. Tracy (1894) post, —, 153 Ill. 84, the court treated real estate upon which the part-the common stock, and were entered on the books of the firm in such way as to comply with the statute of frauds, then the partnership creditors might properly be given priority over the separate creditors, to the extent of the proceeds of sales of such property. The record does not disclose such facts as would justify us in determining that question; but, as the decree must be reversed, the court below can authorize testimony to be taken on that subject. We have carefully examined the authorities cited by the counsel for the respective parties, as well as many others, and have found considerable apparent conflict between some of them. But, when the facts of them are carefully examined, it will be found that the most of them are in accord with our conclusions, which might be summarized as follows: (1) That as the farms, houses, and similar property were not purchased with partnership funds, for partnership purposes, but were, as far as the public records show, the separate property of the individual members, and were not incident to the business of the firm, the fact that the partners entered them on the firm nere conducted the business of raising and dealing in live stock, as partnership property, the same standing in their joint names, and being presumably purchased for the purposes of the partnership, and regarded by them as partnership property.

Where two persons, tenants in common under a lease of coal mines, associated themselves together for the purpose of mining, shipping, and selling coal during the existence of the lease, it was held that such lease became partnership property. Patterson v. Sillman (1857) 23 Pa. 304.

Where parties acquire a mining claim, working some and extracting the mineral, sharing the profits and loss between them, a partnership exists even though there be no express agreement to that effect. Duryea v. Burt (1867) 25 Cal. 568.

Where the deed in evidence showed that the premises were conveyed to the partners in their individual names, it was held that the evidence unexplained would make them tenants in common at law, but that in equity if purchased with partnership funds the premises would be regarded as partnership assets where it was bought and occupied for the firm business, the presumption being that it was paid for with partnership moneys. Haynes v. Brooks (1871) 8 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 103.

Whether, where partnership funds are vested in vacant lots, or other real estate not necessary or intended for the use of the firm in carrying on its business, the purchase being for speculation and as an investment of partnership funds not needed to carry on the regular business of the partnership, the same principle is to prevail, was a question not decided by the court in Buck v. Winn (1850) 11 B. Mon. 320, but it was said to be the better opinion that in such a case equity would consider the property as forming a part of the partnership fund, and subject to the same disposition as personal property, liable, however, to be conveyed or charged by one partner on his individual account to the extent of his legal title, if the purchaser accepts bona fide without notice of the partnership rights, there being nothing in the condition of the property or in the transaction from which notice might reasonably be inferred.

Where, in an action for the dissolution of a partnership and accounting, it was claimed that the real estate ordered to be sold was the individual property of one of the partners, it was held that evidence that it was bought while the partners were partners, part of the consideration being a note given by the firm and money borrowed by the claimant on his own note, and it was subsequently paid by the firm, the property was used in the prosecution of the business, and was assessed as the firm's property, and the taxes were paid and credited to the partners paying them on the firm's books, and that such real estate was bought as a firm and for the firm, and had always been used in its business, was sufficient to justify the court in finding it partnership real estate. Roberts v. Eldred (1887) 73 Cal. 304.

XXI. Facts and circumstances held not sufficient to create a partnership in real estate.

Partnerships may be found in the possession and use of real estate of which partners either have no title or hold the same as tenants in common, and such real estate forms no part of the assets of such firm. Hammond v. Paxton (1886) 58 Mich. 393.

A joint purchase of land by two does not constitute a co-partnership in respect thereto, nor does an agreement to share the profits and losses of the sale of land create a partnership, the parties being only tenants in common. Clark v. Sidway (1892) 142 U. S. 682, 35 L. ed. 1157.

Where the real estate in consideration is not purchased with partnership funds, nor any common capital withdrawn from the power of creditors to make the purchase, nor is any agreement entered into that the property thus owned in common shall become partnership stock, or constitute any part of the capital of the firm in the business carried on, it is not partnership stock. Alexander v. Kimbro (1873) 49 Miss. 529.

And real estate purchased by a partner in his own name and not intended or used for partnership purposes is not partnership property. Cox v. McBurney (1849) 2 Sandf. 561.

A firm leasing real estate from a partner who purchased it in his own name cannot claim the land as partnership property though it erected business premises thereon. Slemmer's App. (1868) 58 Pa. 163, 98 Am. Dec. 255.

Partners engaged as such, in a particular business specified in their articles, buying land not necessary to their business but with views and purposes beyond and outside of it hold such land as tenants in common and not as partnership property, and the fact that the purchase money is taken out of the capital or the profits of the partnership business does not alter the case, nor does it seem that the deed having been taken in the name of one partner changes his equitable relation to the other. Coder v. Huling (1856) 27 Pa. 84.

If real estate is purchased by a partner with moneys withdrawn by him from the firm, with the knowledge and consent and acquiescence of his copartners, under circumstances which show that such withdrawal was a loan, the property so purchased will be his individual property and not the firm's, but if the evidence does not show that such withdrawal amounted to a loan, the property will not be considered his individual property, even though he may purchase for his own use and in his own name. Hunt v. Benson (1841) 2 Humph. 459.

Where the land is purchased with the firm's check from its funds, the conveyance being made to the copartners as tenants in common, without reference to any partnership, the payment of the money from the copartners' fund is prima facie evidence of an intention to treat the property purchased as copartnership property, but where the land is neither intended nor used for partnership purposes, raises a question requiring much less evidence to overcome the presumption arising from books, and treated them as firm property, is not sufficient to change them into partnership property, and the proceeds of sales of them should be applied to the payment of the claims of individual creditors prior to those of the partnership creditors. (2) That if the paper mills, and such other real estate connected therewith as would be necessary for the convenient and proper conduct of the business, were treated by the partners as partnership property, were put into the firm business as part of the common stock, and were so entered in the books of the firm as to comply with the statute of frauds, then the partnership creditors should have priority over the general creditors of the individual partners, in the distribution of the proceeds of sale of such property, provided this class of property was so used as to give notice to the latter that it was treated as partnership property, and was substantially involved in the business of the firm.

There is still another question to be disposed of. It is contended that the appellant is estopped from claiming that the real estate is individual and not partnership property, the payment of the money. Providence v. Bullock (1884) 14 R. I. 353.

In Smith v. Wood (1890) 1 N. J. Eq. 74, the court doubted whether land purchased by partners in trade was as between themselves, or as between themselves and their creditors, to be considered as real or personal estate, but held that where no claim of the creditors interfered and the partners had not considered the property as partnership assets, but had dealt with it as real estate and conveyed their several shares from time to time, it was to be considered as real property and all balance due upon a bond of one partner for purchase money due, was a claim against the property and not a partnership debt.

The mere fact that two or more persons make use of property in which their interests are apparently several for partnership purposes, does not indicate an understanding that it is partnership estate. Reynolds v. Buckman (1876) 85 Mich. 80.

If the lands are not in terms put in as a part of the stock, and one of the partners has no interest in them whatever beyond the present right of use with the rest of the firm, the articles of partnership do not make the land partnership property. Gordon v. Gordon (1882) 49 Mich. 501.

Although real estate may be held in the joint name of two or more persons, yet if there is no proof that it was purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, it will be considered as held by the partners as joint tenants, or tenants in common. Pepper v. Pepper (1887) 24 Ill. App. 316.

If real estate is not paid for with partnership funds, but each partner purchases his interest and pays for it with his own funds, the presumption arises that the parties do not intend to hold it as partnership property but as real estate, subject to all the incidents of a tenancy in common; such presumption, however, is rebuttable. Wilhite v. Boulware (1889) 88 Ky. 169.

Even though used for their joint purpose, in the absence of an agreement that it shall be so considered. McGrath v. Sinclair (1877) 55 Miss. 89; Alexander v. Kimbro (1878) 49 Miss. 529.

Land bought by partners, and paid for out of partnership funds, but not for the use or convenience of the copartnership business, or for the purposes of the copartnership, vests in the individual partners as tenants in common, as real, and not as personal property. Price v. Hicks (1874) 14 Fla. 565.

If it is not shown that the property in question is used for partnership purposes and as a means of continuing, facilitating, and enlarging the business, or even for any one of those objects, it is not partnership property within the rule, and is therefore not impressed with the characteristics of personality, and is consequently liable to attachment for the individual debts of partners. Bank of Louisville v. Hall (1871) 8 Bush. 672.

Thus where two persons purchased land jointly, and afterwards one of them built thereon with the consent of the other, without any agreement between them to share the profits and loss of the joint undertaking, they are not partners, their relation being only that of tenants in common; and for the money expended in such erections the party becomes liable for his share of the portion as for money laid out at his request. Sikes v. Work (1856) 6 Gray, 433; Merrill v. Bartlett (1823) 6 Pick. 46; Thorndike v. DeWolf, Id. 120.

So an agreement entered into between two tenants in common, to erect mills upon the property at their joint expense, and for the working of the same thereafter, dividing the profits, creates no partnership with relation to the real estate, and no claim attaches to the realty. Moody v. Rathburn (1862) 7 Minn. 89.

And where the title to the land by the use of which the business is carried on is in common; nothing in the conveyances indicating that it is partnership property; one partner mortgaging his interest; the partnership articles, recorded in the office of the register of deeds, showing that the partners are to occupy for the purposes of their business, and further that one third of the amount is paid therefor by the incoming partner who is entitled to an equal undivided third,—such real estate is not partnership property. Gordon v. Gordon (1882) 49 Mich. 501.

Real estate purchased and paid for with the firm note in the name of one partner, who is debited with the expenses and discount, and renewal of the note, and taxes payable upon such property, in the partnership account, is not partnership stock, and the profits produced thereby are the individual property of the partner. Hay's App. (1890) 91 Pa. 265.

Where an agreement between partners relates to the sale of standing timber to be removed at a future date from land of one partner, with a future partnership agreement as to the remainder, the agreement is not a partnership transaction but the individual engagement of the parties with each other and not being performed, the property is not that of the partnership. Reid v. McQuستن (1861) 61 N. H. 431; Glover v. Tuck (1840) 24 Wend. 153.

A mere executory agreement amounting to nothing more than a contract to purchase a house, the house being yet to be built, constitutes no partnership. Demarest v. Koch (1891) 122 N. Y. 212.

A conveyance of the family homestead, furniture, and other property connected with it by a father to his sons, in consideration of their joint undertaking to pay his outstanding debts and to support him and his wife for life, the evidence not showing any agreement between the sons to make the property partnership, one son taking a power of attorney to hold and manage the property, fulfilling the promise, and maintaining his father and mother till their death, and operating the farm, does not operate to create a partnership as to the real estate. Howe v. Howe (1868) 99 Mass. 71.

An allegation that real estate bought in the name of one partner is so purchased with the firm's money, under an express agreement that such property is to be the firm's, will not uphold a suit for specific performance of such agreement where erty by reason of its signing a recommendation to the court to ratify its sale reported May 1, 1894, by John B. Ramsay, one of the trustees. Mr. Ramsay and Mr. Schott, the trustees, differed as to the propriety of a sale of the property remaining unsold, at the price which had been offered; the latter thinking that in time a better price could be obtained, while the former thought it best to sell at once. Mr. Ramsay reported the sale, and Mr. Schott was required to show cause why it should not be made. The American National Bank, of which Mr. Schott was cashier, was the only creditor opposing the sale, and Mr. Ramsay undertook to secure the concurrence of enough creditors to overcome the opposition of that bank. Accordingly, the National Mechanics' Bank, of which Mr. Ramsay was president, and which was the largest creditor, signified, through its attorneys, who were also attorneys for the trustees, its concurrence in the sale, to the officers of the appellant, which was the next largest creditor, and sought their consent. It was explained to them that by the proposed sale the creditors of William H. Hoff-the evidence does not prove such specific agreement. Russell v. Miller (1872) 28 Mich. 1.

A single special adventure of a joint account, involving the payment in equal proportions of designated sums of money, amounts to a mere community of interest in the property, and the agreement to share the profits and losses on the sale of the land creates no partnership, the parties being merely tenants in common, and therefore an action at law will lie for recovery of moneys as between the parties. Clark v. Sidway (1882) 142 U. S. 682, 33 L. ed. 1187. To the same effect, Jordan v. Soule (1887) 79 Me. 500; Gwineth v. Thompson (1829) 9 Pick. 31, 19 Am. Dec. 350; Haven v. Mehlgarten (1857) 19 Ill. 91; Fowler v. Fowler (1882) 50 Conn. 256; Dickinson v. Williams (1868) 11 Cush. 268, 59 Am. Dec. 142; Fisher v. Kinaston's Estate (1846) 18 Vt. 420; Fanning v. Chadwick (1826) 3 Pick. 420, 15 Am. Dec. 238; Coles v. Coles (1818) 15 Johns. 159, 8 Am. Dec. 281; Galbreath v. Moore (1838) 2 Watts, 86; Harding v. Foxcroft (1829) 6 Me. 76.

Tenants in common of real estate conveyed to them by separate deeds, each paying for the portion conveyed to him and owning an undivided half, do not, by afterwards entering into a parcel partnership whereby such property is to be considered as belonging to the firm and using it for firm purposes, render it liable as firm property for the payment of the partnership debts, as against separate creditors who have given credit to the partners individually upon the strength of the partners being tenants in common. Parker v. Bowles (1876) 57 N. H. 491.

A number of individuals owning land do not by the mere act of associating themselves together as partners invest the firm with a title to their real estate, nor can a firm by the mere act of incorporating themselves by the same name, invest the corporation with the title to the real estate owned by the firm. Carothers v. Alexander (1890) 74 Tex. 300.

Where the deed does not state that the purchase is made by the partners for the use of the firm, nor describe them as partners, but merely states a conveyance to them as individuals, such deed may be misleading as to creditors or purchasers, and therefore the doctrine as to its being partnership property does not properly apply. Forde v. Herron (1814) 4 Munf. 316.

Where every particle of property both real and personal, except household furniture and apparel, together with the liabilities, was put into common stock, without any express provision as to future acquisitions or liabilities, each devesting of all present possessions and binding himself to apply himself faithfully and diligently to the business, there being no ground for supposing that the parties expected any such thing as the individual property or liabilities, there is not strictly speaking a partnership, but rather a universal hotch pot of all their properties and liabilities. Rice v. Barnard (1848) 20 Vt. 479, 50 Am. Dec. 64.

An agreement between partners engaged in the business of "real estate and note brokers" to furnish information as to bargains in real estate, and give the partners the option of taking the benefits of such bargains, does not enlarge the scope of the partnership business so as to include therein the purchase and sale of real estate on a joint account. Latta v. Kilbourn (1898) 180 U. S. 524, 37 L. ed. 1169.

And no partnership will take place until the contemplated event actually occurs. Id.

A description of the premises upon a transfer of a business, as follows: "The property known and described as the Mobile Daily and Weekly Newspaper, and all the property and materials in and belonging to the printing establishment thereof and of the job printing and book-binding establishment, and of the offices connected therewith, with the right, contracts, and privileges attached thereto; and including and embracing the property mortgaged,"—does not include premises used by the firm for business purposes which are the sole property of an individual partner the use thereof ceasing on the termination of the partnership there being no express contract or lease. Rapier v. Gulf City Paper Co. (1879) 64 Ala. 330.

Where the parties were engaged in mining operations under articles of partnership containing provisions for the getting of mineral substance, and developing the same with provisions for selling the same, or the rights, privileges, or leases, or any land the title to which the firm might secure, the enterprise to enhance the purchase of the title to any coal or mining lands in fee, a purchase made by a partner of land without authority, the articles being explicit that no member of the firm less than the whole had authority to buy, conferred no title to such property by the firm which was not bound by the purchase. Judge v. Braswell (1877) 13 Bush, 69, 28 Am. Rep. 185.

Real estate purchased by partners and others in a form showing a conveyance to them in their individual names as joint owners and tenants in specific proportions, with an agreement stating the liability of each to be equal to his individual interest, as shown by the purchase; providing for the reimbursement and a lien in favor of any party paying more than his proportion of the indebtedness; none of the firm money being used, although there was a subsequent entry in the books showing what might have been an intention to treat it as partnership property, if proved, is not partnership property. Lindsay v. Race (Mich.) Dec. 18, 1894.

Every fact essential to the plaintiff's title to maintain his bill and obtain the relief sought must be stated, and no proof can be offered nor can relief be granted upon matters not charged in the bill; where, therefore, neither the pleadings nor the proofs showed any ground for holding real property, or the proceeds of its sale as partnership property, the cross-bill not seeking an account of the partnership property or showing the state of accounts between the partners, no proof being taken upon the point, it is erroneous to decree that the alleged partner is entitled to any interest in the avails of such real estate. Bowman v. O'Reilly (1856) 31 Miss. 361.

man & Sons would get about 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent of their claims, and it was thought that the concurrence of two such large creditors would influence the others. It is apparent that appellant fully understood that the 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent was to come from the sale of the property mentioned in these proceedings. The appellant, the Mechanics' Bank, and another creditor signed a paper requesting the court to ratify the sale, whereupon Mr. Ramsay sent out a circular letter to the creditors of the firm, asking their concurrence in the sale; stating that the proposed sale would pay the creditors about 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent of their claims, and that these two banks approved of it. It is admitted that the officers of the Union Bank asked the counsel for the trustees and Mechanics' Bank whether the signing of the concurrence to the sale would affect the claim of the Union Bank, and "were told that it would not, and that it only meant an assent to said sale at the price proposed. But nothing was said by either side as to the claim against the property, as individual or firm property." We do not think the facts stated in the record are sufficient to estop the ap-

Where the contract shows a purchase, upon certain conditions, for a partnership in one-half interest in the proceeds, arising from the sale, partition, and transfer of a certain parcel of land, and by the terms of the agreement a certain amount was to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, together with interest to the parties of the first part, until the sum realized from the sale equaled a certain amount due to such parties as individual capital; that under such agreement no bargain, sale, or transfer of the land was to be made without the written consent of all parties, and the partnership was to continue in full force until all the land was sold and the proceeds disposed of according to the terms of the agreement, an equal division to be made after the specified sums had been paid to the parties as mentioned in the agreement, such agreement does not constitute the parties partners in such real estate, and that they are entitled to partition. Thompson v. Holden (1893) 117 Mo. 113.

Where plaintiff and defendants, the joint owners of timber lands, made a division assigning one part to the former and the other to the latter partners in the lumber business no lines being drawn, the agreement being that if each encroached upon the other and took timber, an equal quantity should be allowed from the other's amount, though the defendants are partners, such partnership does not extend to the real estate, the parties being tenants in common. Baker v. Wheeler (1892) 8 Wend. 505, 24 Am. Dec. 66.

Where the plaintiff alleged the agreement between himself and the defendant, that the latter should purchase lots jointly, that the bids should be taken in the latter's name and the deed in their joint names, which agreement the defendant refused to recognize, and plaintiff prayed a conveyance to them as tenants in common, and also an injunction to restrain the taking of the conveyance in defendant's name, no partnership existed between the parties in respect to such lands. Levy v. Brush (1871) 45 N. Y. 589, reversing (1869) 1 Sweeney, 653. Sage v. Sherman (1849) 2 N. Y. 418, followed.

In a suit involving two parcels of land, of which the half of one was owned by a firm and the remaining half by another person, the property being held under a lease by one partner in the firm, who conveyed the one half to the other partner, it being arranged that the property was all to be put into the business of the partnership, the other half being also purchased by such partner and paid for with partnership funds, other property being subsequently purchased and used as part of the premises upon which the business was carried on, and paid for with partnership money, a finding that the lands were taken as tenants in common was not sustained. Leary v. Boggs (1886) 1 N. Y. S. R. 571.

An agreement, whereby one is to procure the title to land and take a purchase-money mortgage thereon, for the purpose of building at his own expense, one half of the money over and above the amount procured by mortgage to be furnished by the other party, with an understanding that upon completion part is to be conveyed to the other party subject to the mortgage, or in case of sale the net proceeds to be equally divided, the intention of the parties being to divide the profits equally between them, a mortgage being given for the performance of the contract, does not constitute a partnership between the parties, and therefore the one not a party to the building contract cannot be held liable for work and labor done, the contract between the parties themselves being merely executory. Demarest v. Koch (1891) 129 N. Y. 218.

Where one partner contributed real estate at its estimated value as part of his capital stock, reserving the right not to be bound upon dissolution by the estimated value, and to withdraw the property, and such property was afterwards destroyed by fire, it was held that upon a dissolution the attached lots, not the subject of the removal of the partnership and not necessary for the use of the rebuilt portion, would not be considered a part of the partnership property, and might be withdrawn by such partner. Clark's App. (1872) 73 Pa. 142.

In Grubb's App. (1870) 66 Pa. 117, the parties owners of real estate, consisting of ore lands as tenants in common, entered into partnership arrangements for the manufacture of iron and for the purchase of other real estate, the profits arising from the operations and the purchase money paid being carried into the partnership books, and it was held that no partnership existed with respect to the land, the court stating that real estate held in common and not in partnership, was not inconsistent with its use for partnership purposes, and its appearance in the partnership books to the extent made necessary for the use of the partnership in the iron business, and in such a case the parties being equal as tenants in common as well as equal partners, the use of the land would in the settlement of their partnership account be the same in its result to them, as if as partners they had leased the land to themselves as tenants in common.

If real estate has been purchased and paid for by the firm's check from its funds, the conveyance taken to the copartners as tenants in common without reference to partnership, but neither intended nor used for partnership purposes, and without any uniformity in keeping the account of the firm or of entering receipts and expenditures as to the property and other real estate held by the partners as tenants in common confessedly as individual property, and without claim by either partner until about the time of the commencement of action, indicating an intention to treat the land as partnership property, such property cannot be considered as part of the partnership estates. Providence v. Bullock (1884) 14 R. I. 353.

Where parties agreed to jointly purchase land, one party to arrange for the payment, the other to pay him his proportion, the property being conpellant. It is perfectly apparent that the difference between the trustees was as to the price to be obtained for the property,—whether the offer received by Mr. Ramsay should be accepted, or they should wait for a better price. There is not a particle of evidence tending to show that the property did not bring its full value, or that any of the creditors have been injured. The only creditor that filed objections to the appellant's claim on this ground is the Mechanics' Bank, which had concurred in the sale before the appellant did. It could not, therefore, claim that it was misled by the act of the appellant. But, before the officers of the appellant signed the recommendation, they inquired of the attorneys representing the Mechanics' Bank, and the trustees who were seeking their concurrence, whether it would affect the claim of the Union Bank, and were told it would not. There can be no question as to what claim was referred to, as the agreed statement shows that "the claim of the Union Bank was filed, long prior to any sale, against both the partnership and the indorsers of the notes held by the bank." It would, perhaps, be more equitable to say that the Mechanics' Bank should be estopped from questioning the right of the Union Bank to assert its claim, after having in-veyed to the latter who never conveyed the share to the former, the purchase money being secured by the bond of the parties, and by means of a deed of trust executed to a third party, the parties subsequently carrying on business upon the premises, the first installment being paid from the proceeds of the business, money being borrowed for the payment of the subsequent ones, the notes for which were renewed till after the dissolution of the partnership, when the parties conveyed to a trustee for the purpose of discharging their indebtedness, it was held that such property could not be considered partnership property, even though the parties carried on business thereon. Wheatley v. Calhoun (1841) 13 Leigh, 284, 37 Am. Dec. 654.

Where by the articles of partnership one partner was "to contribute as his capital" certain lands and buildings, "the title to and ownership of" the same being "the sole property" of such partner, the other partner contributing cash under a like provision, the agreement was construed as meaning only the contribution of the use of the property, to be withdrawn at the end of the term, the profits only being the subject of a division. Richmond v. Voorhees (Wash.) Dec. 18, 1894.

Where the fact sought to be proved by the production of books and papers was the existence of a deed from one of the partners of a firm to the firm itself, secondary proof that an entry existed on the books of the transfer of the real estate to the firm; that an account was opened in their with the property; that the money of the firm was applied to the purchase; that the persons erecting the buildings on the property were paid by the firm, the buildings being afterwards rented in the name and partly furnished through the funds of the partnership, the taxes being paid in the same manner,—was held not sufficient to raise a presumption of a deed by a jury as a matter of direction from the court. Hanson v. Eustace (1844) 43 U. S. 3 How. 653, 11 L. ed. 416.

Cases in which real estate has been held partnership property:

In Ebbert's App. (1871) 70 Pa. 79, the defendants in execution were partners, and had conveyed to them real estate adjoining their place of business, the grant being in the usual form, the habendum showing a grant of the said two described lots "unto the said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns" the lots being bought for partnership purposes, and paid for with partnership property, and used for partnership purposes, but it did not appear in the deed, nor could it be discovered in any way from it, that the lots were so paid for or so to be used, the contention being that a judgment recovered by one partner against the other on a settlement of the partnership accounts should be paid for out of the proceeds of the lots, on the ground that they were 27 L. R. A. partnership property and the judgment a partnership debt. The court held that as to purchasers of the title and creditors having liens on it, a deed to persons, who were in fact partners, but who took the title to themselves as tenants in common, must stand as the foundation of their rights and govern in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the title, and the partnership creditors could not by parol evidence change the effect of the deed and convert lands, so individually held, into assets of the partnership, and thereby dislodge and postpone the other always preferred liens of other creditors, the court following Hale v. Henrie (1834) 2 Watts, 143, 27 Am. Dec. 239; M'Dermot v. Laurence (1821) 7 Serg. & R. 438, 10 Am. Dec. 463; Ridgway's App. (1850) 15 Pa. 177, 53 Am. Dec. 586; Kramer v. Arthurs (1847) 7 Pa. 170; LANCASTER BANK v. MYLEY (1850) 18 Pa. 544; Cumming's App. (1855) 25 Pa. 268, 64 Am. Dec. 696; Erwin's App. (1861) 30 Pa. 535, 90 Am. Dec. 542.

In Erwin's App., supra, and Laoy v. Hall (1861) 37 Pa. 360, the lands were acquired after the partnership had been formed and while the joint business was in progress, while in McCormick's App. the agreement was made before the firm had any being and the partnership funds did not pay for it, and therefore it was held that the parol agreement to put lands into a firm, or to consider it as firm property, made before the firm existed, was wholly ineffectual to pass any title either in law or in equity. McCormick's App. (1868) 57 Pa. 54, 98 Am. Dec. 191.

XXII. Louisiana doctrine.

If land or slaves could be partnership property where the firm is mercantile, it follows that they must be governed by commercial law and as the code of commerce in France, although not limiting in express terms commercial partnerships to personal property, nevertheless such an association as was formed in the principal case could only act on things which are movable. Code Commerce, note by Paillet Manuel Driot Francais; Skillman v. Purnell (1832) 3 La. 497.

Under the Louisiana code, a commercial partnership is stated to be for the buying and selling of personal property in the right of the firm, or buying and selling personal property as agents, or carrying personal property for hire, and it has been held that the purchase of slaves or houses to enable a firm the more conveniently to carry out its business does not come within any branch of such definition and is not a commercial partnership. Ibid.

The owners of real estate in Louisiana are considered as owning the same as joint tenants and not as partners. McKee v. Griffin (1871) 23 La. Ann. 417; Bernard v. Dufour (1841) 17 La. 596; Calder v. Their Creditors (1865) 47 La. Ann. 346; Baca v. Ramos (1836) 10 La. 417, 29 Am. Dec. 463; Gullibau Bros. v. Melancon (1879) 23 La. Ann. 627; Thomas v. Scott (1842) 8 Rob. (La.) 256; Weld v. Peters (1846) 1 La. Ann. 432; May v. New Orleans &

duced it to sign the concurrence by the assurance that such act would not affect its claim. But there is no proof that any creditor was either misled or injured by the action of the appellant, and nothing in the record to justify an inference that such was the case. This court, in Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 590, 84 Am. Rep. 825, in speaking of the doctrine of an estoppel in pais, said: "It can, therefore, only be set up and relied on by a party who has actually been misled, to his injury; for, if not so misled, he can have no ground for the protection that the principle affords." From what we have already said, it can be seen that we think that an application of the above principle of law to the facts of this case disposes of the question of estoppel. The decree pro forma must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Decree reversed and cause remanded, with costs to the appellant.

C. R. Co. (1892) 44 La. Ann. 444; Allen v. Whetstone (1898) 36 La. Ann. 849; Theriot v. Michel (1876) 28 La. Ann. 107.

Under article 2796 of the Louisiana Code, commercial partnerships are not allowed to deal in landed property. Bernard v. Dufour, supra.

It cannot own immovable property. Calder v. Their Creditors, and McKee v. Griffin, supra.

Where it was alleged that the real estate in question partitioned between two parties, belonged to a partnership, and that it could not be partitioned before the debts of the partnership had been paid, and no partnership was proved to be in existence prior to the purchase of the land, it was held that the purchase at the sale of the property did not create a partnership, nor did the fact that the partners subsequently planted in partnership, make the lands bought by them the property of the partnership, there being no proof on the record to show the existence of a partnership which had for its object the acquisition of real estate, or which was intended to embrace such property, the civil code requiring such partnerships to be in writing under article 2807. Peot v. Armelin Bros. (1899) 21 La. Ann. 667; Slocumb v. DeLizardi, Id. 355, 99 Am. Dec. 740.

The mere joint ownership of real estate does not create a partnership as to such estate, for that purpose a special contract in writing is necessary under article 2807 of the Louisiana Civil Code. Benton v. Roberts (1849) 4 La. Ann. 216.

So if it is included in a partnership, the contract of partnership must be in writing according to the rules prescribed for the conveyance of real estate, under section 2807 of the Louisiana Civil Code. Dunbar v. Bullard (1847) 3 La. Ann. 810; Gantt v. Gantt (1851) 6 La. Ann. 677.

Real estate acquired by a partnership is not partnership property, and therefore where it was owned by three partners it was held that a deed signed by two partners conveyed their interests alone. Willey v. Carter (1849) 4 La. Ann. 56.

Yet it has been held that though the legal title vests in the individual partners, still as between themselves the property is equitably and practically that of the firm. May v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (1892) 44 La. Ann. 444, 452.

In Battle v. Jenkins (1878) 25 La. Ann. 593, it was held upon the question of the nature of evidence necessary to prove a planting partnership, that there was no law requiring such proof to be in writing, there being no partnership in the ownership of real estate, or in the usus fructus or use of real estate, such as would render its character that of real estate.

If either the purchase of slaves or real estate was regulate to facilitate the business of the firm, it is competent for the firm to purchase the same with any funds they choose, but the law confines that partnership to personal property and leaves them joint owners, and not partners, with respect to the real estate. Skilman v. Purnell (1832) 3 La. 497.

Where real estate was used by the parties by common consent, for carrying on the cultivation of sugar by the partnership, which was dissolved by the seizure and sale of one partner's share of the land by one of his individual creditors, it was held that such land constituted no part of the partnership property, and that the partners were joint owners of it. Theriot v. Michel (1876) 28 La. Ann. 107.

If one of the proprietors in real estate owned by the parties in common makes some change in the property in the other's absence, not necessary for its preservation, and such change occasions a loss to the co-owner, or is such that he has just cause not to approve of, the former makes such change at his own risk, and under the obligation of an equitable restoration, such transaction, not necessarily being part of the partnership. Smith v. Wilson (1856) 10 La. Ann. 255.

If immovable property is purchased with partnership funds by one of the partners, in his own name and without the consent of his copartners, the property itself belongs to the partner purchasing, but its value at the time of the purchase belongs to the partnership and no decree of a court can be rendered to vest the title of such property in the partnership, the partnership being, incapable of acquiring title. McKee v. Griffin (1871) 23 La. Ann. 417.

In considering the question whether or not real estate is partnership property, entries in the partnership books which are binding upon the partners are admissible as evidence, their admissibility not infringing on the dignity the law attaches to the authentic act and manifestly are not to be viewed as parol proof. Calder v. Their Creditors (1896) 47 La. Ann. 846. Armistead v. Spring (1848) 1 Rob. (La.) 567, followed.

Partnership lands paid for with partnership funds, or funds advanced by the firm to an individual partner, for the purpose of paying for or improving the property purchased, creates no individual indebtedness of the partners towards the firm, and the firm cannot be rendered owner by those means, neither does such a purchase confer on the firm or its creditors any privilege on the proceeds of the property. Bernard v. Dufour (1841) 17 La. 596.

Where a partnership existed for the sale of goods and merchandises which was its only object, and real estate was only to be purchased when necessary for the purpose of convenience in carrying on such trade, and 20,688 arpents were purchased by the defendant on account of the partnership, it was held that such purchase did not bind the firm and that a decree in partition by the court below was erroneous. Brooks Syndic v. Hamilton (1821) 10 Mart. (La.) 335, 18 Am. Dec. 338.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

STATE of Connecticut, Appt.,

v.

D. J. E. LEE.

(.....Conn.....)

1. A statutory right of appeal by the state in a criminal case to obtain a new trial for errors of law after an acquittal is not in violation of the fundamentals of the common law of Connecticut nor inconsistent with the principle that enforces the conclusiveness of a valid and final judgment.
2. After acquittal by a jury as well as after trial by the court an appeal may be taken by the state under Gen. Stat., § 1687, authorizing the state to appeal in the same manner and to the same effect as the accused on questions of law.
3. The opinion of a physician that a wound on the interior of the womb of a woman could not have been self inflicted, is admissible as expert testimony.
4. The requirement of a distinct statement of errors complained of is not made by four or five pages of claims consisting mostly of argumentative comments as to errors in the charge of the court.
5. The finding of facts by the presiding judge for the purpose of an appeal is sufficient evidence as to permission to appeal, although formal permission should appear on the record.

(December 1, 1894.)

APPEAL by the state from a judgment acquitting defendant of the crime of murder in the second degree for which he had been indicted. New trial granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Levi N. Blydenburgh for appellant.

Messrs. Joseph P. Goodrich and Arthur C. Graves for appellee.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted for the crime of murder in the second degree, was acquitted upon the trial to the jury, and this is an appeal by the state, in the nature of a motion for a new trial on the ground of alleged errors in the charge of the court, and in the admission and exclusion of evidence.

The defendant makes a preliminary claim that the state has, under our law, no right of appeal to this court when the accused has been acquitted by a jury, and bases his claim upon two propositions: (1) A law authorizing procedure for the correction of errors in instructions to the jury, or in the admission and exclusion of evidence, made by the court in a criminal trial, and followed by an acquittal of the accused, is in violation of that fundamental principle of the common law: "No person shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy." U. S. Const. Amend. 5. (2) Section 1687 of the General Statutes does not, in express terms, authorize an appeal when the accused has been tried and acquitted by the jury.

1. "That no one shall be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense is a universal maxim, thought worthy to be incorporated to a certain extent into the Constitution of the United States; and that an acquittal or conviction by a court having jurisdiction, on a sufficient indictment or information, is in all cases a bar, is equally clear." State v. Benham, 7 Conn. 418. This maxim is based upon a principle common to all systems of jurisprudence, i. e. the finality of judicial proceedings. Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 312. If questions once tried and determined could be again agitated, at the option of the parties, one main object of any administration of justice would be defeated. The function of courts is to settle controversies according to law. The object of settlement is secured by the principle of finality of judgments. "Finis finem litibus imponit." The object of settlement in accordance with law, the same in all cases, is secured by the correction of errors in the application of law in each case. Neither object is inconsistent with the other. The end is not reached, the cause is not finished, until both the facts, and the law applicable to the facts, are finally determined. The principle of finality is essential; but not more essential than the principle of justice. A final settlement is not more vital than a right settlement. The adjustment of these principles in the establishment of procedure by means of which the final judgment shall not only settle the controversy, but settle it in accordance with law, is determined in each jurisdiction by considerations of public policy, and not by fundamental principles of jurisprudence. The principle, "nemo bis nevari eadem causa." gives protection against a second judicial proceeding, and, in the event of such proceeding, gives to a party the right, in criminal cases, to the plea of autrefois acquit or autrefois convict, and in civil causes to the plea of res judicata; but the principle does not control the question whether the judgment pleaded in bar is in fact a legal and final judgment, and has no legitimate relation to the question whether existing procedure provides for correction of errors occurring in the trial.

This distinction has been lost sight of in some cases which discuss the application of common-law rules or statutory provisions to the correction of errors in criminal causes; and, owing to the confusion of principle with practice, a theory seems to have at times prevailed which assumes that the punishment of crime is a sort of invasion of natural right, and that a person accused of crime should be exempt from established rules of law binding on all other citizens; and therefore a procedure which proves incompetent to the correct application of legal principles in criminal trials can be changed, like any other rule of practice, when the change may tend to protect an accused from unjust punishment, but becomes a fundamental principle of jurisprudence, that cannot be altered, when the change may tend to secure his just punishment. It needs no argument to dispel such an illusion, or to demonstrate that the natural rights of the individual, as well as the interests of public order, are best served, and the essential principles of jurisprudence are most accurately followed, when the proceedings in a criminal prosecution include such protection against injustice that the final disposition of the cause will not only settle the controversy, but settle it in accordance with law. Judicious legislation for securing a full, fair, legal trial of each criminal cause is not in derogation, but in protection, of individual right, and is in full accord with the principle that no man shall twice be put in jeopardy for the same offense. That maxim, as we have seen, is based on the truth that a judicial proceeding lawfully carried on to its conclusion by a final judgment puts the seal of finality on the controversies determined by that judgment, and is not based on a theory that a person accused of crime has any natural right of exemption from those regulations of a judicial proceeding which the state deems necessary to make sure that the conduct and final result of that proceeding shall be in accordance with law. And so the "putting in jeopardy" means a jeopardy which is real, and has continued through every stage of one prosecution, as fixed by existing laws relating to procedure. While such prosecution remains undetermined, the one jeopardy has not been exhausted. The jeopardy is not exhausted by an indictment followed by a nolle; nor by a nolle after the trial has commenced, when the prisoner does not claim a verdict. 2 Swift, Dig. 402; State v. Garvey, 43 Conn. 238. Nor by the discharge of a jury in case of the sickness of a judge (Nugent v. State, 4 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 72, 24 Am. Dec. 746), the sickness of a juror (Rea v. Sealbert, 2 Leach, C. C. 620; Rea v. Edwards, 8 Campb. 207n.; Com. v. Merrill, Thacher, Crim. Cas. 1); the sickness of the prisoner (Rea v. Stevenson, 2 Leach, C. C. 546; Rea v. Streek, 2 Car. & P. 413; State v. McKee, 1 Bail. L. 651, 21 Am. Dec. 499); in the case of the expiration of the term of court during the progress of the trial (Reg. v. Newton, 8 Cox, Crim. Cas. 489; State v. McLemore, 2 Hill, L. 680); in case of the inability of the jury to agree (State v. Woodruff, 2 Day, 504, 2 Am. Dec. 122; Reg. v. Charlesworth, 1 Best & S. 460; Reg. v. Davison, 2 Post. & F. 252; People v. Olcott, 2 Johns. Cas. 301; Com. v. Bowden, 9 Mass. 494; Hoffman v. State, 20 Md. 425; Hurley v. State, 6 Ohio, 399; United States v. Perez, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 579, 6 L. ed. 165); in case of influence exerted on the jury, against the prosecution, by an officer in charge of the jury (State v. Wiseman, 68 N. C. 203); in case of misconduct or incapacity of a juror (United States v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 28, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815; People v. Damon, 18 27 L. R. A.

Wend. 351; Stone v. People, 3 Ill. 326; Dilworth v. Com. 12 Gratt. 689, 65 Am. Dec. 264; Reg. v. Ward, 10 Cox, Crim. Cas. 578); even after the case has been committed to the jury (State v. Tuller, 84 Conn. 294); and when the prisoner offers to waive the disqualification of a juror who has expressed an opinion against him, and protests against the discharge of the jury. State v. Allen, 46 Conn. 531. Nor is it exhausted by an acquittal when the verdict has been obtained through the fraud of the accused. Chitty, Crim. L. p. 657; State v. Reed, 26 Conn. 208.

The great significance of these cases lies in their illustration of the inherent power and duty of the court to see that the trial is conducted according to law, even if the impaneling of new juries and new trials are involved. The same underlying principle of justice which demands a retrial because a juror is legally disqualified calls for a retrial when illegal evidence has been admitted or legal evidence excluded. In either case the trial is tainted, and should not support a valid final judgment. Before the verdict is returned, the trial court, of its own motion, can award a retrial. After the verdict is returned, a retrial is awarded only on further proceedings in the cause, which may or may not be authorized by the law regulating procedure. If such further proceedings are not authorized by law, the cause is ended, and the one jeopardy of the accused is exhausted; but this results, not from any special sanctity attributable to a verdict tainted with illegality, but solely from the fact that the state, influenced by considerations of public policy, has decided to make such verdict, whether just or unjust, the end of that controversy. But when the state sees fit to provide that the cause shall not necessarily be so ended, but that further proceedings, on motion of the accused, may be had, an unjust verdict resumes its normal position of a legal nullity; and when the state provides for like proceedings on the motion of the prosecutor a similar result must follow. The rule as formulated by this court in State v. Garvey, supra, rests upon solid foundations. "The principle which protects an individual from the jeopardy involved in a second trial for the same offense is well established, and fully recognized. The question, however, as to what constitutes a trial, depends upon the course of procedure of the particular jurisdiction in which it is had, and the construction of the courts there with respect to it."

The power and duty of the state to extend to criminal trials those methods of procedure which are found essential to that pure and impartial administration of justice to which every one, both as an individual and as a member of the body politic, when the state itself appears as a party to the trial, is entitled by virtue of a principle which lies at the root of our jurisprudence, would never have been questioned, were it not that the dicta of judges as to matters of practice became confused with statements of the legal principle that insists on the conclusiveness of a valid and final judgment. The rule that a criminal cause once submitted to a jury cannot be submitted to another jury may be traced to a dictum of Coke. An able and interesting discussion of its authority will be found in an opinion of Judge Kent, given in full in a note to State v. Woodruff, 2 Day, 507. That dictum was at most a statement of existing procedure, and, as such, has been repeatedly discredited in a large number of cases; and a rule of procedure in criminal law advanced during the seventeenth century cannot be held to dominate the settled principles of jurisprudence in the nineteenth. The administration of criminal law as it formerly prevailed in England has justly been regarded, in some respects, as an object lesson of barbaric codes. Its continuance theoretically unchanged during the wonderful evolution of a system of civil liberty and sound jurisprudence is a marvel, not inexplicable, perhaps, but none the less strange. Judges were compelled to administer a criminal code in many ways sharply antagonistic to the system of civil liberty and justice which legislature and courts were slowly developing. It is not surprising that under such limitations they should have been acute in stretching the technics to modify the harshness of the law, and should have occasionally given utterance to dicta praiseworthy in view of existing conditions, but unsound when applied to conditions such as now happily prevail. General rules enunciated under such circumstances, and based on such dicta, are not authority for the fundamental principles of the common law of this state. At most, they are general statements touching procedure, which must yield to the necessities of justice. The uncertainty of such rules was felt, and the principles to be followed in applying them were clearly stated by Sir Michael Foster, as early as 1746: "Upon the whole, my opinion is that all general rules touching the administration of justice must be so understood as to be made consistent with the fundamental principles of justice, and consequently all cases where a strict adherence would clash with those fundamental principles are to be considered as so many exceptions to it." Kinloch's Case, Fost. C. L. 16.

The defendant lays great stress upon the claim that at English common law the procedure did not permit a writ of error after acquittal. We are inclined to think that it cannot be fairly assumed, from a comparison of all the early authorities, that such writ of error was forbidden. A difficulty in reaching a certain conclusion arises from the fact that originally a writ of error in criminal causes was a writ of grace, and not of right, and that bills of exceptions were not allowed in criminal trials, so that neither the prosecutor nor the accused could place on record the grounds on which a writ of error would ordinarily be sought. But the common practice of reserving questions of law arising in the trial of a cause, for the advice of the court of king's bench, demonstrates the recognition of the principle that the final judgment in a criminal cause should not be rendered until opportunity has been given for the correction of errors which, if not corrected, would make that judgment unjust. To what extent such corrections should be allowed, and whether they shall be accomplished by reservation before judgment, or by proceeding in error after judgment, is a matter of practice, to be settled on considerations of public policy. The United States Supreme Court, in an opinion delivered by Justice Gray, has collated the authorities, English and American, on the common-law practice, and reached conclusions which will doubtless be generally accepted, i. e.: The right of the crown, at common law, to a writ of error after acquittal is not wholly free from doubt. The practice in a few of our states recognizes the right of the prosecutor to proceedings in error. In a great majority of the states the courts hold "that the state has no right to sue out a writ of error upon a judgment in favor of the defendant in a criminal case, except under and in accordance with express statutes, whether the judgment is rendered upon a verdict of acquittal, or upon the determination by the court of a question of law." United States v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 810, 36 L. ed. 445.

It is, however, immaterial to the defendant what the practice at common law may have been. The gist of his contention is that, assuming the practice to have been as he claims, such failure of the ancient common-law procedure to provide for the correction of errors in a criminal trial was based on a settled and universal principle of jurisprudence, incorporated into our common law, and binding upon our courts, if not upon our legislature. For reasons already stated, we deem such contention to be utterly unsound. Regulations for enforcing the correct application of law in all criminal trials are essential to the administration of justice; and a statute prescribing procedure for that purpose, and requiring the verdict of the jury to be reached in accordance with the settled principles of law and justice before it can support a valid judgment, is not in derogation of any fundamental doctrine of our common law, nor inconsistent with the principle that enforces the conclusiveness of a valid and final judgment. In this state there was, at common law, no practice authorizing a motion for a new trial after acquittal. State v. Brown, 16 Conn. 54. In 1821 the legislature authorized such motion on behalf of the accused after conviction, and in 1886 wisely extended the authority to the state after acquittal.

2. The defendant urges that the Act of 1886, incorporated into the General Statutes as section 1637, only authorizes an appeal by the state after judgment by the court, without the intervention of a jury, and does not authorize an appeal in the nature of a motion for a new trial after acquittal. There is no ground for such a construction. The language of the statute is as explicit as its meaning is plain. In the Revision of 1875 the title relating to civil actions provided that "upon the trial of all matters of fact . . . whether to court or jury, if either party shall think himself aggrieved by the decision of the court upon any question of law arising in such trial . . . he may make a motion for a new trial, stating therein the question or questions of law so decided, and the court shall grant a rule to show cause and reserve said motion and rule for the advice of the supreme court of errors." Page 448. The title relating to crimes and criminal prosecutions provided that "any defendant, in a criminal prosecution, aggrieved by any decision of the superior court upon the trial thereof, . . . may be relieved by motion for new trial . . . in the same manner and with the same effect as in civil actions." Page 539. The Act of 1882 provided that "all questions of law arising on the trial of any cause . . . which may now by law be carried to . . . the supreme court of errors for revision by motion for a new trial . . . shall hereafter be removed to such higher court by an appeal from the judgment of the court . . . and no motions for a new trial shall be hereafter allowed." Pub. Acts 1882, p. 144. The Act of 1886 provided that "appeals from the rulings and decisions of the superior court upon all questions of law arising on the trial of criminal causes may be taken by the state, with the permission of the presiding judge, to the supreme court of errors, in the same manner and to the same effect as if made by the accused. Pub. Acts 1886, p. 560. These several provisions of the law were incorporated, without substantial change, in the General Statutes of 1888, and, in express terms, provide for a new trial upon motion of the state as well as upon motion of the accused. State v. Clerkin, 58 Conn. 98. The preliminary claim of the defendant cannot be sustained, and the appeal is properly before us.

The fifth assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in excluding the following question asked by Mr. Doolittle of the same witness (Moses C. White): 'You examined the uterus in this case, under the conditions you testified to. You made the post mortem and examined the uterus in this case, and have described its conditions. Now, I wish to ask you whether, from your examination of the body of the uterus, in your opinion, the wounds which you have described, upon the wall of the uterus, were self inflicted.'" The finding details in full the facts in the case claimed to have been proved by the state and by the defense. The victim of the crime charged was a woman whose death was caused by a lacerated wound in the uterus, made by some instrument used in the production of an abortion shortly prior to her death. The defendant was a practicing physician, whom the deceased consulted for the first time after she decided on suffering an abortion. The testimony introduced in chief by the state was sufficient to justify the jury, if they believed the witnesses, in drawing an inference of the defendant's guilt. The testimony introduced by the defendant consisted mainly in contradictions of the state's witnesses; the most important contradiction being that of the accused himself, who denied having performed any operation upon the deceased, and stated that in attending the deceased during her last illness, caused by the abortion, and superintending her delivery of a dead foetus and afterbirth, he acted only as an honest medical practitioner would act when called to attend a woman suffering from such injuries. He said the injuries were inflicted by the deceased herself, and offered testimony claimed as tending to show that she was familiar with the mode of producing abortion by mechanical means, and also testimony that the deceased stated she had inflicted the injury upon herself, and had made this statement subsequent to her dying declaration testified to by the state's witnesses, in which she charged the defendant with having produced the abortion. Upon rebuttal the state called the witness Moses C. White, a practicing physician and medical examiner for the county, who had, as such public officer, performed an autopsy on the body of the deceased. Dr. White had been previously examined by the state, and cross-examined by the defense, as a medical expert. It is patent that under these circumstances the opinion of Dr. White, as a medical and surgical expert, upon the question whether the wound he had examined and described to the jury was so situated and of such a nature as to render its self-infliction impracticable, was admissible evidence. It is true that a wound may be so situated that the practicability of self-infliction is an inference which all men are competent to draw, requiring no peculiar knowledge or experience, and therefore not a proper subject of expert testimony. But to draw such an inference from this particular wound on the interior surface of the womb of the deceased plainly required peculiar knowledge and experience, not common to the world; and therefore the opinion of an expert, founded on such knowledge and experience, is admissible. Taylor v. Monroe, 48 Conn. 44; Whart. Crim. Ev. p. 403. The importance of the excluded testimony is not less clear. The testimony in the case, as appears from the record, was of such a nature that the question of the defendant's guilt might have wholly turned on the disputed fact of self-infliction of the wound. The defendant himself relied on the possibility of that fact existing as a principal hypothesis consistent with the evidence and his own innocence. The evidence excluded was relevant to that fact. Justice required the admission of the evidence. What weight might have been given to it cannot be known, but it well may be that the opinion of Dr. White would have convinced the jury that the wound was not self inflicted, and that there remained no reasonable hypothesis consistent with the evidence and the innocence of the prisoner. The exclusion of legal evidence, which the court can see might, if admitted, have justly changed the result, is an error which destroys the judicial value of the verdict, and demands a new trial.

It is not necessary to comment in detail upon the other errors assigned. Whether such as are well taken might, if standing by themselves, furnish sufficient ground for a new trial in this case, is immaterial. There is no need for strengthening the conclusion that the course of trial and verdict of the jury were not in accordance with law.

The record in this case is faulty in some respects, to which attention should be called. The appeal contains four or five pages of printed matter called "State's Claim as to Errors in the Charge of the Court, and Exceptions Thereto," consisting mainly of argumentative comments on the charge of the court. This is not that distinct statement of the special errors complained of which the statute requires. A similar fault appears in the appeal in State v. Smith (tried at this term), and a much more flagrant instance occurred at a recent term. Such practice cannot be permitted.

The permission of the presiding judge, allowing the state to take this appeal, does not appear in the record. It did not appear in the record in State v. Clerk, supra, although in that case the fact that the permission was granted at the time of the judgment appealed from was known to this court. We think the authority of Reboul v. Chalker, 27 Conn. 128, requires us to treat the finding of facts by the presiding judge, for the purpose of appeal, as sufficient evidence that the necessary permission was granted, but we do not think the formal permission is properly omitted from the record. Without passing on questions suggested in argument, but which cannot be decided on this appeal, we think, as a matter of practice, certainly, that in all appeals under section 1637 the permission of the presiding judge should be asked and granted, and a formal record thereof made at the time of the judgment, and that the accused, if in custody, should then be admitted to bail.

There is error in the judgment of the Superior Court, and a new trial is granted.

The other Judges concurred.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

M. C. TOMBLER et al., Appts.,

v.

Adolph KOELLING.

(.....Ark.....)

1. Possession of a check for a watch and other valuables, given by the keeper of a bath-house to a patron as a means of identifying his property, is not proof of a right to the property and will not justify its delivery to one who had no right to the check where the custodian knows both the bailor and the property and would have known that the person presenting the check was not entitled to the property if he had looked at him.

2. Lack of care by a bailor in keeping a check for his property given him by the bailee will not prevent recovery for wrongful surrender of the property by the bailee to one who presented the check but had no right to it, if the bailee could have avoided the loss by the exercise of reasonable care.

(December 15, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Garland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain articles of personal property which had been left by plaintiff with defendants and lost by them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. G. Latta for appellants.

Mr. G. W. Murphy, for appellee:

Defendant should at least have looked at the man; that act would have involved no labor—no consumption of time—and yet, on his own statement, it would have prevented the loss. Even a gratuitous bailee must do that much.

Wear v. Gleason, 52 Ark. 364.

Defendant says he required his employes to exercise no care over the clothing of bathers. This, if true, was, of itself, negligence.

Woodruff v. Painter, 16 L. R. A. 451, 150 Pa. 91; Bunnell v. Stern, 10 L. R. A. 481, 123 N. Y. 539.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee had been bathing at the bath-house owned by appellant Tombler, in the city of Hot Springs, for about three weeks, depositing his watch, chain, a railroad ticket, and money at the bath-house office daily with appellant Clark, and receiving a metallic check from Clark, the superintendent or manager of the bath-house; when one day, depositing these articles as usual with Clark, he received a check for them, which he put in a pocket in his clothes, entered the bath-house, disrobed, hung his clothes on a hook in the bath-room, took a bath, and went into a hall to cool off, and shortly afterwards returned to the bath-room, got his clothing, and went to the bath-room office, and presented a check for his property left with Clark, who handed him something corresponding to the check, which he declined to receive, it not being the property he had left with Clark. Some one else had presented his check to Clark, and received the property of the appellee, and had substituted another check for appellee's while his clothing was hanging in the bath-room.

NOTE.—A novel question as to the effect of a bailee's check for property as evidence of title thereto, and of the true owner's right to claim the property without presenting the check, is involved in the above case. It is the first decision that we remember to have seen in which that question has actually been decided. The present case necessarily includes as part of the decision the right of the owner to demand the property without presenting the check, if that was impossible, when the property was still in the bailee's custody. While this question may seem fairly plain on general principles, an adjudication thereon is of considerable interest.

For the liability of a merchant as temporary bailee of a customer's garment, see Bunnell v. Stern (N. Y.) 10 L. R. A. 481; Woodruff v. Painter (Pa.) 16 L. R. A. 451.

Clark says he told the appellee that he would have to be "very careful with his check and other matters." He admitted that he knew the appellee and his watch and chain well, and further says: "If I had looked at the party who presented the check, I would have known that he was not entitled to the package." There were two dressing rooms to each bath tub, and there was access from one to the other and from each to the bath tub. Another man was in one of these rooms when the appellee was in his, and he knew it. There was an attendant on the bath-rooms, one attendant having six rooms and three bath tubs to attend to, going from one to another. It was about 10 o'clock in the morning, and many bathers were at the bath-house. The appellee recovered a judgment for the value of his property, from which the appeal pending here was taken.

No exceptions to the instructions given in this case were saved in appellants' motion for new trial, and were therefore abandoned. Four were asked on the part of the appellants which were refused. They are as follows: (1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, after having secured a check from the manager of the bath-house, went into his bath-room, and took his bath in a room that was adjoining another room, and that such adjoining room was so situated that any person bathing in said room had access to the room that plaintiff was bathing in, and that plaintiff knew this, and, after taking his bath, he left his room, and went out into the hall of the bath-house, and left the clothes in his bath-room, they will find that said plaintiff in so acting was guilty of such negligence and of such acts that the defendants cannot be held responsible for anything that occurred during the absence of the plaintiff from his bath-room, and they will find for the defendants. (2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff left his bath-room, in a nude condition, and went into the halls of the bath-house, and left his clothes, with the check therein, in such a position that the same could be reached by persons bathing in adjoining room, and while out of his room he lost his check, they will find that the defendants cannot be held for this act of negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and they will find for the defendants. (3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was informed, at the time he commenced bathing at the bath-house, that packages would be delivered upon the return of the check given at the office, that it becomes the duty of plaintiff to take care of the check, and to see that the same was not lost or stolen or mislaid; and if, after receiving the check, the plaintiff so placed the check that the same was substituted by some designing party, and the check was presented and the package delivered thereon, they will find that the defendants are not responsible for the loss and substitution of the check. (4) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was informed by the manager, Clark, that he must be careful while in the bath-room, and that all kinds of men and characters were liable to be bathing in the bath-house, and that the plaintiff bathed at the bath-house three weeks, and had opportunity of seeing the parties who bathed at said bath-house, that he was required to exercise the necessary care and control over his clothes and their contents as a prudent person would exercise under the same or similar circumstances."

This is a case of bailment for a consideration received by the bailee, who was bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence to preserve and restore the property delivered by the bailor to the bailee, or to some one who was authorized by the bailor to receive it. The property was not so delivered by the bailee, but was delivered to another, who was not authorized to receive it. The bailee knew the bailor and his property well, and testified: "If I had looked at the party who presented the check, I would have known he was not entitled to the package." The check was a means of identification of the property, but was no evidence that the owner of the property had parted with his title to it, or that he had authorized its delivery to any one who might present the check, though not entitled to receive it. Where property is committed to the custody of a bailee for safe-keeping, it is the bailee's duty to use ordinary care and diligence to keep the property safely; and if it is lost through the failure on his part to do so, he is liable. A negligent delivery of the property by him to another, whereby it is lost to the owner, will not relieve him from liability. Had the bailee not previously known the bailor and the property, there might have been some excuse for delivery of the property to the person who presented the check for it, though he was not entitled to receive it; but such a case is not presented or decided here. It seems that, though the bailor was not as prudent as he ought to have been, yet the bailee might have avoided the loss by the exercise of ordinary care, which is such care as a prudent man would exercise, under like circumstances, to protect his own interest. The instructions numbered 1, 2, and 3, refused, ignored the negligence of the superintendent, Clark, and were properly refused. The fourth, refused, does not seem objectionable, but the refusal of it was not prejudicial, as the evidence clearly shows that the property was lost through the want of ordinary care upon the part of the bailee.

Selling intoxicating liquors to a minor who says that he is buying it as agent for two sick teachers not named, at a college where there are more than two teachers, is a violation of a statute against selling to minors.

(December 15, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County convicting him of selling liquor to a minor. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. S. Brundidge, Jr., for appellant:

If Dye was in good faith sent by adult persons for the whiskey, and he stated at the time that he wanted it for another and gave their money in payment of it and then carried it and delivered it to the adult just as he had received it and as he states, and had no other interest in the whiskey except as an errand boy for adult persons, there was no sale to him and the jury should have been so instructed.

Messrs. James P. Clarke, Atty. Gen., and Charles T. Coleman, for appellee:

A liquor seller who contracts with a minor may be convicted of selling liquor to a minor, notwithstanding the fact may subsequently be disclosed that the minor acted as agent for his parent.

Siceluff v. State, 52 Ark. 56.

If the agent should, at the time of the purchase of the goods, acknowledge that he is purchasing for another person, but should not then name him, in such case he would be held personally liable, although the principal, when discovered, might also be liable for the debt.

Story, Ag. § 267.

An agent who conceals the fact of his agency and contracts as the ostensible principal is undoubtedly liable in the same manner and to the same extent as though he were the real principal in interest.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of selling liquor to a minor, under section 1812, S. & H. Dig. The proof on behalf of the state showed that a minor purchased of the defendant one bottle of whiskey, without the written consent of his parents, but informed defendant at the time that he wanted the whiskey for two sick teachers, of Galloway College, who had furnished him the money, and sent him for the whiskey; that the whiskey was delivered to them, and he did not drink any himself. The names of the teachers, he did not want to disclose, and thinks he did not tell defendant their names. The defendant, for himself, testified that he did not sell the liquor, but sent it to the teachers, whose names the minor gave him; and as they were his friends, and sick, he did not charge them for the whiskey. The substance of the court's instructions was that if the minor purchased the whiskey for two teachers, as their agent, without disclosing their names to the defendant at the time of the purchase, the defendant would be guilty. But if the defendant gave the whiskey to the minor for the adults, although their names were not disclosed, or if he did not sell the whiskey, he would not be guilty, under this indictment. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury, in substance, that if the minor bought the liquor for the two teachers, and told the defendant he was purchasing for them, the defendant would not be guilty, although the names of the teachers were not disclosed.

The question is, Was it a sale to the minor, who disclosed the fact of agency, but did not give the name of his principal? This court is committed to the doctrine that a minor may be the agent of a purchaser or donee of liquor.

Wallace v. State, 54 Ark. 542; Siceluff v. State, 52 Ark. 56. In the latter case it is said:

"As between a seller and an agent who deals with him without disclosing the fact that he acts as agent, the latter, as well as the principal, is the purchaser." It is also a well-recognized principle that "though the agent discloses the fact that he is agent, if he conceals the name of his principal, he may be held personally liable as principal." Mechem, Ag. § 554. Chancellor Kent says: "It is a general rule, standing on strong foundations, and pervading every system of jurisprudence, that where an agent is duly constituted, and names his principal, and contracts in his name, and does not exceed his authority, the principal is responsible, and not the agent. If he contracts in behalf of his principal, and discloses his name at the time, he is not personally liable. But, if a person would excuse himself from responsibility on the ground of agency, he must show that he disclosed his principal at the time of making the contract, and that he acted on his behalf." 2 Kent, Com. 630, 631. And in Judge Story's work on Agency it is said: "If the agent, at the time of the purchase of the goods, acknowledged that he is purchasing for another person, but should not then name him, in such case he would be held personally liable, although the principal, when discovered, might also be liable for the debt." Story, Ag. § 267. The doctrine of these text-writers is approved and well supported by others, and by many adjudicated cases. Whart. Ag. § 600; Owen v. Gooch, 2 Esp. 567; Thomson v. Davenport, 9 Barn. & C. 78; Taintor v. Prendergast, 3 Hill, 72, 88 Am. Dec. 618; Welch v. Goodwin, 123 Mass. 71, 25 Am. Rep. 24; Smith, Mercantile Law, § 201; Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass. 27, 6 Am. Dec. 150; Dunlap, Paley, Ag. 369 et seq.

The rule is for the protection of the party dealing with the agent: as Judge Kent says, "to enable him to have recourse to the principal in case the agent had authority to bind him." 2 Kent, Com. p. 631. But it may be said that in this case the principal was sufficiently designated. Not so. The language of the minor, whom the jury believed, was: "I told the defendant I had two sick teachers and I wanted some whiskey for them. I don't think I told the defendant the names of the teachers." This is not naming the principal, in the sense the law requires. Had it been shown that there were only two teachers in Galloway College, who were known to defendant, the case might have been different. In a suit against the agent, in such a case, upon a valid contract, the burden would be upon him to show that there were only two teachers. If there were more than two, it would be impossible, without a disclosure of their names, to tell which two of the teachers was intended at the time as principal, and which two the seller was contracting with. An agent could not exonerate himself, under such circumstances, from liability, although the real principal, when discovered, might also be bound. Story, Ag. § 267; Smith, Mercantile Law, § 201; Winsor v. Griggs, 5 Cush. 210; Cabot Bank v. Morton, 4 Gray, 160. In Cobb v. Knapp, 71 N. Y. 352, 27 Am. Rep. 51, it is held that: "It is not sufficient that the seller may have the means of ascertaining the principal of the agent. He must have actual knowledge." 1 Parsons, Cont. 64, note; Raymond v. Crown & Eagle Mills Proprs. 2 Met. 319.

Where the name of the principal is not disclosed, the presumption is the agent intended to be liable. And where the seller does not ask the name of the principal, when unknown, the presumption is he only intended to bind the agent. The case under consideration was a cash transaction. But it was necessary to discuss it from the standpoint of a credit transaction, in order to determine the true test of agency.

In the light of the above familiar principles, no error is found in the charge of the court, and its judgment is therefore affirmed.

The taking of a single mortgage by a foreign corporation for past-due indebtedness for goods sold at its domicile is not doing business in the state within the meaning of restrictions on business of foreign corporations.

(January 5, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lafayette County in favor of defendants in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

Statement by Hughes, J.:

The appellant, a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Louisiana, and doing business at Shreveport, in said state, through its president took a mortgage from the appellees at New Lewisville, in the state of Arkansas, to secure the

NOTE.—On the question, what constitutes doing business by a foreign corporation within the meaning of statutes restricting or imposing conditions upon such business, see authorities collected in note to *Cone Export & Commission Co. v. payment of $1,600, with interest, which the appellees owed it for the purchase price of goods sold them on a credit, the debt having matured at the time the mortgage was given. This suit was brought in equity, to foreclose said mortgage, in the Lafayette circuit court. The defense was made that the appellant was a foreign corporation, and that it had failed to comply with section 11, article 12, of the Constitution of Arkansas, which provides that "foreign corporations may be authorized to do business in the state, under such limitations and restrictions as may be prescribed by law, provided that no corporation shall do any business in this state except while it maintains therein one or more known places of business, and an authorized agent or agents in the same, upon whom process may be served." The act of the legislature passed in pursuance of this section of the constitution is that, "before any foreign corporation shall begin to carry on business in the state, it shall, by its certificate, under the hand of the president and seal of the company, filed in the office of the secretary of state, designating an agent, who shall be a citizen of this state, upon whom service, summons and other process may be served," etc. Acts 1887, p. 234, § 1. A further defense was that the suit was brought before the lapse of the time for which an extension had been given, after maturity of the mortgage; but as there was a decision against the appellees upon this defense, and they have not appealed, no question in relation to it is before this court. The demurrer was overruled as to the first defense.

Mr. T. E. Webber, for appellant:

The taking of the mortgage to secure a valid debt, after its maturity, in the state of Arkansas, was not "carrying on business" in this state, within the terms of the statute prohibiting foreign corporations from so doing.

The taking of the mortgage was security only for valid business transactions already consummated, just as the taking of a note for an antecedent debt.

The power of a corporation to hold real estate is shown in 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 230 et seq.

The presumption is in favor of the power of the corporation so to do unless rebutted.

A foreign corporation may take a mortgage to secure a debt.

Where it is an exceptional act, as in this case, the authority of the corporation is recognized, not only to do the act, but even if prohibited from dealing in such property, the corporation may take it, in the face of such prohibition, in satisfaction of a valid debt or by way of security.

Mr. L. A. Byrne, for appellees:

The prohibition of the constitution is against doing "any business" in this state without compliance with the condition specified.

The doing of a single act of business, if it be in the exercise of a corporation function, is as much prohibited as the doing of a hundred such acts.

The phrase "doing any business" is more comprehensive in meaning than "carrying on or engaging in business," generally, which involves the idea of continuance or "the repetition of like acts."

Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 88 Ala. 275.

In that case it was determined by that court that the execution of a single mortgage in the state of Alabama to secure notes which were made payable in another state, is an act of business transaction, which is prohibited by the constitution and the legislative act.

Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 148 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether the taking of a single mortgage in this state, by a foreign corporation, for a past-due indebtedness for goods sold in the foreign state, the domicile of the foreign corporation, is doing business in this state, within the meaning of the constitution and the act of the general assembly above quoted. There can be no doubt that the sale and shipment of the goods was interstate commerce. It does not matter, then, how many sales and shipments there might have been; they could not be prohibited by the statute. There is no evidence that more than one mortgage was taken by the appellant in this state. Was the taking of this mortgage doing any business prohibited by the laws of this state to be done by a foreign corporation before complying with the provisions of the constitution and statute referred to? If so, the mortgage cannot be enforced in the courts of this state, for if a single act of business be done by a foreign corporation in this state, within the meaning of these provisions of the law, it is as much within the prohibition contained in them as any number of acts of business would be. But we are of the opinion that the taking of a single mortgage to secure a past-due debt, with no intention apparent to transact other business of the kind in the state, is not doing business, within the meaning of the constitution or the statute.

There is a division of authorities on this question. But we think the better view of the question is presented in Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1187, in which the court said: "Reasonably construed, the constitution and statute of Colorado forbid, not the doing of a single act of business in the state, but the carrying on of business, by a foreign corporation, without the filing of the certificate and the appointment of an agent, as required by the statute." The constitution requires the foreign corporation to have one or more known places of business in the state before doing any business therein. This implies a purpose, at least, to do more than one act of business. For a corporation that has done but a single act of business, and purposes to do no more, cannot have one or more known places of business in the state. To have known places of business, it must be carrying on or intending to carry on business. The statute passed to carry the provision of the constitution into effect makes this plain, for the certificate which it requires to be filed by a foreign corporation must designate the principal place in the state where the business of the corporation is to be carried on. The meaning of the phrase 'to carry on,' when applied to business, is well settled. In Worcester's Dictionary the definition is: 'To prosecute, to help forward, to continue; as to carry on business,' etc. The obvious construction, therefore, of the constitution and the statute, is that no foreign corporation shall begin any business in the state, with the purpose of pursuing or carrying it on, until it has filed a certificate designating the principal place where the business of the corporation is to be carried on in the state, and naming an authorized agent, residing at such principal place of business, on whom process may be served. To require such a certificate, as a prerequisite to the doing of a single act of business, when there was no purpose to do any other business, or have a place of business, in this state, would be unreasonable and incongruous." The constitution and statute of Colorado, construed in this opinion, are substantially the same as ours. The strongest case, perhaps, apparently in conflict with the case in 118 U. S. is Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co., 88 Ala. 275. The demurrer to the answer of appellees should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the answer.

M. E. HATCHER

v.

A. B. BUFORD.

(.....Ark.....)

1. The presumption is that gifts made during the donor's last illness and when all hope of recovery was gone, are causa mortis.
2. A gift of notes by the payee to his sister, the mother of the maker, made as an indirect way of giving the maker of the notes an interest in a mercantile business for which the notes were given, at a time when the donor was able to be at the store, although nearing death from consumption, should be regarded as a gift inter vivos and not causa mortis.
3. Bank stock given a few nights before the donor's death from consumption and while on his death-bed is a gift causa mortis.
4. A donor causa mortis remains seized or possessed of the property until death within the meaning of a statute giving dower in personal property of which he dies seized.
5. The law at the time of the husband's death governs the wife's right of dower, as her inchoate right is not a vested one.

(January 12, 1895.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court for St. Francis County in a proceeding brought to establish dower rights in the estate of T. A. Hatcher, deceased, the defendant appealing from so much of the decree as allowed dower out of the realty in fee and the plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as denied dower in certain personalty which had been transferred prior to the decedent's death. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal.

Statement by Wood, J.:

T. A. Hatcher, a prosperous merchant of Forrest City, Ark., died December 10, 1891. He had never had any children, but left a widow, M. E. Hatcher, the appellant. About two months prior to his death, he sold an interest in his store to Walter Buford, his nephew, taking in payment therefor notes of the said Walter amounting to $2,500. These notes Hatcher indorsed to his sister Mrs. A. B. Buford, and mailed them to her on the 9th of October, 1891. About one month before his death, Hatcher directed his agent to buy $4,000 of bank stock, and, about 10 days before, $1,000 more. This stock was issued in the name of Mrs. Buford, and was delivered by Hatcher's agent to her son Walter. Hatcher made a will, in which, among other bequests, was a provision for his wife, and Mrs. Buford was declared residuary legatee and devisee. Appellant's bill (omitting non-essentials) sets up a renunciation of the will, and that the disposition of the notes and bank stock in the manner indicated was done with intent to defeat appellant's dower, and was fraudulent; that the lands of which her husband died seized were a new acquisition. She prays to be endowed of half the notes and bank stock, also of half the fee in the real estate. The answer denied the fraud, claimed an absolute gift of the personalty, and that dower in the realty should be of one half for life. The decree refused dower in the notes and bank stock, but granted it in one half the real estate in fee. Both parties have appealed, and the issues presented by this record are: First. Was there a gift? Second. If a gift, was it inter vivos or causa mortis? Third. If a gift causa mortis, did it defeat the widow's dower? Fourth. Should dower in the realty be according to the law at the time of the marriage or at the death of the husband?

Mr. M. W. Norton, for appellant:

The testamentary character of the act makes the widow's rights.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Was there a gift? The only controversy on this point was as to the delivery. Delivery, of course, is essential to a gift. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1150; Ammon v. Martin, 59 Ark. 191. Mrs. Buford testified that the bank stock was not delivered to her until after her brother's death, while Walter, her son, testified that he delivered the bank stock to his mother before Hatcher's death. No question is raised as to the delivery of the notes. The evidence supports the finding of the chancellor that there was a gift of the bank stock and notes.

2. Was the gift inter vivos or causa mortis? The donatio inter vivos, as its name imports, is a gift between the living. It is perfected and becomes absolute during the life of the parties. The donatio causa mortis, literally, "is a gift in view of death." But this does not give us an adequate conception of the gift as it is understood and treated by the authorities. We find from an examination of these that where one, in anticipation of death from a severe illness then afflicting him, or from some imminent peril to his life, to which he expects to be exposed, makes a gift accompanied by the delivery of the thing given either actual or symbolic, which is accepted by the donee, the law denominates such a gift a "donatio causa mortis." 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1146 et seq.; 3 Redf. Wills, p. 322, §§ 42 et seq.; 2 Beach, Eq. Jur. p. 1144, § 1062; 1 Woerner, Administration, §§ 57, 58; Thornton Gifts & Advancements, chap. 1, p. 12; 1 Wms. Were the notes and bank stock in controversy given under such circumstances? Both the pleadings and the proof settle conclusively that the gifts were in contemplation of the near approach of death from the illness then afflicting the donor, Hatcher, to wit, consumption. The gifts being made during the last illness, and when all hope of recovery was gone, the presumption is they were causa mortis. Merchant v. Merchant, 2 Bradf. 482; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1146, supra; Lawson v. Lawson, 1 P. Wms. 441; Henschel v. Maurer, 69 Wis. 576. The conditions inhering in a gift made under such circumstances do not have to be expressed. The law attaches them as a part of the essential nature of a gift causa mortis. 2 Beach, Eq. Jur. § 1063; Williams v. Gustis, 117 N. Y. 848, 6 L. R. A. 366; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313; Emery v. Clough, 63 N. H. 553, 56 Am. Rep. 548. But it must not be forgotten that an absolute gift—one inter vivos—may be made by one upon his deathbed, and who is aware of the near approach of death from his then ailment. Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, § 21, p. 24, and authorities cited. Is there anything in the proof to overcome the presumption of gifts causa mortis? As to the notes, the testimony shows that Hatcher was up and at his store on the day these were executed; that they were delivered on the same day; and that the donor was able to drive out after this transaction. It also shows that it was Hatcher's desire to give to his nephew Walter Buford an interest in the store, and that Walter declined to take it. The notes were executed for this interest, and immediately indorsed by the payee, the donor, to the donee, the mother of the maker of the notes. The gift to his nephew of an interest in his mercantile business seems to have been the real purpose of the donor. Such a gift, of course, would have been incompatible with the limitations which the law imposes upon the use and enjoyment of the subject-matter of gifts causa mortis, and the attribute of revocability attaching to such gifts. 2 Beach, Eq. Jur. § 1063; 3 Redf. Wills, pp. 322-343. We think the time and circumstances of the gift of the notes, as indicated by the proof, supports the chancellor's finding that this was a gift inter vivos. The same, however, cannot be said of the bank stock. Hatcher was upon his deathbed, and unable to attend to any business, when this was given. Four thousand was taken out about one month before his death, and one thousand only about ten days before. It was not delivered until a few nights before his death. We find nothing whatever in the proof to take the bank stock out of the presumption that it was a gift causa mortis, and nothing to support the chancellor's conclusion as to this.

3. Being a gift causa mortis, did it defeat the widow's dower? Section 2541, Sand. & H. Dig., provides: "A widow shall be entitled, as a part of her dower, absolutely and in her own right to one-third part of the personal estate, including cash on hand, bonds, bills, notes, book accounts and evidences of debt whereof the husband died seised or possessed." Was the donor seised or possessed of the bank stock at the time of his death? The terms "seised" or "possessed," as thus used with reference to personalty, mean simply ownership, which carries with it the actual possession, or a right to the immediate possession. The real inquiry, then, is as to when the title or property in the subject-matter of a donatio causa mortis passes. We are aware that there is conflict and confusion in the authorities upon this point, doubtless growing out of the modes of donatio causa mortis recognized originally by the Roman jurisprudence whence the doctrine is derived. Under one of these, the subject-matter of the gift became at once the property of the donee, but on condition that he should return it to the donor in the event of his recovery. Under another, the gift was made upon condition that the thing given should become the property of the donee only in the event of the donor's death. Under the former, delivery was essential; under the latter, it was not. Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, p. 44; Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431; Abbott, Cases on Wills, 169. Mr. Roper, in his work on Legacies, tells us that, after the contest upon the subject had subsided, Justinian gives a definition of "donatio causa mortis," which alone is the proper one. 1 Roper on Legacies, 1. Mr. Pomeroy quotes this definition, and translates it as follows: "A donatio causa mortis is that which is made in expectation of death; as when anything is so given that, if any fatal accident befalls the donor, the person to whom it is given shall have it as his own; but if the donor should survive, or if he should repent of having made the gift, or if the person to whom it has been given should die before the donor, then the donor shall receive back the thing given." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1146. Judge Redfield, in his work on Wills, says: "The conclusion of Justinian's definition seems to embrace the essentials of the gift, viz., the gift is such that the donor prefers himself to retain dominion over it rather than have the donee acquire it. But he prefers the donee should have it rather than his heir." 3 Redf. Wills, 823. Those authorities which hold that the property in the thing given passes upon delivery and during the life of the donor have obviously followed the kind of donatio causa mortis referred to supra, existing under the Roman law prior to Justinian's definition, which recognized the subject-matter of the gift as becoming at once the property of the donee, defeasible upon a condition subsequent, and under which delivery was essential. This is a formidable position, and supported by high authority. Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500; Olase v. Redding, 13 Gray, 418; Marshall v. Berry, 18 Allen, 48; Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, § 46; Nicholas v. Adams, 2 Whart. 17; Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 346; Emery v. Clough, 63 N. H. 553, 56 Am. Rep. 548; Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 187; Dole v. Lincoln, 81 Me. 423. Since the decision of Lord Hardwicke in Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr., supra, it has been the settled law of England that delivery is essential in gifts causa mortis; and there has never been any controversy upon that point in this country. Since delivery is an essential element to complete the transfer of title or property in personalty (Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 87), the authorities holding to the view that the title passes and becomes vested in the subject-matter of a donatio causa mortis during the life of the donor are dominated by the idea of delivery. But, while delivery is a prerequisite to the transfer of title, it does not follow that there is always a transfer of title where there is a delivery, nor that the delivery of the chattel and the transfer of the title are coeval, in cases where the title is transferred. We think the better doctrine upon the transfer of the title to gifts causa mortis is that which accords with Justinian's definition, and recognizes the subject-matter of the gift as becoming the property of the donee in the event of the donor's death; i. e., the donor's death is a condition precedent to the vesting of the title 27 L. R. A.

to the thing given in the donee. This seems to be the rule adopted by the English courts of chancery, and is supported also by eminent American courts and text-writers. 1 Wms. Exrs. 782; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1146; Baker v. Smith (N. H.) 23 Atl. Rep. 82; Merchant v. Merchant, 2 Bradf. 432; Gardner v. Parker, 3 Madd. 184; Edwards v. Jones, 1 Myl. & C. 226; Staniland v. Willott, 8 Macn. & G. 664 et seq.; Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. 870.

This view is certainly more consonant with the conditions which all the authorities agree attach to gifts of this kind; viz., that the reclamation of the donor, or his recovery from existing illness or escape from peril apprehended, or the death of the donee before that of the donor, will each, ipso facto, revoke the gift. Conser v. Snowden, 54 Md. 175, 39 Am. Rep. 368; Merchant v. Merchant, supra. This doctrine we have already approved in Ammon v. Martin, 59 Ark. 191, where, in speaking of donatio causa mortis, we said: "The title to the thing given remains in the donor, and the gift is subject to revocation at any time prior to his death." True, we also said in this case, with reference to the delivery of a note by the donor, while on her deathbed, to the agent of the donee, "that this was sufficient to make the gift complete, no matter what was its character." But this latter statement was made solely in regard to the delivery. It might be construed, however, as applying to the gift as a whole, and not simply to the element of delivery. In that view the language would be inaccurate. In Ammon v. Martin, supra, it was not necessary for us to distinguish between gifts inter vivos and causa mortis, the only question there being, Was there a gift? But it may be said that this view abolishes all distinction between gifts causa mortis and testamentary dispositions, since the donatio causa mortis is wholly inchoate and conditional, not passing title until the donor's death. Many authorities do speak of the donatio causa mortis as but another form of testamentary disposition, and liken it unto the testamentary disposition, for the reason that it is revocable during the donor's life, is subject to his debts if there be a deficiency of assets, and does not become an absolute gift until the donor's death. Jones v. Brown, 84 N. H. 439; Baker v. Smith, supra; 2 Kent, Com. 445; Schouler, Pers. Prop. 188. But while, in these particulars, it resembles a testamentary disposition, it differs from it, in that the subject matter of the gift is delivered to the donee during the life of the donor, and at his death does not pass into the hands of the executor or administrator, but remains with the donee. This is not because the property or title has passed to the donee during the life of the donor, or that the donor is not actually seized in law at the time of his death, but because it is one of the peculiar characteristics of this species of gift that, at the donor's death, the donee takes, instead of the heir, according to the intention of the donor, as manifested during his life by delivery to the donee. It should be observed in this connection that of the cases cited supra, holding to the view that title vested in the donee during the life of the donor, Chase v. Redding, 13 Gray, 418, was the only one in which the widow was a party; but Marshall v. Berry, 18 Allen, 43, stands on a parity with it by analogy, and the supreme court of Massachusetts is undoubtedly committed to the doctrine that donations causa mortis are valid against the rights of the widow. But the dower rights of the widow rest on a different basis to that of a child or heir. Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 219, and authorities there cited. Hence it may be questioned as to whether any case is an authority against the dower rights of the widow where she is not a party, although holding that title vests in the donee during the life of the donor. For instance, in Emery v. Clough, 63 N. H. 552, 56 Am. Rep. 543, supra, the supreme court of New Hampshire maintains as strongly as in any of the cases that title passes during the life of the donor to the subject-matter of a gift causa mortis. But in the case of Baker v. Smith, supra (a much later case), the question being whether a married woman could deprive her husband of his statutory distributive share of her personal estate by a gift causa mortis, the same court said: "What she cannot do in this respect by will she cannot do by another form of testamentary disposition, which is of the nature of a legacy, and becomes a valid gift only upon the decease of the donor." So, also, Mr. Schouler, who, in his work on Personal Property, contends that the better doctrine is the one which treats the title as vesting upon delivery during the donor's life, yet maintains, in his work on Wills, that "the same principles which regulate the wife's testamentary disposition of her personal property should likewise regulate her gift causa mortis." Schouler, Wills, § 63; Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 137. And the same author, in commenting upon Marshall v. Berry, supra, after saying, "This decision is to be regretted," continues: "The implied conditions of revocation which accompany such gifts make the disposition so nearly ambulatory, like that of a will, that the policy of the law should not differ in the two cases, except to discountenance such gifts as much as possible." Schouler, Wills, § 63. Judge Redfield, upon this subject, says: "It seems questionable whether a man of substance can be allowed to dispose of his whole estate, and leave his widow a beggar, by means of this species of gift, which is clearly of a testamentary character, where the statute expressly provides that the widow may waive the provisions of the will, and come in for her share of the personal estate under the statute by way of distribution." And he adds: "It is possible the American courts have felt too reluctant to recognize the difference in this respect between the widow and next of kin." 3 Redf. Wills, 324, note. Under our law, a man may deprive his children of their inheritance by his will if he names them. So, also, he may deprive them by a donatio causa mortis. But he cannot deprive the widow of her dower rights by either. And this for the reason, in both instances, that he dies "seised" of the property so conveyed. This, in our opinion, is the only consistent and logical conclusion; for if the title passes during the donor's life, and he has the absolute right to dispose of his personality as he pleases, which he has, how can it be said that the donee's rights are inferior to those of the widow, except upon the doctrine above enunciated? This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to pass upon the question of fraud, though many courts of high authority announce that fraud may be predicated upon such a transaction as this record discloses. Maniskee v. Beard, 85 Ky. 20; Davis v. Davis, 5 Mo. 183; Stone v. Stone, 18 Mo. 389; Tucker v. Tucker, 29 Mo. 350; Straat v. O'Neil, 84 Mo. 68; Thayer v. Thayer, supra. However, the majority of us are not satisfied with their reasoning or their conclusions. Lines v. Lines, 142 Pa. 149; Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281, contra.

4. The fourth and last question, Is the widow endowed according to the law at the time of marriage or at the death of her husband?—is easy of solution, especially in view of the comparatively recent deliverances of our own court. In Smith v. Howell, 53 Ark. 279, the court said: "The inchoate right of dower during the lifetime of the husband is not an estate in land; it is not even a vested right, but a mere intangible, inchoate, contingent expectancy. The law regards it as an incumbrance on the husband's title. . . . She joins with her husband, not to alienate any estate, but to release a future contingent right. See also Hewitt v. Cox, 55 Ark. 235, and 237, where same language is quoted. In Littell v. Jones, 56 Ark. 139, the court, through Judge Hemingway, again said: "Persons who may be entitled to inherit under existing laws may suffer detriment by changes in the law that change the course of devolution, but there is no such thing as a vested right in a prospective heirship, or in the maintenance of the laws of descent, and, though their charge disappoint reasonable expectations, it comes within no constitutional inhibition." See also Greggley v. Jackson, 38 Ark. 492. Nothing more need be said. It is not true, as contended by counsel, that the wife acquired a vested remainder in the real estate of which her husband was seised during coverture. The argument of counsel for residuary devisee, being founded upon a false premise, however plausible and strong, must inevitably lead to an erroneous conclusion. Those of our decisions which mention dower as a vested right only used the term "vested" in the sense of assuring whatever right the law gave, and not in the sense that dower rights could not be affected or changed by a change in the law itself. It follows that the devisee, Mrs. Buford, could only claim under the law as it was at the death of Hatcher.

The decrees of the chancellor is affirmed as to the notes and real estate. As to the bank stock, it is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter a decree conforming to this opinion.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

L. W. CRAIG

v.

Eugene GUNN, President, etc., of the Delaware &amp; Hudson Canal Co., Trustee.

(.....Vt.....)

A foreign corporation having its principal office and place of business and various lines of railroad in another state, although it operates a road extending into the state where garnishment proceedings are attempted, is not subject to garnishment there under a statute providing that no person shall be summoned as trustee unless he resides in the state.

(December 2, 1894.)

EXCEPTIONS by the trustee in a garnishment proceeding to a ruling of the Rutland County Court refusing to discharge the trustee for want of jurisdiction. Reversed.

The plaintiff resides in Colorado where the contract out of which the cause of action arose was made, and defendant in New York. The trustee is a New York corporation who operates a branch railroad into Vermont. The plaintiff sought to reach wages due by the trustee to defendant for services rendered in New York, under a New York contract.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Butler & Maloney, for the trustee:

The action cannot be maintained upon the facts agreed to, and should have been dismissed.

Towle v. Wilder, 57 Vt. 622; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 807; Wells v. East Tennessee, V. & G. Railroad, 74 Ga. 548; Tingley v. Bateman, 10 Mass. 843; Ray v. Underwood, 8 Pick. 802; Hart v. Anthony, 15 Pick. 445; Squair v. Shea, 26 Ohio St. 645; Baxter v. Vincent, 6 Vt. 621; Rindge v. Green, 52 Vt. 204.

Mr. J. A. Merrill for plaintiff.

Tyler, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal parties were nonresidents, and the trustee was a foreign corporation, having its principal office and place of business in the city of New York, but operating lines of railroad extending from points in the state of New York to the city of Rutland, in this state. It also owned and operated various lines of railroad situated wholly in the state of New York. The contract upon which the suit was brought was made in another state, and the sum due from the trustee to the defendant was wages for services rendered by the defendant for the trustee upon a line of railroad lying wholly in the state of New York, under contract of employment made in that state, and there payable. Corporations are amenable to the trustee process, like private persons, but this mode of attaching the personal property of a debtor, in the hands of a third person, is conferred only by statute; and section 1073, Rev. Laws, provides that no person shall be summoned as a trustee, unless at the time of the service of the writ he resides in this state. Citizens of another state, and subject to its laws and jurisdiction, are not within the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, and the credits in their hands have no situs here, and are no more attachable by this process than are the goods of a debtor situated in another state. Baxter v. Vincent, 6 Vt. 614; Peck v. Barnum, 24 Vt. 75; Rindge v. Green, 52 Vt. 204. In Nichols v. Hooper, 61 Vt. 295, the plaintiff and defendant resided in New York; and the debt that the plaintiff sought to recover, and the one due the defendant from the trustee, were contracted, and in law were payable, in that state. The trustee resided in this state, and was held liable; so that case is decisive of every question that arises in the present one, excepting the question of jurisdiction over the trustee, upon the facts stated.

Gold v. Housatonic R. Co., 1 Gray, 424, arose under a statute like our Rev. Laws, § 1073. The opinion of Shaw, Ch. J., is as follows: "It is agreed that the defendants have leases of railroads in this county, and this would make a strong case for charging them as trustees, if they could be chargeable as such under any circumstances. But the case of Danforth v. Penny, 3 Met. 564, is decisive, and shows that a foreign corporation cannot be so charged. By Rev. Stat., chap. 109, § 6, 'all corporations may be summoned as trustees.' But what corporations? The very generality of the terms requires some qualification. It cannot be construed, literally, all corporations, in whatever part of the world established and transacting business. The answer is to be found in the statutes in pari materia then existing. The statute in question was only an extension of an existing system. It was intended, we think, to put corporations on the same ground as individuals. And it is well settled that an individual, an inhabitant of another state, is not chargeable by the trustee process, although found in this commonwealth, and here served with process. Tingley v. Bateman, 10 Mass. 843; Nye v. Liscombe, 21 Pick. 263. In the case of corporations which have no local habitation, the principle is this: If established in this commonwealth, by the laws thereof, they are inhabitants of this commonwealth, within the meaning of the law; but, if established only by the laws of another state, they are foreign corporations, and cannot be charged by the trustee process." This was the construction given a statute which contained no provision like our section 1073, that nonresidents should not be subject to the trustee process. In 1870 the statute was amended so that nonresidents, and corporations established by the laws of another state, might be summoned as trustees, if they had a usual place of business in Massachusetts. In Larkin v. Wilson, 106

NOTE.—As to service on foreign corporations, see note to Forster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. (3 Dak.) 28 L. R. A. 490.

Mass. 120, the writ was served before the amendment to the former act was in force; and the court, for that reason, refused to hold a foreign corporation liable to the trustee process, and cited Danforth v. Penny and Gold v. Housatonic R. Co., supra, in support of the position that such a corporation was not liable to be summoned as a trustee, though it was the lessee of a railroad in that state, and its principal officers resided there, and agents were employed there to manage the road. In the later case of National Bank of Commerce v. Huntington, 129 Mass. 444, it was held that a railroad corporation created by the laws of another state, and having an office in Massachusetts for the convenience of its stockholders, and for the better management of its finances and other business, where its principal officers were to be found, and where it carried on such business as is usually carried on in the office of the president and treasurer of a railroad corporation, had a usual place of business in that state, within the meaning of the Act of 1870, and might be summoned as trustee. We have no statute like the Massachusetts Act of 1870, and, even under that act, this trustee process could not be maintained; for, though it is presumable that the trustee had depots, freight houses, and agents in this state, it did not appear that it had any such office here as is described in the Massachusetts act.

Drake on Attachment (sec. 474) says: "In this country, the question has been repeatedly presented, and the uniform tenor of the adjudications establishes the doctrine that whether the defendant resides, or not, in the state in which the attachment is obtained, a nonresident cannot be subjected to garnishment there, unless, when garnished, he have in that state property of the defendant in his hands, or be bound to pay the defendant money, or to deliver to him goods, at some particular place in that state.

It was said in Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York, 14 Allen. 339: "A corporation, being a mere creature of local statutes, can, of right, have no existence nor recognition beyond the limits of the state wherein it is established. By comity, such artificial persons are permitted to contract and sue in other states. If they avail themselves of that comity, . . . they may become liable to its jurisdiction, to the extent to which they have thus voluntarily subjected themselves."

This court held in Osborne v. Shawmut Ins. Co., 51 Vt. 278, that the defendant corporation was to be treated as a citizen of the state in which it was incorporated, and, there being no attachment of property, jurisdiction could only be obtained by service of the writ upon the insurance commissioners of this state, and by a compliance by the defendant corporation with the statute which requires foreign insurance companies to agree that they may be sued in this state, which, as the court said in the case last cited, "is equivalent to an agreement that they may be found here for the service of process." The debt due from the trustee to the defendant, of course, had no situs in this state, unless the trustee resided here, within the meaning of our statute. It cannot be maintained that it did reside here. We find no occasion to depart from the decision in Towle v. Wilder, 57 Vt. 622, though no opinion was written in that case.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Henry R. BEEHLER

DANIELS, CORNELL & CO.

(.....R. I.....)

The owner of a building is not liable to members of a fire department for failure to guard an elevator well, or for so packing merchandise as to conduct them to such well when entering under a license conferred by law to extinguish a fire.

(May 1, 1894.)

ON demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted to plaintiff because defendant negligently left his premises in an unsafe condition. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. G. Roelker, for defendants, in support of the demurrer:

The plaintiff was a mere licensee and was in the building by virtue of his employment.

NOTE.—See similar case of Woodruff v. Bowen (Ind.) 22 L. R. A. 198.

The licensee assumes all risk of injury to which he may be exposed by reason of the condition of the premises, and actionable negligence exists only where the one whose act causes or occasions the injury, owes to the injured party a duty either created by contract or by operation of law, which he has failed to discharge.

Cooley, Torts, p. 318; Woodruff v. Bowen (Ind.) 22 L. R. A. 198; Parker v. Barnard, 135 Mass. 116, 46 Am. Rep. 450.

Where the entry of the licensee is permissive only there can ordinarily be no recovery for a neglect properly to guard the premises by which such person may be injured.

In Gibson v. Leonard, 37 Ill. App. 349, a case where a fireman who entered a building in the night-time was injured in the using an elevator which was defective, having a rotten rope, which broke and let the elevator fall upon him, the court held that he could not recover.

In Mathews v. Bensel, 51 N. J. L. 38, the court says: "The substantial ground is that the defendants did not properly construct their plant, and being a dangerous instrument, did not surround it with proper safeguards; but there is no principle which imposes such a duty upon the owner of property with respect to a mere licensee.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks to recover for injuries caused by falling into an elevator well in the defendants' building, which he entered in the discharge of his duty as a member of the fire department of the city of Providence in answering a call to extinguish a fire. The negligence alleged in the first count is a failure to guard and protect the well; and, in the second count, such a packing of merchandise as to guide and conduct one to the unguarded and unprotected well. The defendants demur to the declaration, alleging as grounds of demurrer that they owed no duty to the plaintiff; that he entered their premises in the discharge of a public duty, and assumed the risks of his employment; that he was in the premises without invitation from them; and that they are not liable for consequences which they could not and were not bound to foresee. The decisive question thus raised is, Did the defendants, under the circumstances, owe to the plaintiff a duty, for failure in which they are liable to him in damages? The question is not a new one, and we think it is safe to say that it has never been answered otherwise than in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff argues that it was his duty to enter the premises, and, consequently, since an owner may reasonably anticipate the liability of a fire, a duty arises from the owner to the fireman to keep his premises guarded and safe. An extension of this argument to its legitimate result, as a rule of law, is sufficiently startling to show its unsoundness. The liability to fire is common to all buildings and at all times; hence every owner of every building must at all times keep every part of his property in such condition that a fireman, unacquainted with the place, and groping about in darkness and smoke, shall come upon no obstacle, opening, machine, or anything whatever which may cause him injury. This argument was urged in Woodruff v. Bowen (Ind.) 23 L. R. A. 198, but the court said: "We are of the opinion that the owner of a building in a populous city does not owe it as a duty, at common law, independent of any statute or ordinance, to keep such building safe for firemen or other officers who in a contingency may enter the same under a license conferred by law." Undoubtedly the plaintiff in this case had the right to enter the defendants' premises, and the character of his entry was that of a licensee. Cooley, Torts, 313. But no such duty as is averred in this declaration is due from an owner to a licensee. This question is discussed in the case just cited, as also in many others. For example, in Reardon v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 267, Holmes, J., says: "But the general rule is that a licensee goes upon land at his own risk, and must take the premises as he finds them. An open hole, which is not concealed otherwise than by the darkness of the night, is a danger which a licensee must avoid at his peril." So in Mathews v. Bensel, 51 N. J. L. 30, Beasley, Ch. J., says: "The substantial ground of complaint laid in the count is that the defendants did not properly construct their planer, and, being a dangerous instrument, did not surround it with proper safeguards. But there is no legal principle that imposes such a duty as this on the owner of property with respect to a mere licensee. This is the recognized rule. In the case of Holmes v. North Eastern R. Co., L. R. 4 Exch. 254, Baron Channell says that, 'where a person is a mere licensee, he has no cause of action on account of the danger existing in the place he is permitted to enter.'" In Parker v. Portland Pub. Co., 69 Me. 173, 31 Am. Rep. 262, this question is fully examined, the court holding it to be well settled, if the plaintiff was at the place where the injury was received by license merely, that the defendant would owe him no duty, and that he could not recover. See also Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Barnhart, 115 Ind. 399; Gibson v. Leonard, 37 Ill. App. 344; Bedell v. Berkeley, 76 Mich. 435. There is a clear distinction between a license and an invitation to enter premises, and an equally clear distinction as to the duty of an owner in the two cases. An owner owes to a licensee no duty as to the condition of premises, unless imposed by statute, save that he should not knowingly let him run upon a hidden peril, or willfully cause him harm; while to one invited he is under obligation for reasonable security for the purposes of the invitation. The plaintiff's declaration does not set out a cause of action upon either of these grounds, and the cases cited and relied on by him fall within the two classes of cases described, and mark the line of duty very clearly. Parker v. Barnard, 185 Mass. 116, 46 Am. Rep. 450, was the case of a police officer who had entered a building, the doors of which were found open in the night-time, to inspect it, according to the rules of the police department, and fell down an unguarded elevator well. A statute required such wells to be protected by railings and trap doors. Judgment having been given for the defendant at the trial, a new trial was ordered upon the ground of a violation of the statute. The court says: "The owner or occupant of land or a building is not liable, at common law, for obstructions, pitfalls, and other dangers there existing, as, in the absence of any inducement or invitation to others to enter, he may use his property as he pleases. But he holds his property subject to such reasonable control and regulation of the mode of keeping and use as the legislature, under the police power vested in them by the constitution of the commonwealth, may think necessary for the preventing of injuries to the right of others and the security of the public health and welfare." Then, likening the plaintiff to a fireman, the court also says: "Even if they must encounter the danger arising from neglect of such precautions against obstructions and pitfalls as those invited or induced to enter have a right to expect, they may demand, as against the owners or occupants, that they observe the statute in the construction and management of their building." In Leahey v. Godfrey, 188 Mass. 315, a police officer fell down an uncovered well in or near a passageway to a house where he was called to quell a disturbance of the peace. A verdict for the plaintiff was sustained upon the ground that the jury must have found that the officer was using the passageway by the defendant's invitation, and that the evidence warranted the finding. Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 513, 9 L. R. A. 640, was the case of a letter carrier who fell into an elevator well in a hallway where he was accustomed to leave letters in boxes put there for that purpose. The court held that there was an implied invitation to the carrier to enter the premises. In Engel v. Smith, 82 Mich. 1, the plaintiff fell through a trap door left open in a building where he was employed. The question of duty is not discussed in the case, but simply the fact of negligence. In Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 102 U. S. 577, 26 L. ed. 235, the plaintiff, a passenger, fell through a hatch hole in the depot floor. The court construed the declaration as setting out facts which amounted to an invitation to the plaintiff to pass over the route which he took through the shed depot where the hatch hole was. In the present case the plaintiff sets out no violation of a statute, or facts which amount to an invitation, and, consequently, under the well-settled rule of law, the defendants were under no liability to him for the condition of their premises or the packing of their merchandise.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

City of INDIANAPOLIS, Appt.,

v.

CONSUMERS' GAS TRUST CO.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A reservation in an ordinance authorizing a gas company to lay pipes in streets, of the right to bind the company by future ordinances such as one to prohibit the streets to be cut without the consent of the aldermen and common council, is not made by a clause declaring the duty of the city attorney to compel compliance with existing and future ordinances.

2. The fact that a pavement was laid on a street after the acceptance by a gas company of an ordinance authorizing it to lay pipes in the street and to take them up and repair them from time to time, does not restrict its rights.

3. An ordinance prohibiting streets to be cut without consent of the aldermen and common council is inoperative as to a gas company which, by acceptance of a prior ordinance has acquired the right to take up and repair its pipes in the streets from time to time as necessary.

4. Judicial knowledge is taken of the fact that leaks occur in gas pipes requiring immediate repair.

A PPEAL by a plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the penalty prescribed by a city ordinance for digging into the pavement of a street without first obtaining permission of the city authorities. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to franchise of gas company to use streets, see also note to Opinion of the Justices (Re Manufacture of Gas, etc.) (Mass.), 8 L. R. A. 497. 27 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bailey, Hawkins & Smith for appellant.

Messrs. W. P. Fishback and W. P. Kappes, for appellee:

There was no compulsion on the city to grant its consent to any particular gas company to use and occupy the city streets.

The city might have withheld its consent originally, but the consent once given, and that consent with its conditions accepted and acted upon by the appellee, the first ordinance became a contract, binding equally upon the city and the gas company; and the gas company acquired a vested right which was no longer in the power of the city to impair or alter.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 14th day of November, 1890, the appellant, the city of Indianapolis, filed in the mayor's court its verified complaint against the Consumers' Gas Trust Company, appellee herein, whereby it charged said company with having violated section 1 of an ordinance of said city passed by the common council and board of aldermen on the 24th day of March, 1890, by cutting and digging into a certain macadam pavement upon the roadway of Madison avenue, a public street of said city, without first having secured the consent of said council and board of aldermen so to do, and without having filed a bond with the city clerk. A trial was had in the mayor's court upon a plea of not guilty by the appellee, and resulted in the conviction of appellee, and a fine of $10 was assessed and adjudged against it. An appeal to the circuit court was taken by the gas company, and in the latter court the company waived the general denial, and all rights to introduce evidence without a plea, and relied solely upon the defense set up in its answer filed in the circuit court. In the answer filed in that court the appellee alleged, substantially, the following facts: That on June 27, 1887, the city of Indianapolis passed a general ordinance, known as "No. 14," which ordinance was set out, and made a part of said answer. That in November, 1887, the appellee was organized as a corporation for the object of supplying gas to said city; that afterwards, same year, it duly accepted such ordinance, filed its bond, and in all things complied with the provisions and conditions thereof; that in 1888, and early in 1889, the said gas company, at great expense, and to the approval of the city, laid its mains in the streets thereof, and, among others, on Madison avenue, and is engaged in supplying over 10,000 consumers of natural gas; that later, in 1889, a macadam or broken-stone pavement was laid by the city on Madison avenue; that in March, 1890, the common council and board of aldermen of said city passed the ordinance referred to in the complaint, and alleged to have been violated by the defendant, and that the same was passed without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, and that defendant has never accepted the same or consented thereto. And the appellee further alleges in its answer that it admits that it cut into the macadam pavement, and that it did not procure the consent of the council and board of aldermen, other than the consent derived under the general ordinance No. 14, a copy of which is filed with the answer, and that it did not file any bond other than that provided for in said Ordinance 14. Said answer further alleged that the acts complained of as a violation of the ordinance mentioned in the complaint consisted only in the digging of a trench in the said street for the purpose of making and maintaining necessary repairs in the service and connections with the premises No. ——— Madison avenue, and in no other or different act; that said repairs were necessary in order to enable the consumer at No. ——— on said avenue to secure a sufficient supply of natural gas; that in order to make said repairs it was necessary for it to dig such trench, and to cut into the macadam pavement, and said repairs could not otherwise be made; that, in doing said work, defendant acted in all things under and according to said general ordinance No. 14, and did not act in violation thereof; that the work was done in a careful and prudent manner, according to the requirement of said ordinance No. 14; and that it restored the street and pavement, and left it in as good condition as it was before it was opened for making the repairs. The appellant demurred to the answer, which was overruled by the court, and an exception taken. The appellant declined to plead further, and elected to stand by its demurrer, and a judgment was rendered against it for costs. In this court the appellant has assigned for error the overruling of its demurrer to the answer.

The Ordinance of 1890, upon which this prosecution was based, and a copy of which was made a part of the complaint, is as follows: "Be it ordained by the common council and board of aldermen of the city of Indianapolis, that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, to cut or dig into any street or alley that shall have heretofore been paved with brick or any form of block, macadam or asphaltic pavement, until such person, firm or corporation, for whose benefit such proposed opening is to be made, shall have first secured the consent of the common council and board of aldermen so to do; and shall have filed in the office of the city clerk a bond with at least two freehold sureties, to the approval of the mayor, guaranteeing the speedy completion and proper execution of said work, and binding the principal and sureties to protect the city from all liability whatsoever on account of the injuries or accidents to persons or property, or both, occasioned by any such proposed opening; and further binding themselves to keep and maintain such part of such street or alley so cut into or opened in good condition during the period yet to run on the contract, under which said street or alley was originally paved." "Any person violating any provision of this ordinance shall upon conviction be fined in any sum not exceeding one hundred dollars." The ordinance No. 14, passed by the city of Indianapolis on the 27th day of June, 1887, a copy of which was set out in the answer of the appellee, and made a part thereof, and upon which it relies in justification of its acts, is substantially as follows: By section 1 it was provided that "any corporation may lay, extend and maintain mains, branches, pipes and conduits through the streets, avenues, lanes, alleys and public grounds of said city, and may take up for the purpose of altering, changing or repairing the same, from time to time, as the necessities of the case may require, for the purpose of supplying said city and its inhabitants with natural gas, under and subject to the restrictions and upon the conditions hereinafter set out." By section 2 a bond of $50,000 was required to be first filed, conditioned, (1) not to molest other pipes or sewers; (2) to restore all streets, etc., "to as good condition as they were before, to maintain the same in such condition for one year," and where the city "shall have taken a bond or agreement from any contractor to keep and maintain the pavements in any street in good repair for a given time, the said corporation . . . shall keep that portion of any such street . . . in good condition and repair for the same period of time stipulated in such bond or agreement between the city and the contractor;" (3) to clear away dirt and rubbish; (4) to reimburse the city for expenses in repairing or clearing away rubbish; (5) to indemnify the city against all claims for damages; (6) to begin work within sixty days after the acceptance of ordinance, and lay twenty-five miles of mains the first year.

By section 3, the mayor may require the renewal of the bond, if insufficient by reason of insolvency or death of sureties. Section 4 to section 10, inclusive, prescribe minutely the method and safeguards to be used in doing the work, and that the city may enforce observance. By section 11, the prices of gas are fixed. By section 12, the city reserves the right to require a license fee to be paid after five years. By section 13, the duty is imposed to supply gas and extend mains on certain conditions. By section 14, the corporation is required first to have a pipe line from the gas field. By section 15, the acceptance of the ordinance is required to be in writing, filed with the clerk. Section 16 imposes a penalty of $100 for violations. Section 17 reserves the right to the city to grant privileges to other gas companies. By section 18, the city reserves the right to buy the plant of the company after 10 years.

The validity of an ordinance being called in question, the jurisdiction of the appeal is properly in this court. The contentions of appellant are "(1) that by the terms of the Ordinance of June 27, 1887, the city reserved the right to bind the appellee by the Ordinance of 1890; (2) that the macadamized pavement in question was laid after the adoption of the first ordinance, and hence the status was so altered as to change the right of appellee to make the cut or opening on Madison avenue; (3) that although the first ordinance, and the acceptance thereof upon the part of the gas company, constituted a contract, yet it is subject to the exercise of the police power upon the part of the city, which power cannot be bargained away, and that the Ordinance of 1890 is a valid exercise of that power." These propositions are controverted by the appellee, and it further contends that the second ordinance is not valid and binding upon it for the reason that it impairs the obligations of the legislative contract existing between the appellant and appellee by virtue of the Ordinance of 1887, and its acceptance thereunder, and that it has in no way, under the alleged facts in its answer, violated the penal ordinance in question.

At the time of the passage of the two ordinances mentioned, the city of Indianapolis was operating under the general statute of the state applying to cities, and the exclusive power to regulate and control the use of its streets was clearly granted to it by the legislature. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3161 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3623). This power to regulate, however, must be held not to carry with it the additional right to prohibit, annul, or destroy rights arising out of contract. This, we think, must be accepted as a well-settled legal principle. Under an act of the legislature approved March 7, 1887, and in force on and after that date (Acts 1887, p. 86), cities were granted the power "to regulate the supply, distribution and consumption of natural gas . . . and to require persons or companies to whom the privilege of using the streets . . . is granted, for the supply and distribution of such gas, to pay a reasonable license for such franchise." This power the council and board of aldermen of appellant seemed to have exercised in the passage of the Ordinance of June 27, 1887. It is not controverted by the appellant's learned counsel that this ordinance, when accepted by the gas company, constituted a contract, and was binding upon both the company and appellant. It was what is termed a "legislative contract," and, as such, came within the provisions of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which forbids the impairment of the obligations of a contract. It invested the appellee with the right of property in the franchise granted, which appellant—unless the right was reserved—could not take away or impair, without appellee's consent, by any subsequent act. Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629; New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 261. This contract being within the scope of the power invested in appellant, and not in violation of public policy, nor tainted with fraud, must be as binding and enforceable as that of a private corporation or person. Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Gas Light & Coke Co. 66 Ind. 396. While it is true, as herein stated, that the exclusive power to regulate and control the use of its streets is vested in the city, this use, however, is not restricted to that of transit alone but it also extends to the laying of gas and water pipes, and to the promotion of the public health and convenience. Cummins v. Seymour, 79 Ind. 491, 41 Am. Rep. 618; Angell, Highways, § 216. Keeping in view these principles of law, as herein stated, we will consider the respective contentions of the parties to this action:

1. Did the appellant, by the terms of the Ordinance of 1887, reserve the right to bind the appellee by the provisions of that of 1890? The clause in the former ordinance relied on by the appellant as giving it the power is as follows: "It shall be, and is hereby made the duty of the city attorney to institute such legal proceedings as may be necessary to compel a compliance with the provisions of this ordinance and with all other ordinances now in force or hereafter passed, and all acts of the general assembly, affecting such natural gas companies." We do not think that this construction of this clause by the learned counsel for appellant can find any support to maintain it. Guided by a well-established rule, that the entire ordinance must be read and construed together, the meaning and object of this clause are obvious. In section 9 of the ordinance, it is provided that when work is being done in an improper manner the council and board of aldermen shall have the power to pass and enforce such ordinances as will remedy the defects. In other sections, it is provided that certain rights are to be exercised by means of the adoption of ordinances, and we think it is the enforcement of these that are contemplated and which are in harmony with the first ordinance. In fact, the clause does not partake of the character of a reservation, but more properly defines the duties of the city attorney.

2. Does the fact that the pavement in question was laid upon the street after the passage of the Ordinance of 1887, and its 27 L. R. A.

acceptance by appellee, restrict the rights granted to it to lay, extend, and maintain its gas mains through the streets of appellant in a prudent and lawful manner, and from time to time to take up the same, and repair and replace them? We think not. The appellee had been granted the right to use the streets for the purpose mentioned, and the mere fact that any particular street was thereafter paved with brick or macadam would not deprive appellee of exercising its rights under the ordinance upon which it relies. This is manifest when we recognize that the conditions of the bond required of the corporation availing itself of the franchise granted, were that all streets should be restored to as good a condition as they were before, and to maintain the pavement in good repair where the city had an agreement with a contractor to like effect. As said by the learned counsel for appellee: "If a macadamized pavement covers up the appellee's rights, so would one constructed of gravel, and so would even slight repairs, for the condition of the streets would be changed from what it was when the ordinance was accepted." It is evident, we think, that this contention has no support.

3. Is the Ordinance of 1890 a valid exercise of the police power, which the city did not surrender in granting to appellee the franchise in question? There was no compulsion on the part of the appellant to grant the privilege to use its streets to any particular company. It was within its discretion to give or not to give its consent, and it had the right to withhold it from all gas companies. Citizens Gas & Min. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 332. It was not limited alone to the granting of this franchise, but it had the right to prescribe and impose terms and conditions. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 706; 2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 986. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 565. When these terms and conditions proposed by appellant were accepted by the appellee, and complied with, it became a binding contract. Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens Street R. Co. 128 Ind. 531, and 540, 10 L. R. A. 770. But the appellant contends that such grants are but the exercise of police power, and may be changed or repealed by the granting power. It is true that, in grants to persons or corporations to supply gas and the like to the inhabitants of towns or cities, the municipality does not part with or bargain away its right, under the police power, to protect the public health, the public morals, and public safety, as the one or the other may be affected by the exercise of the franchise by the grantee. New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat Producing & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516; Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 713, 990, 1229, 1230. In the case of Indianapolis v. Indianapolis Gas Light & Coke Co., supra, it was contended, upon the part of the city, that the contract in controversy was a restriction upon the legislative power to regulate the lighting of the streets. But this court, in that case, draws the distinction between the legislative and contractual powers of municipal bodies as follows: "These two powers need not be confounded. The exercise of the legislative power requires the consent of no person, except those who legislate, while it is impossible to make a contract without the consent of another or others. We think, therefore, that, when the city of Indianapolis made the contract in question with the gaslight company, it made it in the exercise of its power to contract, and not in the exercise of its power to legislate, although the power to make the contract was authorized by an ordinance; and, having the power to make a contract touching the subject-matter, it had the right to make it according to its own discretion as to its prudence or good policy, within the limits of its franchise. Nor can we see that the contract in the least restricts the legislative powers of the city, except that, as the sanctity of the contract is shielded by the Constitution of the United States, it cannot, in the exercise of its legislative power, impair its validity; for it would be a solecism to hold that a municipal corporation can impair the validity of a contract, when the state which created the corporation, by its most solemn acts, has no such power." See also Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 57 U. S. 16 How. 416, 14 L. ed. 997. The appellant cites Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, in support of its contention that the grant to appellee to use the streets was the exercise of its police power; but this law decides only that the abolition of a lottery was clearly within this power, as lotteries are contrary to public morals. The case has no bearing upon the rule which the appellant insists ought to be applied in the case now before us. Chief Justice Waite, in this case, speaking for the court, on page 818 of the opinion, said: "Many attempts have been made in this court and elsewhere to define the police power, but never with entire success. It is always easier to determine whether a particular case comes within the general scope of the power, than to give an abstract definition of the power itself, which will be in all respects accurate. No one, however, denies that it extends to all matters affecting the public health or the public morals." This, we think, enunciates the true rule. We cannot agree and hold with the appellant that the second ordinance upon which this prosecution is based should be regarded as an exercise of the police power under discussion, so as to bind the appellee, under the facts alleged in this answer, and thereby compel it to comply with its terms and conditions in the exercise of the rights granted to it by the first ordinance. The ordinance in question is "imperative and sweeping," and for no purpose can a cut be made in the pavements mentioned therein without the consent of the board of aldermen and council first obtained, and the filing of the bond. No one is excepted from its provisions. We judicially know that by reason of changes occurring from extreme heat, cold, and pressure, leaks will and do occur in gas pipes, which require immediate repair. If, then, it should be held that in making these repairs, wherein it would be necessary to uncover the mains, the appellee must await the pleasure of the council and board of aldermen in giving its consent, it would be virtually in the same condition as though it had not secured the rights and franchise under the Ordinance of 1887. Penal ordinances, like penal statutes, are not always, nor ought they to be, construed literally, and courts will make the necessary exception. Donnell v. State, 2 Ind. 658; Nixon v. State, 76 Ind. 524. We are constrained to hold that the Ordinance of 1890 is inoperative and void, so far as it may be invoked to abridge or restrict appellee in the exercise of the rights and privileges acquired by it under the Ordinance of 1887. In consonance with reason, it cannot be held that the appellee, which had already obtained the consent of the city by virtue of the ordinance last mentioned, must be required to secure a new consent. The right on the part of the appellant to consent implies the right to refuse. Therefore it could, by refusing, work or effect a complete prohibition. This, evidently, is not the intent or the spirit of the Ordinance of 1890. The case of Louisville Natural Gas Co. v. State, 185 Ind. 49, 21 L. R. A. 784, favors and supports the conclusion reached by the court in this case. We have examined the cases cited by the appellant, but they do not sustain their contention, and we do not deem it necessary to refer to them all in this opinion, in detail. We therefore adjudge that the Ordinance of 1890, as against appellee, in view of the facts set forth in its answer, is inoperative, and so far void, and that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed, at the cost of appellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for damages for wrongfully transferring negotiable paper to an innocent holder for the purpose of imposing upon the complainant as indorser a liability that would not have existed if the note had not been so transferred, and thereby securing an advantage for the transferor of the paper. There was a demurrer to the declaration which was sustained by the court, and plaintiff appealed and has assigned errors.

The case, as made out by the declaration, is that certain notes made by the Bond Lumber Company had placed upon them the in-

I. In general.

The above case of NASHVILLE LUMBER CO. v. FOURTH NAT. BANK OF NASHVILLE, while not strictly one of first impression, is one having remarkably few precedents considering the magnitude of business done by the transfer of negotiable notes.

The liability of the holder of a note which was subject to a defense for transferring it to a bona fide holder who compelled the maker to pay it was sustained in an action by the maker in Smith v. Cuff, 6 Maule & S. 160.

And this was followed in Horton v. Riley, 11 Mea. & W. 422, 13 L. J. Exch. 81, in which case there was the additional element of a violated promise by the holder not to dispose of the note.

The same doctrine was asserted in this country in Murray v. Burling, 10 Johns. 172, in which a person receiving a note to raise money thereon for a specified purpose, which was to pay it over to another person who was to give it to the maker of the note to be applied on a certain debt, was held liable for the transfer of the note for a different purpose to a bona fide holder.

This case was followed in Decker v. Mathews, 13 N. Y. 313, to substantially the same effect, namely, that one who misappropriates an accommodation note by using it for an unauthorized purpose before it has any legal inception, whereby it came into the hands of a bona fide holder, is liable for the conversion of the note. In such a case it is held not to be necessary for the plaintiff to pay his note before bringing the action for conversion, and that the measure of damages recoverable is the face of the note.

So an action lies by the maker of a note for its conversion when it was delivered to the defendant for a particular use and diverted from its original purpose and transferred to third parties who compelled the maker to pay it. Hynes v. Patterson, 95 N. Y. 1.

This was an action against the executors of the person who transferred the note. The note was in substance an accommodation note although the 27 L. R. A.

maker received ten per cent of the proceeds as a commission for the use of his credit. It was held that he was not under any obligation to restore anything that he had received in this way before bringing his action for damages, since the holder of the note had paid for its use for a legitimate purpose and if he had failed to get the use of it because he attempted to appropriate it to a different use it was his own fault.

An unusually good illustration of the doctrine of the main case is found in Richardson v. Richardson, 20 L. R. A. 305, 148 Ill. 563, in which it is held that a widow who after her husband's death negotiates to a bona fide holder a promissory note made by him to her as a gift and which was therefore not valid in her hands, might be compelled to refund to his estate the amount which the estate was compelled to pay on the note.

Where a note was given for the purchase price of property on sale with warranty, which was afterwards rescinded for breach of warranty, and the payee, transferred the note to a bona fide purchaser, they were held liable to the makers for the amount of the note, especially after judgment had been recovered against the makers upon the note. Baker v. Brem, 4 L. R. A. 370, 108 N. C. 72.

But execution on a judgment in favor of the makers was stayed until the defendants were relieved of their liability as indorsers on the note. Ibid.

A case similar to this was that of Buck v. Kent, 3 Vt. 99, 21 Am. Dec. 576, where the holder of a note received on an exchange of horses which was subject to rescission and afterwards actually rescinded, fraudulently transferred the note to a bona fide holder. He was held liable to the maker for the amount of the note.

So the holder of a note who after receiving payment thereof but retaining possession of it sold it to a bona fide holder before maturity, was held liable to the maker for money had and received even before judgment against the maker on the note, because no defense could have been made in an action on the note. Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. v. Newell, 81 Vt. 384.

So where the holder of a note received from a surety of the purchaser of land under an agreement to return it in case a prospective sale by the purchaser to a third party should not be consummated transferred the note to a bona fide holder, he was held to have done so without right because his title was conditional until the consummation of dorsement of the Nashville Lumber Company. This indorsement was made by the secretary of the Nashville Company, not only for accommodation, but without any legal authority and was ultra vires and void.

The defendant bank held the notes thus indorsed with legal notice of their infirmity when made and indorsed, and while so holding them the plaintiff company further notified it that the indorsement was without consideration, illegal and void and that the company would recognize no liability on account of the same.

Prior to maturity the defendant bank indorsed the notes to the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville, and had them rediscounted by that bank. The maker of the notes was insolvent when the notes were transferred to the Louisville bank and the declaration states that the Nashville bank fraudulently rediscounted the notes for the sole purpose of creating a liability against the plaintiff company which did not before exist, and because of the creation of this liability, plaintiff claims the right to sue. Judgment has been rendered in favor of the Louisville bank against plaintiff company for the amount of the notes, it not being able to defend against the Louisville bank and a part of the same has been paid. Such is the case as made out in the bill. Several of the grounds of demurrer are not well laid, but we treat them together as raising the real question at issue in the cause which may be briefly stated as follows:

Can the holder of negotiable paper, upon which there is the void indorsement of a corporation, known to be such by the holder, transfer it to a third party with no knowledge of the infirmity and thus create a liability against the indorser, which did not exist in the hands of the holder before transfer? The gist of the action is the knowingly transferring the paper for the express purpose of creating such liability as did not exist before the transfer and by which the transferrer is to be benefited.

While some special objections are raised such sale and he was held liable for the conversion of the note. Brown v. St. Charles, 66 Mich. 71.

One holding a note which in his possession is subject to the defense of fraud is liable in accordance with the same general rule for transferring the note to a bona fide holder so as to cut off the defense. This was held in Hess v. Culver, 6 L. R. A. 498, 77 Mich. 598; Pearl v. Walter, 80 Mich. 317; Knight v. Linzey, 8 L. R. A. 476, 80 Mich. 306.

The gravamen in such a case is declared in Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 8 L. R. A. 253, 120 N. Y. 134, to be the wrongful act of the defendant in causing a note without value except to a bona fide holder to become valuable by the sale thereof to such a purchaser as could enforce it against the plaintiff. It is further said that the cases relating to the subject rest upon the principle that a person who fraudulently places in circulation the negotiable instrument of another whether made by him or by his apparent authority, and thereby renders him liable to pay the same to a bona fide purchaser, is guilty of tort, and in the absence of special circumstances diminishing its value is presumptively liable to the injured party for the face value thereof.

In the case of Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, supra, directors of a corporation were charged with liability for the wrongful issue of the notes of the corporation. This case relies in part upon that of Farnham v. Benedict, 107 N. Y. 159, in which it was held that an action would lie for the transfer of invalid town bonds to a bona fide purchaser thereby depriving the town of a defense to the bonds.

A similar action by a town against commissioners who wrongfully issued bonds that went into the hands of bona fide holders was sustained in Ontario v. Hill, 38 Hun, 250, which was reversed entirely on other grounds in 99 N. Y. 324.

Of a similar character is the case of Betz v. Daily, 8 N. Y. S. R. 309, in which an action for fraud and conspiracy was sustained in favor of a partner against his co-partner and others in fraudulently issuing and negotiating notes of the partnership. He was held entitled to damages for the amount which he had necessarily paid out on such notes including payments made by him pending the action up to the time of trial, and to interest thereon.

II. Cutting off defense of indorser.

Closely similar to the main case of NASHVILLE LUMBER CO. v. FOURTH NAT. BANK OF NASH- 27 L. R. A.

VILLE is that of Develin v. Coleman, 50 N. Y. 531, where a note was indorsed for accommodation in order that it might be used to settle certain claims and a pending suit against the maker when these had in fact been settled before the note was delivered but without the indorser's knowledge, and the person to whom it was delivered made the settlement and had a claim for indemnity against the maker to which he applied the proceeds of the note after transferring it to a bona fide holder. It was held that he was liable to the accommodation indorser for the misappropriation of the note.

So in Badger v. Hatch, 71 Me. 563, the bailee of an indorsed note with power to dispose of it in a particular manner and upon a certain condition, who disposed of it otherwise before the performance of such condition to a bona fide holder who collected it of the maker, was held liable to the indorser who had obtained the note by exchanging his own note with the maker for it.

A very strong case is that of Comstock v. Hier, 73 N. Y. 269, 29 Am. Rep. 143, in which it is held that a person who received a note with an indorsement thereon as collateral security for a debt of a maker and was thereby charged with notice or put upon inquiry as to the fact that the indorsement was for accommodation, is liable to the indorser for transferring the note to a bona fide holder even if it was done in good faith and in ignorance of the indorser's rights. The court plainly holds that the holder having possession of the note through the fraud of others under circumstances which made the indorsement of no binding force in his hands is liable for cutting off the indorser's defense by transferring the note.

The doctrine of the above cases is by no means denied or impaired by Freeman v. Venner, 120 Mass. 424, which denies any right of action to an indorser against a transferee who fraudulently obtains his unrestricted indorsement and thereafter refuses to let him qualify it but instead negotiates the note to a bona fide holder. The ground of the decision, however, was simply the failure to prove any damage whatever as the indorser had not yet been called upon to pay the note and perhaps never would be since the maker might pay it or the amount due upon it might be collected by foreclosure of a mortgage which secured it.

III. Effect of rule as to parties in pari delicto.

There is some disagreement among the decisions by the demurrer to the form of the declaration and the statements contained in it, these objections are more technical than real and the effect of the demurrer is virtually to concede that the defendant bank had no defense to the paper when it made the transfer, and that it was transferred to the Louisville bank, apparently in due course of trade, for the express purpose of enabling that bank to collect the note despite the infirmity in it, the proceeds to be held for the use and benefit of the Nashville bank, and thus imposing a liability on the indorser that did not exist while the Nashville bank held the note.

On the other hand, plaintiff concedes that the Nashville bank might, if holding in good faith, have transferred the note in due course of trade and made plaintiff liable to the transferee without liability against it, for such transfer, but the gravamen of the charge is that the transfer was made not in due course of trade, so far as the Nashville bank was concerned, but fraudulently to enable the Louisville bank as an apparently innocent holder to collect the proceeds and hold them for the use and benefit of the Nashville bank, thus enabling the Nashville bank, through the Louisville bank, to collect the note from plaintiff as indorser which it could not do if it retained the note in its own possession.

The plaintiff insists that while the notes affected by this infirmity, so far as the Nashville bank is concerned, were in the hands of that bank, it had two remedies to protect itself, one to enjoin the transfer of the notes till the indorsement was erased and the other to notify the holder of the illegality of the indorsement and of its non-liability on account of it.

It is said the former course was doubtful and embarrassed, as the plaintiff company could not allege insolvency of the Nashville bank, nor that it was about to make the trans-as to the right to recover for the transfer of a note cutting off a defense where the plaintiff was in any degree a participant in the fraud or illegality which constituted the defense that was cut off by the transfer.

The case of Smith v. Cuff, 6 Maule & S. 160, sustained a right of action by the maker of a note which was given to induce the payee to unite in a composition with creditors and which was such an unauthorized preference as to make the note invalid in his hands, where he transferred the note to a bona fide holder. The court held the payee liable to reimburse the maker and said it was "not a case of par delictum. It is oppression on one side and submission on the other."

This case was followed in Horton v. Riley, 11 Mees. & W. 492, 13 L. J. Exch. 81, where the creditor who took the note for the balance due on such composition and then transferred it to a bona fide holder had expressly agreed to retain the note in his own hands but violated his agreement.

But in Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 306, it was held that the maker of a note in such a case was in part delicto and could not recover against his creditor who transferred the note to a bona fide holder thus cutting off the defense of fraud in the consideration.

This case (as decided in the lower court) is followed in Solinger v. Egelston, 13 Jones & S. 605.

So in Haynes v. Rudd, 102 N. Y. 872, 55 Am. Rep. 615, reversing 17 Hun, 477, an action by the maker against the payee of a note which was obtained by duress and was given to compound a felony and transferred to a bona fide holder who collected it, was held to be unsustainable since the maker was in part delicto.

On the other hand, the maker of a note given for Bohemian oats who was induced to give it by persistent acts and misrepresentations was not denied relief on the ground that he was in part delicto, against the payee who transferred the note to a bona fide holder. Hess v. Culver, 6 L. R. A. 498, 77 Mich. 508. Followed in Pearl v. Walter, 80 Mich. 317; Knight v. Linzey, 8 L. R. A. 476, 80 Mich. 326.

These cases held that the maker of a note which is void as against public policy may be less guilty than the other party and even not consciously guilty at all.

As the court expresses it in Hess v. Culver, supra, "where a man is defrauded, as often happens, by the misrepresentations of some one who assumes knowledge, and where, under the circumstances, he is actually deceived, and not consciously wrong, the fact that the transaction is against public policy is not a bar." 77 L. R. A.

icy in law will not necessarily compel the victim to submit to the fraud of the actual villain."

It is also decided in Knight v. Linzey, supra, that if an innocent party has been defrauded into giving notes he is not obliged to contest them in the hands of a stranger on any information short of the certainty that the latter is not a bona fide holder before bringing an action against the party defrauding him.

IV. Form of action.

In states where modern systems of practice have been adopted the question as to the form of action for wrongfully transferring a note to a bona fide holder to cut off a defense thereto is free from difficulty as a statement of the facts and a demand for damages will be sufficient.

Thus in the Michigan cases above cited, Hess v. Culver, 6 L. R. A. 498, 77 Mich. 508; Pearl v. Walter, 80 Mich. 317; Knight v. Linzey, 8 L. R. A. 476, 80 Mich. 326,—the actions seem to have been simple actions for damages on account of fraud.

So in Baker v. Brem, 4 L. R. A. 370, 103 N. C. 72, the form of the action seems to be that of a simple action for damages for the amount of the note transferred.

In Richardson v. Richardson, 26 L. R. A. 305, 145 Ill. 563, the suit was by a bill charging the defendant with holding the proceeds of a note transferred by her in trust for the estate of the maker of the note on the ground that the defendant held the note by an invalid gift.

In Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 8 L. R. A. 253, 120 N. Y. 134, the court says the essential injury common to all cases is the fraudulent imposition of liability. Hence there should be a common remedy whether it is called an action in conversion or in the nature of conversion, or a special action on the case.

In Comstock v. Hier, 73 N. Y. 286, 20 Am. Rep. 142, it is also held that a wrongful transfer of a note to a bona fide holder cutting off a defense makes one liable either in trover or for money had and received.

The action of trover or an action of that nature is sustained in Buck v. Kent, 3 Vt. 99, 21 Am. Dec. 576; Brown v. St. Charles, 66 Mich. 71; Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313; Murray v. Burling, 10 Johns. 172; Hynes v. Patterson, 95 N. Y. 1.

A right of action for money had and received is sustained in Smith v. Cuff, 6 Maule & S. 160; Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. v. Newell, 31 Vt. 364.

B. A. R.

fer. Hence the latter course was pursued and the claim now is for damages for making the transfer under the circumstances.

We have been cited to no case directly in point and perhaps there is none to be found, though we think the principles involved have been settled upon a somewhat different state of facts in several cases.

The case of the Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 120 N. Y. 184, 8 L. R. A. 252, is relied on. That was an action for damages by the corporation against its directors, first, for illegally voting a salary to the president of the company and, second, authorizing the issuance of negotiable notes therefor, which went into the hands of an innocent holder.

The court held that no liability attached to the directors for voting the salary for that being illegal created no liability, but that such of the directors as voted to issue the negotiable notes were liable because such notes did create a liability when they came into the hands of an innocent holder. The court said: "We think that the cases relating to this subject rest upon the principle that a person who fraudulently places in circulation the negotiable instrument of another, whether made by him or by his apparent authority, and thereby renders him liable to pay the same to a bona fide purchaser, is guilty of a tort and . . . liable for the value of the note. The essential injury common to all cases of this character is the fraudulent imposition of liability. Hence there should be a common remedy, whether it is called an action in conversion or in the nature of conversion or a special action on the case."

The case proceeds: "In what respect do these wrongful acts of the directors who negotiated the notes differ from these cases which were held to authorize an action for conversion or an action in the nature of conversion of negotiable paper?"

"Is there not in each the same presumption of damage springing from a liability wrongfully imposed? Were not all of these actions founded on the fact that the maker, real or apparent, of a negotiable instrument had, through the wrongful acts of another, become chargeable so that he could be compelled to pay such instrument, which would not have ripened into a valid obligation against him but for such wrongful act?"

There are numerous cases holding a party liable for the unauthorized conversion of negotiable paper. In Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 318, it is said in substance that the gravamen of such action is the wrongful act of the defendant in causing a note without value except to a bona fide holder to become valuable by a sale thereof to such a purchaser as could enforce it against the plaintiff, and the right of action accrues as soon as the transfer is made and before payment enforced.

In Thayer v. Manley, 78 N. Y. 805, defendant fraudulently induced plaintiff to execute and deliver to him certain notes, but before they matured plaintiff demanded their return to him, which was refused. It was held that as defendant had it in his power when suit began to dispose of the notes to a bona fide holder, in whose hands they would have been valid, plaintiff was entitled to recover their full value, which might be discharged by a return of the notes.

In Farnham v. Benedict, 107 N. Y. 159, defendant being in possession without title of certain town bonds that had been fraudulently issued through his procurement and which were void in fact but apparently valid, sold them to bona fide purchasers and thus rendered them valid and binding on the town which was compelled to pay them. It was held that he was liable to the town for the amount of the bonds and that an action lay either in the nature of trover for the face of the bonds or for money had and received for the money realized therefrom according to the rule laid down in Comstock v. Hier, 78 N. Y. 269, 29 Am. Rep. 142.

In Bets v. Daily, 8 N. Y. S. R. 809, it was held that in an action by a partner against his copartner and others for fraudulently making notes in the name of the firm and negotiating them to innocent holders, the cause of action was complete when the wrong was done and that payment of the notes was not essential to recovery, the court holding that the injury was done when the notes were first negotiated.

In Ontario v. Hill, 83 Hun, 250, the defendants were held liable for wrongfully issuing the negotiable notes of a town, some of which had gone into the hands of innocent holders. This case was afterwards reversed but not on this point. See Ontario v. Hill, 99 N. Y. 824. See also Haas v. Sackett, 40 Minn. 58, 2 L. R. A. 449, and cases there cited.

In the case at bar, it is proper to remember that the Nashville bank had title to this paper as against the maker and so far as the maker is concerned its transfer was in no sense a conversion of the paper, but it did not have the legal right to the plaintiff's indorsement nor any right to pass it to another. Nevertheless, the transfer put the legal title to the paper and its indorsement in the Louisville bank, which had no notice of the infirmity of the paper, and hence the plaintiff could not defend against its suit. It must be borne in mind that the case at bar is not the case of an indorser who has received value for his name and credit and who then seeks to avoid the contract, in which case he must refund the money or be denied relief, and hence many of the cases cited for the bank do not apply and need not be commented on.

The case of Freeman v. Vanner, 120 Mass. 424, is specially relied on by defendant bank, but in that case the plaintiff upon his own showing could not impeach the defendant's title to the note nor his right to transfer that title to another, and it is not, therefore, analogous to this.

The case of Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 396-400, is also relied on, but in that case the party who sought damages for the unauthorized use of his note was denied relief because he was guilty of a legal wrong in putting the note into existence, and the court repelled him because of this wrong.

In the case at bar, however, the plaintiff company did not put its indorsement into circulation, but it was made without consideration for accommodation and without authority by its secretary and without knowledge of the directory.

The case as presented to us by the declaration and demurrer is that of a holder of paper upon which it cannot legally recover against an indorser, transferring that paper to a third person so as to enable such person to collect the paper from the indorser, not for the transferee's benefit and in due course of trade, but for the use and benefit of the transferring bank, and thus indirectly holding the indorser liable when the transferring bank could not regularly so hold it. The principle would be the same if the bank at Nashville had held the note of the plaintiff on which it was maker and which for any reason was void and had before maturity transferred it to the Louisville bank in order to enable it to collect it for account of the Nashville bank. In each case it is an appropriation to its own use by forms of law of the credit and money of the indorser or maker to which the Nashville bank had no right, and we think the case falls within the reason of the cases here cited. We are of opinion there is error in the ruling of the court below and it is reversed and cause remanded for trial.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Fianna STROUP, Appt.,
v.
Daniel N. STROUP et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A conveyance in trust made to another subject to the life use of the purchaser of premises, and his right to direct a sale of the property for his own benefit at any time, creates only a naked or nominal title in the trustee which is invalid under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2408.
2. The equitable interest of a purchaser in land, which by his direction is conveyed to a third person under an invalid naked trust which by provision of statute "is deemed a direct conveyance" to himself, is subject to the right of dower.

(February 19, 1895.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to enforce a dower interest in land which had been purchased with money belonging to complainant's husband, the title to which had been taken in the name of a third person where it remained at the husband's death. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. L. Brick and Walter Funk, for appellant:

By one line of authorities a man may, bona fide, dispose of his personal property during life, even though it be done to defeat his wife's rights; but not when the transaction is merely colorable, a mere device, or testamentary in character, or in view of death.

By another line of authorities a conveyance of personal property to defeat a wife's claim at his death is void.

Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, §§ 490, 516; Goddard v. Snow, 1 Russ. 485; Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. 215, 39 Am. Dec. 501.

The general rule as to real estate is that any conveyance made, or procured to be made, by a husband during coverture of any property in which the wife by law has a wifely interest, the purpose of which being to defeat that interest, is voidable by the wife at her husband's death in so far as her interest appears.

14 Cent. L. J. 102.

A remainder to a child bought with the husband's money, will be treated in equity as the husband's conveyance, and in respect of the widow's dower right it will be regarded that the husband was, during coverture, seized of an estate of inheritance in the land which he had conveyed away. His directing the mode of conveyance with the special intent to defraud his wife of her dower raises a use in him to which the dower would attach.

To the same effect is the case of Orecelius v. Horst, 4 Mo. App. 419, and again is our case stronger than the one we cite.

Hackney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1881, Daniel B. Stroup and the appellant were husband and wife, and that relation continued until he died, intestate, in the year 1892, leaving him surviving, the appellant and the appellees, as his widow and only heirs at law. In January, 1881, he owned in fee simple a tract of land in St. Joseph county, which he sold for $6,400, his wife, the appellant, joining in the conveyance. Later, and in the same month, he purchased another tract of land, in said county, for the consideration of $12,948.73, which sum was paid by him, though $3,940.73 was paid of the said purchase price from the earnings of said tract. The deed conveying the tract so purchased was, at his direction, so made as to convey the fee to the appellee Daniel F. Stroup, subject to a life estate in said Daniel B. Stroup, and "to have and to hold the same unto the said Daniel F. Stroup, and his executors, to his and their issue, forever, upon the trust following, that is to say: The said Daniel F. Stroup and his heirs and executors in trust are, on the commencement of said trust estate, to enter on and take possession of and rent or farm said land to the best possible advantage, and, as soon as can be consistently done, shall sell and convey said land to such person or persons, and on such terms, and for such price or prices, as to him and them shall seem meet, either at public or private sale, with or without notice thereof; and the net proceeds of such sale shall first pay the widow of said Daniel B. Stroup, if he leaves one surviving him, the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and the residue of said net proceeds he or they shall divide equally among such children of said Daniel B. Stroup (including said Daniel F. Stroup, if he be then living) as may be living at the time of such distribution: provided that if either be dead, leaving them issue surviving them, the issue of such deceased child shall take such decedent's share: provided, however, that if, at any time during the life of Daniel B. Stroup, he, the said Daniel B. Stroup, shall request the said trustee and shall join in a deed therefor, the said trustee shall sell and convey said land in fee to such person or persons and upon such terms and uses as the said Daniel B. Stroup shall direct, and shall render and pay over and deliver to such Daniel B. Stroup all money and securities received on such sale." The appellant, claiming as widow the one third, in fee, of the lands so purchased, sued the appellees in three paragraphs of complaint, seeking to quiet title against the claim of the appellees as to said interest. Each paragraph alleges the foregoing facts and the additional facts that the said Daniel B. Stroup, in causing said lands so purchased to be conveyed to Daniel F. Stroup, desired and intended to cut off any claim of the appellant to an interest in said lands as his wife and as his widow, and that said lands, at the death of her husband, were of the value of $15,000. The first paragraph alleged that, with this purpose in view, the decedent fraudulently sold said tract, so first owned by him, and enticed the appellant to join in the conveyance thereof and with the same purpose, and, intending to defraud the appellant of an inchoate interest in said lands so purchased, caused the same to be conveyed as aforesaid, without her knowledge or consent. The second paragraph differs from the first in that it does not charge a fraudulent intent in selling said tract so first owned by the decedent. The third paragraph differs from the second only in its allegation that she signed the deed to the land conveyed by her husband "with the understanding and expectation from her husband, through his representation at the time, that he would buy other real estate with the . . . proceeds of the sale of the same, in which she would have her one-third interest." To these several paragraphs of complaint the circuit court sustained the appellees' demurrer for want of sufficient facts, and this ruling is the question for review.

In support of the ruling of the lower court, appellees' learned counsel insist that there are no allegations of actual or positive fraud, without which the complaint should be held insufficient; that the suit does not attack the conveyance in which the appellant joined, and alleges no active fraud in procuring her to so join, and, in consequence, the act of purchasing other lands, and causing them to be conveyed as alleged, was but the disposition of personal property, upon which there was no legal restraint by an interest of the appellant in lieu of dower; and that, the husband never having been seised of the lands in suit, the wife could have no inchoate interest therein, and would take nothing therefrom as widow. It is true that, ordinarily, the facts constituting the alleged fraud must be pleaded, and are not supplied by epithets. Curry v. Keyser, 80 Ind. 214; Bodkin v. Moritt, 103 Ind. 298. This rule would defeat the allegation of fraudulent enticement to the appellant to join in the conveyance, but if it can be maintained that an investment of personal assets in lands, the title to which is taken in the name of another, but colorably and is in fact held to the use and benefit of the husband, with intent to defeat any claim of the wife to an interest by virtue of her marital relation or as widow, is fraudulent as against such wife or widow, then the complaint is sufficient in pleading such facts. Indeed, it would be difficult to conceive acts more positive than those alleged at the same time consistent with the design alleged. It would require no sharp practice in making the purchase and no stratagem to induce the son to take a trust which was for his possible future benefit. But, if either or both were alleged, we are unable to see how they would add to the fraudulent character of the imposition upon the wife. In North Carolina and in Tennessee there are statutes forbidding and rendering fraudulent the transfers of property with intent to defeat dower. In those states it has been held that if the disposition is not meant to be simply what it purports to be, but if the donor intended that it should not interfere with his own enjoyment, but should hinder that of his wife, it would amount to the fraud contemplated by the statutes. Littleton v. Littleton, 18 N. C. 327; Brewer v. Connell, 11 Humph. 500; 14 Cent. L. J. 102.

If the same disposition may be held fraudulent in the absence of a statute which, under the statutes referred to, is fraudulent, there is no reason supporting the proposition that more positive acts are essential to the working of the fraud. In 14 Cent. L. J., supra, Judge Thompson states the rule as follows: "The books furnish a conclusive test by which to determine whether such a disposition is or is not good as against the wife's claim for dower. Was the disposition such as to cut off the seisin of the husband, and at the same time reserve to him the use of the property during his life, and to dispose of it absolutely to the exclusion of the rights of his wife upon his death? In other words, was it testamentary in its nature,—did it operate substantially as a will would have operated? Where this appears, I apprehend that all speculations about the motives or intent of the husband are idle. The law will conclusively fix to his act a fraudulent intent." We have no doubt that the facts are sufficiently pleaded to present the question as to the validity of the transaction as affecting the interests of the appellant in the lands purchased. It is probably true that at the time of the purchase there was no restriction upon the right of the husband to make complete disposition of his personal property by gift, destruction, or other means, and that such disposition would not affect any vested or inchoate interest of the wife in such property. It is sufficient to say, however, that the question is not so much one of the disposition of personal property as it is one of the fraudulent covering of an ownership of real estate. Here the husband purchased and paid the full consideration for the lands in question. He reserved to himself not only a life estate, under which he enjoyed the full uses of the lands, but he reserved such absolute dominion over the fee as to stay the operation of the colorable trust until after his death, and to control, without limitation or restriction, the sale of the fee; and the proceeds of the sale, it was carefully provided, should return to him. A mere statement of the transaction discloses more than a life estate in the husband, more than a mere equity in the fee, and at least a legal fee, charged only with a trust which, during the life of the husband, was executed fully by the signing of a deed to a purchaser from the cestui que trust, the husband and father. Such a trust has no validity, and the trustee possesses only a naked or nominal title, which does not impair the full ownership of the cestui que trust or beneficiary. This conclusion is sustained by the statute, and needs no resort to the adjudications. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3403 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2981), provides that "a conveyance or devise of lands to a trustee whose title is nominal only, and who has no power of disposition or management of such lands, is void as to the trustee, and shall be deemed a direct conveyance or devise to the beneficiary." Leaving out of view, for the moment, the element of the deed directing disposition of the property after the death of Daniel B. Stroup, we have no doubt that he was the only beneficiary, and possessed full power of disposition and management, and that the named trustee had no such power, and possessed but a nominal title. Gaylord v. Dodge, 31 Ind. 41, was a suit by a widow to enforce her claim as widow to one third of certain lands purchased by her husband, and conveyed by his vendor, without condition or limitation, to her stepson. By independent express trust, the grantee agreed to hold the lands in trust for and to convey absolutely to certain other children of the husband, upon request of the donor. The claim was defeated, upon the ground that there was no trust created in favor of the donor; that the children took the fee under the deed coupled with said trust; and that, therefore, the husband was not at any time seised in fee, and had no equitable interest at the date of his death, the conveyance by the trustee to the children having been executed. If the converse of this holding can be maintained,—and we have no doubt that it can,—the presence of a trust in favor of the donor under which no estate was vested in another and the absolute power of disposition and management were reserved to him,—the statute would operate on the conveyance itself, and execute the use, by declaring the conveyance void as to the trustee, and as directly vesting title in the beneficiary. The trust, as created, gave no present interest or title to the appellees, no right enforceable against Daniel B. Stroup in his lifetime, no property right that was the subject of sale and conveyance, no interest not completely subject to the control, even to the extent of revocation by him in case he should desire to sell the property. As to the appellees, by the expressed condition of the trust, the trust interest did not commence or arise until the death of their father, he not having then sold the land. The deed in question differs from those in Spencer v. Robbins, 106 Ind. 580, and Cates v. Cates, 185 Ind. 272, where the deeds directly and unequivocally conveyed a fee to the grantee, and followed the language of the grant with words held simply to postpone the enjoyment of the fee until after the death of the grantor. Here we have no grant to the appellees upon a condition postponing the enjoyment of the estate granted, but we have a grant to a trustee whose primary cestui quo trust is the father, and the condition is a part of the trust, and postpones ownership and title until after the death of the father, he not then having sold the land. "An instrument, having otherwise the formalities of a deed, will be construed to operate as a deed whenever it appears therefrom that it was the intent of the maker to convey any estate or interest whatever, to vest upon the execution of the paper. If, however, it appears that all the estate which it was the purpose to convey was reserved to the grantor during his life, and the deed was only to take effect upon the death of the grantor, it will be construed to be testamentary in its character." Spencer v. Robbins, supra; Wall v. Wall, 30 Miss. 91, 64 Am. Dec. 147; 19 Cent. L. J. 46; Leaver v. Gauss, 62 Iowa, 814; Turner v. Scott, 51 Pa. 126. In 19 Cent. L. J. 46, will be found an extended collection of the cases upon the subject of deeds of a testamentary character; and there, as in the cases we have cited, it is clearly and firmly settled that the pivotal question is the intention of the grantor. If to postpone title and enjoyment until after his death, it is testamentary; if to confer title and postpone the enjoyment thereof, it is a deed.

Under the allegations of the complaint before us, and upon the face of the deed, it was manifest that the intention of Daniel B. Stroup was to reserve all title, power of disposition, and management to himself, and to provide for a disposition of the property upon his death. The conveyance was what some of the judges have called "a will in disguise." It is unnecessary to decide whether, as a will, it is valid and effective to devise any part of the lands to the appellees. When we have found that, as a deed, it conveyed no interest to them, and that, under the statute of trusts and uses, the deed is "deemed a direct conveyance" to Daniel B. Stroup, we have met the most serious objection to the complaint; namely, that he never became seised, and no interest existed to which the widow's marital rights could attach. Absolute seisin during coverture is not always necessary to the enforcement of the widow's interest. The statute creating the interest (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2491) provides that "a surviving wife is entitled . . . to one third of all the real estate of which her husband may have been seised in fee simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined, in due form of law, and also of all lands in which her husband had an equitable interest at the time of his death." If the reservations of the deed in question did not, by the aid of the statute of trusts and uses, arise to the force of an estate in fee simple, he certainly held, by virtue of such reservations, an equitable interest at the time of his death. As we have shown, he paid the purchase money, and held by the express provisions of the trust, the uncontrolled power of sale to his own use and benefit; and, if the fee had been nominally in the trustee, that power of sale to his exclusive use was enforceable in a court of chancery, to the utter destruction of such nominal fee, and its full result would inure to the benefit of Daniel B. Stroup. If, however, this equitable interest, held by him at the time of his death, was not of that character contemplated by the statute last cited, it at least illustrates the proposition that an absolute seisin is not in all cases indispensable. Another illustration of this proposition is found in those cases which hold that conveyances in anticipation of marriage and intended to defeat dower are void. Dearmond v. Dearmond, 10 Ind. 191; Swaime v. Perrine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482, 1 L. ed. 1148, 9 Am. Dec. 818; Kelly v. McGrath, 70 Ala. 75, 45 Am. Rep. 75; Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. 219; Jones v. Jones, 64 Wis. 301; Lake v. Nolan, 81 Mich. 119; Youngs v. Carter, 10 Hun. 194; 14 Cent. L. J. 102; Boone, Real Prop. § 56; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 126. The last-named author (sec. 191) says: "In order that dower can attach, the husband must be seised of an estate of inheritance during coverture. But for this purpose it is not necessary that the husband should have the actual corporal seisin. Seisin in law, with a present right to actual seisin, would be sufficient." Mann v. Edison, 39 Me. 25; Atwood v. Atwood, 23 Pick. 283; Dunham v. Osborn, 1 Paige, 635, 2 L. ed. 780; Thomas v. Thomas, 32 N. C. 123; McIntyre v. Costello, 47 Hun, 269.

What we have said as to the effect of the statute of trusts in its operation upon the deed in question would be sufficient for the purpose of this case, and would secure the claim of the plaintiff; but we may add that, while the authorities are in conflict, the weight of authority is certainly in support of the conclusion that where the husband, intending to defeat the claim of his wife to dower, secures a conveyance of lands purchased by him to be made but colorably to another, and securing to himself the full use, control, and disposition of the property, such conveyance is fraudulent as against the wife, and she may, before or after his death, recover that part of the lands which, under the law, would have fallen to her in case the conveyance had been to her husband, instead of by the colorable device which held the actual seisin from him. McGee v. McGee, 26 N. C. 105; Dunnoch v. Dunnoch, 8 Md. Ch. 140; Hays v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337; Crecelius v. Horst, 4 Mo. App. 419; Busick v. Buzick, 44 Iowa, 259, 24 Am. Rep. 740; Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211; Sandborn v. Lang, 41 Md. 107; *Gilson v. In our judgment, the facts stated in each paragraph of the complaint stated a cause of action, and, if proven, would entitle the appellant to the relief prayed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to said complaint.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

D. D. JACKSON, Appt.,
v.
City of GREENVILLE.

(.....Miss.....)

A man of full age playing with a dog on a sidewalk and not going anywhere is not so using the walk as to entitle him to recover for injuries caused by defects therein.

(October 23, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County, in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in permitting its sidewalk to get out of repair. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

As a general rule in suits for damages growing out of negligence, it is not necessary for plaintiff to do more than make out a prima facie case.

Hickman v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 66 Miss. 156.

The trend of modern authorities, in their efforts to keep pace with the demands of an ever advancing civilization, is toward placing a more liberal construction upon the use to which streets and highways may be put.

The city owes substantially the same duty to children properly upon the streets, although engaged in play, as it does to travelers on business.

Murray v. McShane, 53 Md. 517, 36 Am. Rep. 367; Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 474.

At the moment of the accident appellant was in effect and to all intents and purposes a pedestrian on the sidewalk. At the time of the accident he had started in pursuit of his pup.

The evidence does not show how far the puppy was removed from appellant. Had he not sustained his injury, there is nothing to show how far it would have been necessary for him to have journeyed before overtaking his property.

One step in the pursuit of a lawful enterprise entitles appellant to just as much protection as if he had made a hundred steps.

Mr. J. H. Wynn for appellee.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellant for the recovery of damages for injuries sustained by him in consequence of defects in a sidewalk in the city of Greenville, negligently suffered to exist. To the declaration filed, appellee interposed the plea of the general issue, and gave notice thereunder (1) that the injury complained of was the result of plaintiff's own negligence; and (2) that at the time of the injury, and for a reasonable time before, the defendant city had exercised and exhausted all its powers, under the law, to raise money for the repair of its streets, and that all its funds were, at the time mentioned, exhausted. After all the evidence on both sides had been introduced, at the request of the appellee, the court instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant city; and from the judgment of the court, following such instruction, this appeal is prosecuted. We shall disincumber our consideration of the appeal by omitting any reference to the notice of exhaustion of power and funds on the part of the municipality, as no evidence to support it was offered, and by omitting any discussion of the question of the contributory negligence of the appellant, and confine ourselves to this single question, viz.: Was the appellant, at the time of receiving the injury, making such use of the street and sidewalk as will entitle him to a recovery for hurt suffered by reason of defects in the sidewalk?

It is elementary law that streets are primarily designed to be used for purposes of transportation and travel; and the authorities are uniform to the effect that, in the absence of any express statute creating liability, municipal corporations, clothed with plenary and exclusive control over their streets, are yet liable, by implication, for injuries resulting to persons properly using such streets, for failure to maintain the same in a reasonably safe condition for travel. That the rule as stated is substantially recognized and applied by the courts in cases of statutory and of implied liability will appear by examination of the adjudications of courts of last resort in both classes, and any seeming want of harmony will, in most instances, appear to have arisen from failure to confine the language of the several courts to the facts of the particular case. What are the facts as shown in the evidence introduced on trial below by the appellant, which are supposed by counsel for appellee to bar any recovery herein? We quote from the testimony of the appellant: "The accident occurred in this way: I had a puppy there, and I took the puppy out on the sidewalk, and was playing with him; and he jerked loose from me, and I made a step to catch it, and my foot slipped into one of those cracks, and jerked me down, and, before I could recover, the plank flew up, and struck me on my leg. My foot was fastened in the crack. It was my right foot in the crack. I had my left foot on the ground, and I jerked my right foot up, and the plank flew up, and struck me on the left leg. It produced a compound fracture of my leg." On cross-examination the appellant said: "I was playing with a dog when the accident happened. I went out to the sidewalk. I had a pointer puppy there, and was playing with it. It tried to get away from me, and my foot slipped off the plank, and went into the crack; and in reaching over, I tried to pull my foot out, and the plank flew up, and struck me on the leg. My leg was broken. . . . The plank ran on the sidewalk crosswise. My foot was caught crosswise. Was standing rather crosswise. Was walking along when the accident occurred. Was playing with the dog. Was going nowhere. . . . My face was turned towards the fence; turned south. The dog was running between me and the paling, and I stooped to catch him, and my foot slipped." The case thus presented is that of a man of full age using the sidewalk, not for the purpose of travel, either for business or exercise or pleasure, but for the sole purpose of playing with a dog. The appellant had come out of his boarding house to the sidewalk. He was standing, and was not going anywhere. He was playing with the dog, and was standing with his back to the roadway, and his face turned towards the palings, when, in an effort to catch the dog, running between him and the fence, he stepped and received his injury. Can it be satisfactorily gathered from the above statement that the appellant, when hurt, was making such reasonable use of the street or its sidewalk, at the time of receiving the injury complained of, as will bring him within the category of those for whom streets and sidewalks are designed? Was he a traveler on or along the street, who, incidentally halting or turning aside upon his way, received his hurt? Was the municipality under any duty to the appellant to keep in repair the sidewalk so that he might safely use it for the purpose of his play with the dog? Streets, we repeat, are designed for travel, primarily; and though it must be conceded that one using the street for travel may incidentally cease to move on continuously, and yet not lose his right as a traveler on the highway, yet it cannot be deduced from this concession that one not using the street for travel may, nevertheless, convert it or part of it, into a playground, and in so using it, if injury occur while so using or misusing the street, by reason of defects in it, hold the negligent municipality liable. To recover, the injured party must fix liability upon the municipality; and, to fix liability, the sufferer must show failure on its part to discharge a duty to him. But the duty to repair and keep in reasonably safe condition streets and sidewalks is due only to those using the highways for the purposes of their creation. If a football team appropriate a street to its uses in playing a game, and one of the players fall into a hole in the roadway, and injury result, would any one be found to say that he could rightfully complain and recover? In such case the injured player clearly would be frustrating the very end for which highways are ordained, viz., the convenient and safe transportation and travel of property and persons. It seems to us indisputable that one contravening the law of the creation, and the ends for which it was created, cannot be heard to complain if ill befall him because of his own wrongdoing.

Many cases have been examined by us where liability was imposed and recovery had for injuries to children, not of the age of discretion, when playing on the streets or highways; but all such cases, on well-understood legal principles, are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. Chicago v. Keefe, 114 Ill. 222, 55 Am. Rep. 860, and Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 580, 58 Am. Rep. 65, cited in the brief of appellant's counsel, are of this character. Our own adjudications are along the same line, in like cases. Mackey v. Vickburg, 64 Miss. 777; Vickburg v. McLain, 67 Miss. 4. When we come to consider the cases referred to by the counsel wherein adults received injuries in streets, we shall discover that none of them, on their facts, at all resemble the case at bar. The story, lucid, and caustically humorous opinion in Varney v. Manchester, 58 N. H. 430, 40 Am. Rep. 592, was upon these facts, in a word, viz.: Varney, the plaintiff, went to a certain street in Manchester for the purpose of seeing a procession form on Decoration Day. He went down one side of the street to the place where the procession was forming, and crossed over the street to get a better view. He stood looking at the forming of the procession, near a pile of lumber; and, after so standing and looking from three to five minutes, the lumber fell, and crushed his foot. Held, that a person is "traveling upon a highway" when he is making a reasonable use of a highway as a way, and that the law does not prescribe how long one may stand on a street without ceasing to use the way as a way; but that the question was one of reasonable use, and this was for a jury's determination, if there is any evidence on which they could properly find the use was reasonable. The case of Murray v. McShane, 53 Md. 217, 86 Am. Rep. 367, is that of an adult lawfully passing along a street, and stopping for an instant on a doorstep of a house fronting the street, for the purpose of adjusting his shoe, and suffering injury in consequence of a brick falling from a dilapidated wall, negligently permitted to remain there. Held, that travelers on a street have not only the right to pass, but to stop on necessary and reasonable occasions, so they do not obstruct the street or doorway. In Duffy v. Dubuque, 68 Iowa, 171, 50 Am. Rep. 748, the facts were that Duffy, who was a workman, went to the corner of the two intersecting streets for the purpose of doing some work on a house there situated. After he had unloaded some stuff from a wagon, he went along the sidewalk to a hydrant eight feet in rear of the house and a foot or two from the line of the sidewalk. While in the act of drawing water from the hydrant, with one foot on the ground, and the other on the sidewalk, a section of a roof, negligently left standing near, was blown over by a gust of wind, fell on Duffy, and inflicted the injuries of which he complained. Held, that Duffy's stopping to draw water as stated was the exercise of a privilege which he might lawfully enjoy, and was a mere incident to the general use of the street which he was making.

The opinions of the New England courts, where liability in the character of cases which we are considering is of statutory creation, and in which, as is sometimes charged, extreme and antiquated views are announced, it will be found, on careful analysis, are not out of general accordance with the spirit of the most, not to say all, of the decisions elsewhere which we have examined. In the case of Blodgett v. Boston, 8 Allen, 237, while the court deny the liability of the city for injuries received by a boy eleven years old, who was using the plank sidewalk on the street with another boy for purpose of play only, yet the opinion is careful to limit the effect of the decision by saying: "We do not certainly think any narrow or restricted signification should be given to the word 'traveler,' as used in the statute. It may well embrace within its meaning, as applied to the subject-matter, every one, whatever may be his age or condition, who has occasion to pass over the highway for any purpose of business, convenience, or pleasure. We by no means intend to say that a child who receives an injury caused by a defect or want of repair in a road or street, while passing over or through it, would be barred of all remedy against a town merely because, at the time of the occurrence of the accident, he was also engaged in some childish sport or amusement. There would exist in such case the important element that the person injured was actually traveling over the way. But this element is wholly wanting in the case at bar." Here, as in the case just quoted from, the important element of actual use of the way for the purpose of travel is wholly absent. Here, as there, the case shows an appropriation of a sidewalk to a use other than, and inconsistent with, that for which the highway was established. Here, however, the offender against the rights of the public was an adult, and not a child of debatable discretion. Here, in addition, the play with the dog was not a mere incident to the general and proper use of the sidewalk by the appellant in passing along or over it. The city owed him no duty in his situation, and using the street as he was doing. The duty was on the municipality to keep and maintain the street in reasonably safe repair for travel, and liability ensues, upon injury befalling one going along or over it, whether for purposes of business or pleasure, by reason of failure to keep and perform this duty. But to one simply using the street or sidewalk as a playground the city owed no duty to keep its streets for him so engaged in any repair.

(January 6, 1896.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from custody to which he has been committed for alleged violation of a city ordinance. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. V. Morehouse, Hiram D. Tuttle, and J. E. Richards for petitioner.
Mr. C. C. Bennett for respondent.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner is under sentence of imprisonment for a violation of an ordinance of the city of Redlands, and seeks to be discharged on habeas corpus upon the ground that said ordinance is wholly invalid and void. The ordinance is entitled, "An ordinance to promote safety and security to public travel by prohibiting the beating of drums and certain other noises on the traveled streets or avenues of the city of Redlands without special permission therefor, and authorizing such permission in certain cases;" and in the body of the ordinance it is made an offense, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for any person to, among other things, "beat a drum" upon any traveled street of the city "without special permit in writing so to do first had and obtained from the president of the board of trustees of said city, which permit the president of said board may grant whenever, in his judgment, the issuance of the same shall not conflict with the aforesaid purposes of this ordinance, and not otherwise, provided that such permit shall specify the time when and the street or avenue where any of said instruments shall be so used as aforesaid." Petitioner was convicted of beating a drum on the traveled streets of said city without a permit, contrary to the said provisions of said ordinance. It appears from the petition that petitioner had been in the habit of beating a drum on the streets daily, and that, upon his application to the president of the board for a permit "to engage in beating a drum as he had been heretofore doing," the permit was refused; although, as appears from the petition, he was given a permit to beat his drum upon a certain occasion. He claims the right to beat his drum,—not on special occasions only, as other people, but every day, without a permit, and despite the ordinance.

There is no need of discussing the general power and right of a city to prohibit such noises on the streets as those made by the beating of drums. We do not understand counsel for petitioner as contesting such power. At all events, it certainly exists. But the point urged by petitioner is that the ordinance is void because it gives a certain officer authority to give permits to beat drums on special occasions; and this position is the only one which needs examination. It is contended that the clause authorizing a permit is partial and oppressive, because it gives too much power to the president of the board, and is violative of general constitutional principles against abridging the privileges of citizens, depriving a person of his rights without due process of law, denying him the equal protection of the law, etc. The continuous or daily beating of drums on the streets of a city would be an intolerable nuisance,—endangering the safety of teams and the occupants of vehicles drawn by animals, as well as of pedestrians liable to be injured by runaways, and stunning the ears with din so constant as to be almost insufferable. On the other hand, there is usually no objection to such noises on a few special occasions,—either when there are patriotic celebrations, generally participated in by all the people, or processions of a part of the people united in civic societies, political parties, etc. These occasions are comparatively few, and usually well known, so that people are prepared for them; and the processions and drums are generally preceded by policemen, who give notice of the approaching uproar. But how can these occasions be provided for? By an ordinance which shall anticipate and state in detail beforehand every occasion on which the noises may be made? Such a thing is practically impossible. No human foresight could conjure up all the circumstances under which the people might want a band (with a drum) on the streets. It would not do to name legal holidays alone; that, for obvious reasons, would be too narrow a provision. Neither would it do to single out, in addition to legal holidays, certain other enumerated days, as for instance, the first Monday of every month; the president of the United States, or some other distinguished man whose advent should be celebrated with drums, might come on Tuesday. Neither would it be possible to schedule the kinds or characters of occasions of which drumbeats would be a necessary part. And so the practical result of petitioner's contention is that all persons must be allowed to beat drums on all occasions as they may choose, or no person must be allowed to beat a drum on any occasion whatever.

In dealing with this and similar questions,—such as repairs of wooden buildings within fire limits, carrying concealed weapons, using public buildings and grounds, ringing bells on buildings where many operatives are employed, haranguing on the streets by lecturers, preachers, etc., singing or playing on musical instruments on the streets, and the like,—our federal, state, and municipal governments have always recognized the practical impossibility of providing in advance for proper exceptional cases, and the necessity of giving to a public officer some discretion in the premises; and laws and ordinances based on that principle have nearly always been upheld when subjected to judicial test. Laws are not made upon the theory of the total depravity of those who are elected to administer them; and the presumption is that municipal officers will not use these small powers villainously and for purposes of oppression and mischief. Of course, it is impossible to state in terms the extent or the limitation of what is known as the "police power;" and courts have not attempted to do it. Whether or not that power has been exceeded in particular cases must be determined as the cases arise; and to find the law applicable to a particular case we must look to see what courts have held in similar cases. And we find that statutes and ordinances similar in character to the one in question in the case at bar have been sustained in most of the cases to which our attention has been called. We will notice a few of them. Statutes and ordinances have been sustained prohibiting awnings without the consent of the mayor and aldermen (Pedrick v. Bailey, 13 Gray, 161); forbidding orations, harangues, etc., in a park, without the prior consent of the park commissioners (Com. v. Abrahams, 156 Mass. 57); or upon the common or other grounds, except by the permission of the city government committee (Com. v. Davis, 140 Mass. 485); "beating any drum or tambourine, or making any noise with any instrument for any purpose whatever, without written permission of the president of the village" on any street or sidewalk (Vance v. Hadfield, 22 N. Y. S. R. 858); giving the right to manufacturers and others to ring bells and blow whistles in such manner and at such hours as the board of aldermen or selectmen may in writing designate (Sawyer v. Davis, 186 Mass. 289, 49 Am. Rep. 37); prohibiting the erecting or repairing of a wooden building without the permission of the board of aldermen (Hins v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478); authorizing harbor masters to station vessels, and to assign to each its place (Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349); forbidding the occupancy of a place on the street for a stand without the permission of the clerk of Faneuil Hall market (Nightingale, Petitioner, 11 Pick. 168); forbidding the keeping of swine without a permit in writing from the board of health (Quincy v. Kennard, 151 Mass. 563); forbidding the erection of any kind of a building without a permit from the commissioners of the town through their clerk (Easton Comrs. v. Covey, 74 Md. 262); forbidding any person from remaining within the limits of the market more than twenty minutes unless permitted so to do by the superintendent or his deputy. Com. v. Brooks, 109 Mass. 355. In Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration an ordinance which, among other things, prohibited the carrying on of the business of a laundry without certificates from the health officer and the board of fire wardens; and, while that part of the ordinance was not directly involved, the court says as follows: "In the case before us, the provisions requiring certificates from the health officer and the board of fire wardens may, in some instances, be unnecessary, and the changes to be made to meet the conditions prescribed may be burdensome; but, as we have seen, this is a matter for the determination of the municipality in the execution of its police powers, and not the violation of any substantial right 27 L. R. A.

of the individual." Many other authorities to the same point as those above noticed might be collected outside of the decisions in our own state. In this state it was held in Ex parte Casinello, 62 Cal. 538, that an ordinance giving to the superintendent of public streets the power to determine where, either on a public street or on private premises, any person could deposit "any glass, broken ware, dirt, rubbish, garbage or filth," was a salutary and valid "police regulation." In the Case of Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88, it was held that the city council had authority to make the issuance of a license for the sale of liquors conditional upon the appellant's obtaining a permit from the board of police commissioners. In Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, an ordinance prohibiting the selling of pools on horse races, except within the inclosure of a race track where the race is to be run, was upheld, and it was declared not to be void because its effect might be "to confer a special privilege or benefit upon those who own or control the race courses." In Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, an ordinance was upheld which prohibited the repair of a wooden building within certain fire limits without permission in writing signed by a majority of the fire wardens and approved by a majority of the committee on fire department and the mayor. In that case we said as follows: "It is clear, however, that a literal compliance with the regulation prohibiting the repairing of a wooden building might work in some instances useless hardships. The repair of a leaking roof or a broken window would be necessary to the comfort and health of a family, without enhancing the danger which the framers of the ordinance sought to provide against; and repairs of a more extensive character might be made to particular houses, standing in particular localities, without increasing the fire risks. And it is equally clear that no general rule could be established beforehand that would meet the emergencies of individual cases. Therefore the power to give relief in particular instances is conferred on certain officers; and it is not to be presumed that they will exercise it wantonly, or for purposes of profit or oppression." In Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, this court upheld an ordinance prohibiting the business of a retail liquor dealer unless he procured the permission of a majority of the board of police commissioners, or, upon their refusal, the permission of twelve property owners in the block. The foregoing authorities, in our opinion, clearly establish the validity of the ordinance here in question.

Counsel for petitioner rely on some cases—particularly State v. Dering, 84 Wis. 585, 19 L. R. A. 588, and Fraser's Case, 63 Mich. 396, which, at first blush, seem to conflict with the general current of authorities as above presented. But upon closer examination they will be found to go upon a distinction or principle—whether sound or not—that is not applicable to the case at bar. They are based upon the theory that the lawful inherent rights of men cannot be entirely suppressed or destroyed by statute or ordinance, but can only be regulated; and that all regulations of such rights must be uniform, etc. The cases cited all deal with ordinances regulating the right of the people to have processions or parades in the streets; and it is this right that is discussed, although the accompaniment of music is mentioned in some of the ordinances. In the Wisconsin case, supra, the petitioner "was convicted of parading the streets." Now, the public have an undoubted right to travel on the street; that is what a street is for. And to march along a street in a procession is merely to exercise the right to travel on it. Therefore, if the cases under review be sound, this right can only be regulated, and cannot entirely be suppressed; and the regulation must be uniform,—"although it is difficult to understand how the crowded streets of a city could be practically regulated in this respect without vesting some discretion in the police authorities. At all events, the cases referred to deal with a right. But the proposition that a man has a natural, ingrained, inviolate, common-law, or constitutional right to beat a drum on the traveled streets of a city has no foundation in reason or authority. As, therefore, it is not a right that may not be entirely suppressed, it may be regulated as the law-making power may determine. In Ex parte Tuttle, supra, it was held that, as betting on horse races was demoralizing in its tendencies, and an evil, it could be suppressed by ordinance; and that, as it could be suppressed, no one could be heard to complain of an ordinance regulating it because thereby special privileges accrued to particular persons. And in Ex parte Christensen this court distinctly declared that such is the rule. The court said: "The objection is that this makes the license depend upon the arbitrary will and pleasure of the board of fire commissioners. . . . But, whatever force this objection might have in reference to licenses to carry on the ordinary vocations of life, which are not supposed to have any injurious tendencies, it has no force in the present case. It is well settled that the governing power may prohibit the manufacture and traffic in liquor altogether, provided only it does not interfere with interstate commerce. And, if the governing power can prohibit a thing altogether, it can impose such conditions upon its existence as it pleases. . . . Even if it be conceded that the conditions were arbitrary, they were within the power of the board." In the ordinance involved in the case at bar, there is no attempt to suppress processions or parades. It does not interfere with travel, but seeks to promote the comfort, convenience, and safety of travelers by preventing that which makes traveling uncomfortable and dangerous. Its provisions do not affect private premises, but refer solely to public traveled streets. It prohibits no business which every one has a right to pursue. As the wants and comfort and pleasure of the public require that the thing prohibited, although in the abstract injuriously annoying, should on special occasions be allowed, the ordinance provides for permitting the thing to be done on such occasions; and the granting of such privileges is not taking away the right to do the thing from others, because they have no such right. When the public welfare requires it, a nuisance may, for special purposes, be permitted. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown, 67 Ind. 45, 33 Am. Rep. 73; Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239, 49 Am. Rep. 27. As all such occasions cannot be foreseen and provided for by special enactment, some small discretion in the premises is granted to a certain officer; and that discretion to grant a permit is limited to instances where "the issuance of the same shall not conflict with the aforesaid purposes of this ordinance," viz., "to promote safety and security to public travel." The validity of such an ordinance is clearly established by the current of authorities, some of which are hereinbefore cited. It is entirely within the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in Orowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 84 L. ed. 620, which case also furnishes an answer to petitioner's claim of support from Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 373, 30 L. ed. 227.

In our opinion, the ordinance here involved is valid, and the petitioner should be remanded.

The writ is dismissed, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the marshal.

Harrison, J., dissenting:

The authority of the city to make police regulations is given by the constitution, and, although it is derived directly from the people, instead of mediately through the legislature, through the municipal government act, yet it is a legislative power, and, like any other legislative power, is to be exercised by the body to which the power has been intrusted. The power to make laws is a sovereign power, and its exercise by the legislative body of a municipality, being a delegated power, cannot be delegated to any other body or individual. Mr. Dillon says (Mun. Corp. 96): "The principle is a plain one that the public powers or trusts devolved by law or charter upon the council or governing body, to be exercised by it when and in such manner as it shall judge best, cannot be delegated to others." Mr. Cooley says (Const. Lim. p. 248): "So far as its functions are legislative, they rest in the discretion and judgment of the municipal body intrusted with them, and that body cannot refer the exercise of the power to the discretion and judgment of its subordinates, or of any other authority." This inhibition includes, not only the ordinance itself which is to be adopted, but also the individuals upon whom it is to operate, as well as the times and places in which it is to be in operation. The legislative body of the municipality cannot delegate to one of its members, or to any executive officer of the city, the power to determine whether an ordinance shall be operative upon certain individuals, or at certain times, any more than it can delegate to him the power to determine whether the ordinance shall be adopted, or shall have any operation; nor can it confer upon such officer the power to exempt any individual that he may choose from the operation of the ordinance. "No man's rights can be submitted, under a constitutional government, to the discretion of anybody." Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 556. Whenever the question has been presented for determination, it has been uniformly held that an ordinance which confers upon an executive officer of the city the right to determine by his own will whether it shall be in operation or not in the particular cases to which it is directed is invalid. If the act covered by the ordinance is one which the individual has no inherent right to perform, or which the municipality may prohibit altogether, a privilege to perform the act may be made to depend upon the compliance with certain conditions or the previous approval of another officer. If, however, the act is lawful or proper in itself, and improper only as it may affect the public, the power of the municipality is limited to a regulation of its exercise, and such regulation must be indicated by fixed and definite rules, and cannot be left to the arbitrament of any officer. This rule is not to be confounded with the execution of the ordinance by the officers intrusted therewith. The enforcement of the ordinance by the executive officer of the city is entirely distinct from determining whether the ordinance, when adopted, shall be in force. The policeman may have a discretion to determine whether an obstruction of the streets by an individual is such a violation of an ordinance forbidding the obstruction as will warrant his arrest, but neither he nor any other officer can have the power to determine whether the ordinance itself shall be suspended for the benefit of that individual, or can give to such individual the right to disregard the ordinance. The right of the harbor master to station vessels at different points in the harbor, or of the policeman to prescribe the order of carriages at a theater, or of the superintendent of streets to designate a place for dumping garbage, is not the exercise of a legislative power, but rather the act of an executive officer to enforce the ordinance. Accordingly, it has been held that an ordinance conferring upon the mayor the right to determine whether a stationary steam engine should be removed was void, as conferring upon him a power which could only be exercised by the city council (Baltimore v. Badecke, 49 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 289); that an ordinance providing that no person should erect any building within the city limits without having obtained permission from the board of aldermen is void, since it does not prescribe a uniform rule of action for governing the exercise of their discretion (State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 15 L. R. A. 423); that an ordinance forbidding the erection of livery stables in any block without the consent of the owners of land in the block is invalid (St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20 L. R. A. 721); that an ordinance making it unlawful for persons to parade a public street, singing or beating drums, or playing upon musical instruments, without having obtained the consent of the mayor, is void upon the ground that it does not fix the conditions uniformly and impartially, and is unreasonable (Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 173, 2 L. R. A. 110; Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396; Rich v. Naperville, 42 Ill. App. 222; State v. Dering, 84 Wis. 585, 19 L. R. A. 858); that an ordinance that no parades or processions shall be allowed upon the streets without a permit from the police department is invalid, because it leaves the power of restraining processions to an unregulated official discretion, when the whole matter, if regulated at all, must be by permanent legal provisions operating generally and impartially. Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 480.

There are many cases in which ordinances containing such a provision have been upheld, but in these cases the effect of such a provision upon the ordinance was not considered by the court; the only question presented to it for its consideration being the validity or invalidity of the ordinance upon other grounds. In these cases the act of the court in sustaining the ordinance cannot be regarded as an affirmance of the power to include this provision. Ordinances relating to health and security from fire, which prohibit certain acts without a permit from officers in charge of those departments, have been sustained upon the ground that the safety of the citizen from disease and fire were of a peculiar character, demanding the supervision of officers particularly skilled in reference thereto, and to whose judgment the matter could be more appropriately referred. The principles applicable to these ordinances, and under which they may be upheld, have, however, no application to the ordinance under discussion. There is another line of cases in which ordinances have been upheld which reserved to the city council or to the legislative body itself the power to exempt individuals from their operation. This is, however, entirely consistent with the principle above laid down. It is not a delegation of legislative authority, but is an exercise of that authority by the legislative body itself. In the absence of any restrictions upon its exercise of the legislative power intrusted to it, the city council has the same power to enact ordinances applicable only to special portions of the city, or to designated classes or individuals, as would the legislature of the state in the absence of constitutional restrictions; and it may equally enact an ordinance exempting individuals or classes from the operation of an ordinance, or suspending the operation of the ordinance entirely. This rule also includes another class of cases in which an exemption from the ordinance is made by some particular branch of the city government. The entire legislative power which is delegated to a municipality is not always conferred upon the city council. It may be portioned out to the different departments of the city, and authority conferred upon those departments to legislate upon the matters peculiarly intrusted to their care. The park commissioners may have exclusive authority to determine the manner and times in which the parks shall be used. The health department may have the authority to enact sanitary regulations for the entire city. Similar powers may be intrusted to the school department, the harbor commissioners, the police commissioners, for the enactment of ordinances relating to certain subjects. The ordinance under consideration falls within the rule hereinbefore referred to, and should be declared invalid. It confers upon the president of the board of trustees the power to suspend its operation in favor of any individual, whenever he may elect, and to deny the same favor to another who may be equally entitled to its suspension. It, in fact, confers upon him the power to determine the extent to which the ordinance shall be operative, which is in reality the power to determine whether there shall be such an ordinance. The only limitation upon the exercise of this power is his own judgment that the permit will not conflict with the purposes of the ordinance. This is a pure and simple delegation to him of the legislative power which has been conferred upon the trustees themselves. It is not enough to say that it must be presumed that this officer will act properly. The question is not whether a power that has been conferred will be properly exercised, but whether there has been any authority given to confer the power. If there has not, it is no answer to say that it will not be abused. In a country under the government of laws, the conduct of its citizens cannot be subjected to the arbitrary will of any individual. The mildest despotism has no place in a constitutional government. Beating a drum is not a nuisance per se, or in violation of the rights of others, and it does not of necessity interfere with the usual and proper use of the public streets. The authority of the trustees of the city to regulate the use of the streets, or the beating of drums thereon, is not denied, but the "regulation" must be made by the city, and cannot be delegated by it to the president of the board of trustees.

In my opinion, the ordinance is invalid, and the prisoner should be discharged.

*The guaranty contained in section ten of the Bill of Rights, that an accused person shall have a "trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed," does not require that the trial shall take place within the judicial district where the indictment is found; and under section 7283, Revised Statutes, the court in which an indictment is returned may, on motion of the accused, if an impartial jury cannot be had there, order that he be tried in any adjoining county.

(March 12, 1896.)

Statement by Shauck, J.:

On the 8th day of March, 1894, one Sarah Snell was indicted for a felony in Wayne county.

She moved in the court of common pleas for a change of venue, and the court, finding that she could not have a fair and impartial trial in Wayne county, sustained her motion and ordered that she be tried in the county of Stark which adjoins Wayne but is not in the same judicial district. The original indictment, and certified transcript of the proceedings were sent to the clerk of the court of common pleas of Stark county. The defendant, Hon. Thomas T. McCarty, who is a judge of the court of common pleas holding the term of said court in Stark county, being of the opinion that his court is without jurisdiction to try the accused, refuses to proceed.

The relator prays for a writ of mandamus commanding him as such judge to proceed with the trial of the said cause.

Messrs. J. K. Richards, Atty. Gen., Ross W. Funck, Aguila Wiley, and A. D. Metz for relator.

Mr. A. A. Thayer, for respondent:

Counties and judicial districts for the trial of crimes existed in the northwest territory at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1802.

The phrase "county or district," found in that instrument, will be held to have reference to such existing counties and districts.

Ordinance of 1787.

The same word used more than once in the same act shall be presumed to have been used each time in the same sense, unless a different intention appears therein.

Rhodes v. Weldy, 46 Ohio St. 284; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 255.

The term "district," as used in the bill of rights, contemplated a greater district than a county.

The terms "county" or "district," as used in the clause, must both be held to have meaning and a use.

Re Eldred and Re Ford, 46 Wis. 548; Wheeler v. State, 24 Wis. 58; State v. Knapp, 40 Kan. 149; Oliver v. State, 11 Neb. 1.

The term "district" here undoubtedly means judicial district, for the Constitution creates these districts; and when it says that certain trials shall be in a "district" it cannot but mean that district in which the court exists and has its jurisdiction.

State v. McGahan, 27 Ohio St. 280; State v. Myers, 21 Ohio L. J. 61.

Common pleas judges are only officers of their judicial districts, and have no extrajudicial powers.

Const. art. 4, §§ 3, 10, 12, 15; Ex parte Judges (Dist. Court Case) 84 Ohio St. 431; Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Sloan, 81 Ohio St. 2.

Shauck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The order of the court of common pleas of Wayne county, as counsel agree, is within the terms of section 7263, Revised Statutes: "All criminal cases shall be tried in the county where the offense was committed, unless it appear to the court, by affidavits, that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had therein; in which case the court shall direct that the person accused be tried in some adjoining county."

But the contention of counsel for the defendant is that the natural import of the terms of the statute must be restricted, to the end that it may not conflict with section 10, article 1, of the Constitution which guarantees to "the party accused . . . a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed." The rule of interpretation suggested is familiar; and its application here is said to require that the statute be so read that the place of trial shall be changed to an adjoining county of the judicial district. The argument is that as the word "district" is used in this section of the bill of rights with reference to the place where a judicial inquiry shall be conducted, it should be understood as meaning one of the judicial districts for whose creation the constitution makes provision. The force and aptness of this reasoning are apparent; and it seems to have controlled the decisions in some of the cases cited from other states. Although the question is, so far as we know, not settled by any adjudication in this state, we are aware that in, at least, some of the districts, the practice has been in such cases to order that the accused be tried in an adjoining county of the same district; though this course may have been prompted by a desire to avoid the question which we are now required to determine.

Whether the considerations stated are entitled to controlling effect must be determined by opposing considerations suggested by other provisions of the constitution the purpose for which this guaranty was inserted in the bill of rights and the generally understood meaning of its terms at the time of its adoption.

Section three of article four ordains that "the state shall be divided into nine common pleas districts, of which the county of Hamilton shall constitute one; and section twelve of article eleven, making the apportionment for judicial purposes that: "The county of Hamilton shall constitute the first district, which shall not be subdivided."

We cannot adopt the view of counsel for the defendant, unless we are prepared also to adopt the view, which these provisions would make inevitable, that the trial of one accused in Hamilton county cannot be changed to any other county. In this connection, and in the view that the law providing for a change of venue is of a general nature, the provision of section 76, article 2, is significant: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state." A law of this nature can have no operation anywhere, unless there be such interpretation of this cause in the bill of rights as will permit it to operate everywhere.

The source of jurisdiction to try an accused person is found in other provisions of the constitution. This clause guarantees to him the personal right indicated. The substance of that right is a trial before an impartial jury of the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, or so near thereto that he may have the legitimate benefit of his own reputation and that of his witnesses, and that he may, with as much certainty and as little expense and inconvenience as are practicable, secure the attendance of his witnesses. For the preservation of that right the accessibility of the place of trial is highly important. Whether the boundary of a judicial district intervenes, is of no importance whatever. Weyrich v. People, 89 Ill. 90.

That the term "district" is not used in the sense of judicial district is indicated by other provisions of the instrument. Although section twelve, article eleven, apportions the state for judicial purposes, the general assembly is authorized to erect new counties and attach them to a convenient district, and by section 15, article 4, it is vested with continuing power to change the districts, or to increase or diminish the number of the districts. It is not, therefore, by irrevocable provision of the constitution, but by the acquiescence of the legislature, that the counties of Wayne and Stark are indifferent judicial districts. If the general assembly should so exercise the powers thus expressly granted as to place these counties in the same judicial district, the ground of the defendant's contention would disappear. The insubstantial character of the objection to the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas of Stark county appears when we remember that there can be no denial of the authority of the general assembly to provide for the trial there, and there is really nothing more than a doubt as to the form in which the undoubted power has been exercised.

There is no constitutional right to a trial in an adjoining county, unless it is implied in the use of the word, "district." If that should be construed to mean the judicial district, it would result that the place of trial might be changed to a remote county of the district, whereby the right guaranteed would be seriously impaired. The provision of the statute, that, in the case contemplated, the place of trial shall be changed to an adjoining county, is a legislative interpretation of the constitutional guaranty. That interpretation regards the district as the vicinity; and it is to be commended unless inflexible rules forbid the preservation of the guaranteed right with its highest value.

It would perhaps be unprofitable, if it were practicable, to seek the meaning of this term beyond the bill of rights in the Constitution of 1802, whence it was immediately derived, when incorporated into the present constitution. In the former constitution the term could not have had the meaning now claimed for it by counsel for the defendant, since the judicial district, eo nomine, was unknown in that instrument. When the language was so derived from the former constitution, it had for thirty-five years received the same practical interpretation which is now questioned. By the seventeenth section of the Act entitled, "An Act pointing out the mode of trying criminals," passed February 26, 1816, the general assembly provided for the enforcement of the constitutional guaranty, by a change of the place of trial to an "adjoining county," if a proper jury could not be had in that in which the offense was committed. We adopt a familiar and salutary rule of interpretation when we hold that these words were adopted into the present constitution, with the same meaning they were known to have in that from which they were derived.

To myself this conclusion, reached after a careful consideration of the reasons involved, is not less satisfactory because at variance with tentative views previously entertained.

ERROR to the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of Cincinnati to review a judgment in favor of complainants in a proceeding to enjoin the collection of certain assessments. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Dickman, Ch. J.:

The original action was begun in the superior court of Cincinnati by Henry Batsche, one of the defendants in error, on behalf of himself and other persons named in his petition, to wit: Margaret Wilmer, the Walton Architectural Iron Company, the American Cotton Oil Company, Clifford Perin, Johanna Kirkpatrick, the Queen City Spring Company, Charles Harkness, F. A. Sudbeck Heirs and H. W. Schorffelde, to enjoin the collection of a special assessment levied by the city of Cincinnati, one of the plaintiffs in error, on their property abutting on Culvert street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, in said city, to pay the cost of condemning property to widen and open Culvert street to its full width between said points.

Prior to July 23, 1887, Culvert street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, was partly opened to the width of forty-three feet, but at the corner of Fifth street was only open about twenty feet, a lot belonging to the said Clifford Perin extending out into the street for about twenty-three feet at Fifth street, and running back about 166 or 167 feet and extending about fourteen feet into the street at the rear, as shown by the plat attached to the original petition of which the following is a copy:

STREET.

This lot, so projecting into the lines of the street and shown by crossed lines on the plat, was condemned and appropriated by ordinance of the city of Cincinnati duly passed July 22, 1887. Said ordinance directed the city solicitor of said city to institute the necessary proceedings in a proper court to ascertain the compensation to be paid the owners of said ground so condemned, and also provided for a special assessment in the following words:

"Section 2. The amount so found, together with the costs and expenses of said appropriation and the interest on bonds issued, shall be assessed per front foot upon the lots and lands bounding and abutting upon said Culvert street, as opened between the north line of Fifth street and the south line of Sixth street; the said lots and lands so bounding and abutting Culvert street, between the points aforesaid being, and the same are hereby declared to be the lots and lands which, in the opinion of common council, will be specially benefited by said appropriation according to the laws and ordinances on the subject of assessments; the assessment therefore to be payable in ten annual installments, and the same collected as provided by law and the assessing ordinance hereafter to be passed, and bonds shall be issued in anticipation of such assessment."

In pursuance of said ordinance, the city solicitor instituted proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property appropriated, and such value was found to be $4840. The bonds of the city were issued in anticipation of the collection of the assessment, and the compensation for the property taken and costs paid. Thereafter, on February 2, 1889, the city passed an assessing ordinance to assess a special tax on the real estate bounding and abutting on Culvert street between Fifth and Sixth streets, on each front foot at the rate of $52.337.67 per foot, payable in ten equal annual payments, with interest at five per cent per annum on the deferred payments, and in default of payment when due to be certified forthwith to the county auditor, to be by him placed on the tax duplicate and collected according to law.

The cause to enjoin the collection of such special assessment was heard in the superior court at special term, upon the original papers and pleadings on file, but the court finding that important questions of law and fact were raised by the parties, it was ordered that the cause be, and the same was reserved to the superior court in general term upon the certified bill of evidence filed in the case.

The superior court in general term found, that the said lot of Clifford Perin, 166.48 feet front and a part of which was the condemned strip, is the only lot bounding and abutting on the strip of ground condemned; and also, that the lot of Henry Batsche, 150 feet front, and 16.48 feet of the lot of Margaret Wilmer bound and abut upon the part of Culvert street where it was widened under the condemnation proceedings; but further found that none of the property owned by any of the other complainants in the petition either bounds or abuts upon the condemned strip, or lies opposite the condemned strip, but all of it abuts upon Culvert street where no change in width was made by said condemnation proceedings.

The court thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the assessments for the opening and widening of Culvert street be, and the same were, declared null and void as against all the parties complaining and named in the petition, except Johanna Kirkpatrick and Margaret Wilmer (as to whom the cause was not taken from the special term on reservation), and except the assessment upon the said lot of Clifford Perin, which was held to be valid and binding. It was further ordered and adjudged, that the defendants, the city of Cincinnati, Edwin Stevens, city comptroller, Fred Raine, county auditor, and John Zumstein, county treasurer, be, and they were perpetually enjoined from demanding, collecting, or certifying any of said assessment, as against any of said parties named in the petition, as to whom said assessments were found null and void; and that the cause be dismissed as to Clifford Perin, and that the defendants pay the cost of the action. Clifford Perin excepted to the judgment as to him, but authorized no petition in error to be filed, and the defendants excepted to that part of the judgment finding said assessments void, and enjoining the collection of the same.

To reverse the judgment of the superior court in general term, this proceeding in error is instituted.

Jaeger v. Burr, 36 Ohio St. 164.

Dickman, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The special assessment, the validity of which is in controversy, was on the front foot plan, one of the modes of assessment designated in the revised statutes. The only question in this case which we deem it necessary to consider is, whether the costs and expenses of appropriating property to open Culvert street should have been assessed per front foot upon the lots and lands bounding and abutting upon Culvert street, as opened between the north line of Fifth street and the south line of Sixth street, or should have been assessed only on the lots and lands bounding and abutting upon that section of the street which embraced the improvement or property appropriated. And the same question, in principle, it may be here stated, was not, as suggested in argument of counsel, considered or passed upon by this court in the Anderson v. Rademacher Cases, decided in Caldwell v. Carthage, 49 Ohio St. 834.

It is provided by section 2264 of the Revised Statutes, that when the corporation appropriates lots or lands for the purpose of opening or widening a street, the council may decline to assess the costs and expenses of such appropriation on the general tax list, in which event, such costs and expenses "shall be assessed by the council on the abutting and such adjacent and contiguous or other benefited lots and lands in the corporation, either in proportion to the benefits which may result from the improvement, or according to the value of the property assessed, or by the foot front of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement, as the council, by ordinance setting forth specifically the lots and lands to be assessed, may determine before the improvement is made, and in the manner and subject to the restrictions herein contained." The statute thus provides three forms of special assessment: (1) in proportion to benefits resulting from the improvement; (2) according to the value of the property assessed; and (3) by the foot front of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement, three statutory modes of apportioning by special assessment, the costs and expenses of the improvement upon the lots and lands deemed to be especially benefited thereby.

The earliest law in this state authorizing municipal corporations to levy special assessments, to pay for land appropriated for opening or widening streets, on the property benefited thereby, independently of frontage or the value of the abutting property assessed, is found in section 539 of the Municipal Code of 1869, as amended April 12, 1878. 70 Ohio Laws, 126. By that section, the council had power to assess the costs and expense of such appropriation upon the lots or lands benefited thereby—including not only the lots and lands abutting upon the street, but also those contiguous and adjacent. By subsequent section 579, it was provided, that if in the opinion of the council or board of improvements, the same would be equitable, a proportion of the cost of making the improvement might be assessed upon such other lots or lands within the corporation, not bounding or abutting upon the improvement, as would, in the opinion of the council or board, be specially accommodated and benefited thereby. And by section 584, in all cases in which it might be determined to assess the whole or any part of the cost of any improvement upon the lots or lands bounding or abutting upon the same, or upon other lots or lands benefited thereby, the council might require the board of improvements, or might appoint three disinterested freeholders of the corporation, or vicinity, to report to the council an estimated assessment of such cost on the lots or lands to be charged therewith, in proportion, as nearly as might be, to the benefits which might result from the improvement to the several lots or parcels of lands so assessed. The foregoing provisions of sections 539 and 579 are substantially embodied in section 2264 of the Revised Statutes; and section 584, without diminution, has been carried into section 2277 of the Revised Statutes.

A plan of assessment in proportion to resulting benefits, distinct from that according to valuation, and that by the foot front, is therefore provided by statute, which is not limited to lots and lands bounding and abutting upon the improvement, but may be extended to lots and lands contiguous and adjacent, though situated on streets other than that of the improvement.

Special assessments according to valuation are characterized by distinctive features, and are regulated by a separate statutory plan under section 2269 of the Revised Statutes.

It must be evident that the assessment under consideration in the case at bar can be referred neither to the class according to valuation, nor to that in proportion to benefits, and must be regarded as an assessment by the foot front solely.

It is true that in the condemnation ordinance the lots and lands to be assessed, "bounding and abutting upon said Culvert street" between the given points, are declared "to be the lots and lands which, in the opinion of common council, will be specially benefited by said appropriation." But as properly said in argument of counsel, such declaration of benefits to accrue was only the finding and recital usual in ordinances providing for assessments, whether by benefits, by valuation, or by foot front, that the property to be assessed is the property benefited. Such declaration by the council, that the property specially assessed will derive a special benefit, is only the statement of a legal presumption that accompanies every special assessment to pay for a street improvement. Whatever may be the plan adopted, whether by the foot front, according to valuation, or in proportion to benefits, the underlying principle is, that those who are to make a special contribution to bear the cost of a public improvement, are at the same time to suffer no pecuniary loss thereby—their property being increased in value to an amount at least equal to the sum they are required to pay. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 606.

The assessment in controversy being by the foot front, the assessing district established by the council, instead of including only lots and lands bounding and abutting upon the improvement, embraced non-abutting property as well, lying between the north line of Fifth street and the south line of Sixth street. Recognizing the authority of the council to create an assessing district, it must be exercised in accordance with the requirement of the statute. The statute—section 2264, Revised Statutes—requires the council to set forth by ordinance "specifically the lots and lands to be assessed;" but when the assessment is by the foot front, it must be "of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement." In such case, the legislature has prescribed the assessing district, which excludes property not bounding and abutting upon the improvement.

The improvement upon which the property must abut has reference to the specific thing which is done or added to the street whereby it is improved. The improvement is the beneficial or valuable change or addition, and of definite location on the line of the street. In the present case, the improvement was embraced in that part of Culvert street, which was evidenced by appropriating the land of Clifford Perin. But it cannot be properly said, that all the lots and lands abutting on Culvert street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, abutted on the improvement, within the meaning of the statute, because the street between those points might be improved, in the sense of being benefited, by the widening of the part at Fifth street.

The record discloses that the assessment was held by the circuit court to be valid and binding as to the property of Perin, because it abutted on the strip of ground condemned. But the property of Henry Batsche, bounding upon the part of Culvert street where it was widened under the condemnation proceedings, and lying opposite the condemned strip was relieved from the assessment, as land not abutting upon the improvement. It is true a portion of the street intervened, and the land of Batsche did not come in actual contact with the ground appropriated; but we do not think that the words of the statute, "bounding and abutting upon the improvement," are to be so restricted in their application, as to exclude property in the same situation as that of Batsche in reference to the improvement. As soon as the appropriation was made, the ground became incorporated as part and parcel of the widened portion of the street, and the property on both sides of the street abutted then on the improvement. Thereafter, the proprietors of lots fronting on both sides of the street might enjoy the free and lawful use of the condemned land; and the easement in the street, appendant to the abutting lots, extended as well to the newly appropriated ground as to the remaining portion of the street in front of the lots.

In Richards v. Cincinnati, 81 Ohio St. 506, it was held that, where a strip of land ninety-one feet in width was dedicated for a street, and the municipal authorities improved a street thereon, of the width of ninety feet, leaving one foot on one side thereof unused, except in sloping the embankments and excavations, the owners of property abutting on such foot of land became liable to be assessed as owners of property abutting on the improvement. It was said by McIlvaine, J.: "It seems to us that, in order to exempt these proprietors from assessment as abutters on the improvement, it must appear that this intervening foot of land deprives them of full, free, and lawful access to the street improved."

If the public right to its use still continues, . . . their liability to assessment is certain. That this foot of land, before the improvement of the avenue, was subject to the use of the public, as part of a highway, is not disputed; and we are unable to find any ground upon which it can be held that such right in the public has terminated."

The principle thus announced by this court was applied in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Quincy, 186 Ill. 563, where the sidewalks, instead of the street, as in the case at bar, intervened between the street improvement and the lots bounding on the sidewalks. It was there held that, where a street is required to be improved between the sidewalks on either side, land or lots extending up to the sidewalk will be subject to special taxation to defray the expenses of the improvement, as property contiguous to such street, the sidewalks, for this purpose, being a part of the street, though not ordered to be improved.

In accordance with the foregoing views, the assessment by the foot front should be held valid and binding as to the property of Henry Batsche—as bounding and abutting upon the improvement—and with a modification of the judgment of the Circuit Court in that respect, the judgment of that court should be affirmed.

Minshall, J., dissents from the modification. Spear, J., did not sit in this case.

SMILEY v. MACDONALD appears to represent the rule upon the subject so far as it has been established by the reported decisions, while Re Lowry, post, 545, seems to stand alone in so far as it holds that the regulations for the removal of garbage and filth from a city must leave a way open to every person who will comply with the ordinance ture shall not pass local or special laws . . . granting to any corporation, association, or individual, any special or exclusive privileges, immunity, or franchise whatever."—Held, not a restriction upon the power of the legislature over the subject involved, but rather as a limitation with respect to the manner of the exercise of such power.

2. The constitutional provision above cited does not prohibit cities of the metro-to engage at least in so much of the business of scavengers as relates to entering on private property and removing filth and garbage therefrom.

In State v. Lowery, 49 N. J. L. 301, the court says the proper control of the time and mode of cleaning sinks, cess-pools, and vaults and the removal of their contents, is not only a proper subject for municipal concern, but is imperatively demanded by a just regard for the comfort and health of the politian class from contracting for the removal therefrom of dead animals, garbage, and other noxious and unwholesome matter.

3. Nor will such a contract be held void by reason of a stipulation therein that the privilege thereby conferred upon the contractor is exclusive.

4. The legislature cannot under the guise of police regulation arbitrarily invade private property or personal rights. The test when such regulations are called in question, is whether they have some relation to the public health or public welfare, and whether such is in fact the end sought to be attained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Saunders, Macfarland & Diekey, for appellant:

A municipal corporation has the right and power to grant, if it deems best, the exclusive community. But the court decided that in order to sustain a conviction there must be facts shown which plainly establish a deleterious practice, and it is not sufficient to allege that plaintiff brought a load of prohibited material into the corporate limits.

In Walker v. Jameson (Ind.) May 2, 1894, the validity of an ordinance and contract by which the exclusive right to remove garbage was given to one person and the removal was to be at the expense of the one for whom the services are performed, was considered and held valid.

In Re Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 851, a by-law of the city of Boston which prohibited any person not duly licensed by the mayor and aldermen to remove house dirt and offal from houses in the city, was held to be valid and not in restraint of trade or creating a monopoly, although the question of contract did not arise in that case. The court said the city prefers to employ men over whom it has an entire control by night and by day, whose services may always be had and who will be able from habit to do this work in the best possible way and time; and the correctness of that decision was apparently recognized in Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 552, 48 Am. Dec. 679.

In passing upon the validity of an ordinance which gave a certain person the exclusive right to purchase and remove the carcasses of dead animals, the court in State v. Fisher, 58 Mo. 177, said if the privilege of purchasing such animals was unrestricted and depended on the mere volition of the persons, then no absolute arrangement could be effected by which the sanitary or police regulations could be carried out. Before they were sold or the price was agreed upon between the parties, they would lie and putrify and produce infection and disease. Therefore the only safe and practical mode of arresting and destroying the evil is to confine the removal to persons who have a license or contract and who are bound to remove the carcasses promptly and dispose of them in a way and at a place, where the health of the inhabitants will not be interfered with.

In People v. Gordon, 81 Mich. 306, the ordinance required that no one but the city contractor should remove garbage from the city except in a certain kind of vehicle and under permit of the health officer. It was contended that this ordinance was void as granting a monopoly, but the court refused to consider that branch of the case on the ground that the person complained against had not a proper vehicle to carry on the business and was therefore properly convicted.

In Gregory v. New York, 40 N. Y. 278, it was held that the board of health of the city of New York had no power to enter into a contract for the removal of the contents of sinks and vaults in the city which were not at the time nuisances.

In River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 7 Mo. App. 345, the court upheld an ordinance giving a certain corporation the exclusive privilege of removing dead animals from the streets of the city, saying: "The city authorities would be grossly derelict if they left the chances of the removal to be determined by the owners of the animals, or by the enterprise of public contractors. They are in duty bound to appoint special agencies for the purpose and to render performance certain by whatever means their best judgment may suggest. If they find that this certainty can be secured only by confining the agencies to a single person or corporation upon terms of responsibility for the failure to conform, it is their duty and their privilege to so secure it. The agencies are appointed as rather the instrument in the hands of the municipal authorities for the fulfillment of the public duty, than the beneficiary of an exclusive privilege.

duty of removing the garbage to one person or to one corporation.

... The mere removal of offensive matter or matter likely to become offensive pertains strictly to the municipal police authority. It is not properly a calling open to all, any more than the inspection of sewers or the guarding of public streets." But that ordinance was held unconstitutional by the supreme court on the ground that it permitted the person having the contract to convert the property to his own use to the exclusion of the rights which the owner might have to dispose of it at any time before it became a nuisance. River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 91, 46 Am. Rep. 6.

In Morgan v. Cincinnati, 12 Cin. L. Bull. 41, under authority to make all needful regulations to promote the public welfare and to prevent the prevalence of disease the court held that the city could ordain what substances should be taken in charge by the superintendent of street cleaning and the board of public health, and could accomplish this by such instrumentality as is proper and convenient and not interfering with private rights. The city treasury must bear the expense, and if offal found on the streets may be regarded as without owner, the city authorities are bound to clean the highways, can dispose of such substances, and if they are valuable for tillage such price can be demanded as can be obtained without assuming power not delegated, and this does not create a monopoly interfering with any private right.

One Thompson had contracted with the city for $8000 per annum to remove all garbage and offal. Complainants sought to enjoin the contract because it interfered with their business of removing dead hogs from droves and rendering them. The court held that since the ordinance provided for a permit to the owner to remove his dead animals himself it was valid and could not be questioned by strangers.

An ordinance requiring persons who wish to engage in the business of cleaning vaults and removing garbage and offal within the city, to procure a license and be subject to the orders of the board of health, is valid. Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259. In that case the court says, such powers have been universally granted to municipalities in this country.

In Louisville v. Wible, 84 Ky. 220, the court enforced as against the city a contract giving complainant the exclusive right to remove from the city the carcasses of dead animals.

In Swift v. New York, 88 N. Y. 533, a contract for the removal of garbage from the city was treated as valid as between the contractor and the city.

In Alpers v. San Francisco City and County, 88 Fed. Rep. 508, which was an action brought to enjoin the violation of a contract permitting complainant to remove all dead animals from the city, the court says: "There is no doubt that the contract between the plaintiff and the city is one within the competency of the municipality to make. . . . And provisions for such removal may be made by contract as well as the performance of any other duty touching the health and comfort of the city." And it is further said: "The contract in question does not appear to be open to any serious objection," although the question of the granting of a monopoly was not considered, but in the subsequent case of National Fertilizer Co. v. Lambert, 48 Fed. Rep. 458, the question of the validity of such ordinance on the ground that it created a monopoly was distinctly raised, and the contract was held valid. It appearing that the ordinance gave the owner a right to remove the animals himself if he chose to do so.

An ordinance which provides that all animals dying within the city shall be disposed of within twenty-four hours or they will be removed by a person with whom the city had contracted to do the work, does not prevent the owner from disposing of the animals within the twenty-four hours in any way he chooses by contract or otherwise. Alpers v. Brown, 80 Cal. 447.

Post, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the district court for Douglas county restraining the defendant from proceeding under a contract with the city of Omaha providing for the removal of the garbage, offal, dead animals, etc., from said city. In view of the importance of the question at issue it is deemed proper to copy at length from the petition, to wit: "The plaintiff states to the court that he is a citizen and resident of the city of Omaha, Nebraska, and a tax-payer therein and has been such resident of the city of Omaha and tax-payer therein for, to wit, the period of eight (8) years, and he brings this action in said capacity, as a tax-payer and citizen of said city, against this defendant, Alexander MacDonald, and states to the court the following facts:

"That on the 21st day of July, 1893, said Alexander MacDonald, the defendant herein, made and entered into a pretended contract or agreement with the city of Omaha, under and by the terms of which for a period of ten years from and after January 1, 1894, said Alexander MacDonald, in consideration of being allowed the right to remove dead animals, garbage, offal, night soil, etc., within the city of Omaha, for the period of ten years from and after January 1, 1894, under the terms and stipulations contained in said pretended contract, a copy of which is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof as though incorporated at length in the body of this petition, agreed to pay the said city of Omaha, annually, for such privilege, at the end of each year, during the existence of said contract, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250).

"Plaintiff alleges that under and by virtue of the terms of said pretended contract the defendant is given an exclusive privilege and right, which is illegal and contrary to law, and is permitted thereunder to make large profits in the transaction of the business therein specified, and that the compensation fixed by said contract or agreement is burdensome upon the tax-payers of said city and is in excess of the reasonable value of the services to be so rendered.

"The plaintiff further says that the contract as aforesaid is unlawful in this, to wit, that the privilege of removing garbage, dead animals, offal, night soil, etc., necessary to be removed, under the requirements of the board of health, as set out in said pretended contract or agreement with said city and the defendant is a franchise, and that no authority to grant said franchise to said defendant, Alexander MacDonald, was ever voted by the citizens and legal voters within and for said city of Omaha, Nebraska, and that the city council and the municipal authorities of said city of Omaha had no right or authority whatever to make and enter into any such contract.

"Plaintiff says that he is informed and believes that the said defendant is about to enter upon the execution of his said pretended contract with the said city, and if permitted to do so will, under color of authority as shown by said pretended contract, levy and assess upon said tax-payers of the city of Omaha and this plaintiff unlawful dues for the removal of garbage, dead animals, offal, night soil, etc.

"Plaintiff alleges that he is without remedy at law.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays that said pretended contract between the said city of Omaha and said Alexander MacDonald be declared null and void and set at naught, and that the defendant, his agents, employes, and servants be perpetually enjoined from proceeding under said pretended contract to remove dead animals, garbage, offal, night soil, etc., or any other filth required to be removed by board of health or the ordinances of said city of Omaha, and for such other relief as to the court may seem meet."

The contract to which reference is therein made is as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 21st day of July, 1893, by and between the city of Omaha, party of the first part, and Alexander MacDonald, party of the second part,

"Witnesseth: that the party of the second part, in consideration of being allowed to remove and make use of all the dead animals, garbage, offal, night soil, etc., necessary to be removed, as may be required by the board of health or ordinances of said city of Omaha, during the period of ten years commencing January 1, 1894, or from such time prior to said date as may be required by the mayor and council, hereby agrees, in accordance with the ordinances of said city now existing or hereafter passed, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the board of health of said city, and as may be required by the commissioners of health upon payment of the charges herein authorized, to remove to some place or places at least two and one half miles outside of the corporate limits of said city, and if within three miles of the corporate limits of said city to such place or places as may be designated by said board of health, and dispose of the same in such manner as not to cause or create a nuisance, all dead animals, garbage, manure, ashes, filth, offal, night soil, etc., as may now or hereafter during the existence of this contract be required to be removed by said ordinances, rules, or regulations at not exceeding the prices following, to wit:

"Each dead animal weighing over 500 pounds, $2.00."

"Whenever the owner of any dead animals found in the public streets or at any public place is unknown, the said party of the first part agrees to pay to said party of the second part the sum above specified for removing such animals upon satisfactory proof being furnished of the removal of any such animals and that the owner thereof is unknown."

"It is further understood and expressly agreed that for the privileges herein granted the party of the second part shall annually pay to said party of the first part at the end of each year the sum of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars. It is further understood and expressly agreed by said party of the second part that at all times during the existence of this contract he shall be subject to the orders of said board of health and to the ordinances of said city, and that he will promptly and faithfully comply with the same."

"It is further understood and agreed that said party of the second part for the purpose of removing said dead animals, garbage, manure, ashes, filth, offal, night soil, etc., shall be permitted to load the same upon cars at five places as near equally distant from each other as is practical, such places for loading cars to be approved by the board of health of said city, and to be subject to change from time to time as said board of health may require."

To the foregoing petition a general demurrer was interposed which was overruled and the defendant refusing to plead further a decree was allowed as prayed and which is the decree involved in this appeal.

The issue involved is thus tersely stated by counsel for plaintiff: "There is one question only presented to the demurrer and that is whether the contract is an exclusive franchise." The plaintiff has assumed the affirmative of that position and asserts that said contract is in contemplation of law a franchise, and therefore within the prohibition contained in section 15 of article 3 of the Constitution. The provision of said section which is invoked in this action is as follows: "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following cases, that is to say, . . . granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privileges, immunity, or franchise whatever. In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable no special law shall be enacted."

From a careful analysis of that provision it would seem that it was intended, not as a restriction upon the power of the legislature over the subject involved, but rather as a limitation in respect to the manner of the exercise of that power. The precise limitation of the legislative power to confer by general law privileges in their nature exclusive is foreign to our present inquiry. It is sufficient for the purpose of this controversy that according to recognized rules of construction, the people of the state must be understood to have conferred upon the legislature all of the sovereign power resting in them, subject only to the limitations of the state and national constitutions. For, as said by Judge Redfield in Thorpe v. Rutland & E. O. R. Co., 27 Vt. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 635: "The American legislatures have the same unlimited power except when restrained by written constitutions, as the British parliament." We might safely rest our conclusion upon the reasons stated, but there are other considerations suggested by the record which it is deemed proper to notice.

It will be observed that no claim is made to the effect that the contract complained of is unauthorized by the ordinances of the city of Omaha. The inference therefore, is that it was executed in pursuance of an ordinance having at least the form of law.

The question is thus presented whether the contracting for the removal of the garbage, offal, and other unwholesome substance by contract for a term of years is an assumption of power by the city in excess of that conferred by chapter 12a, Comp. Stat., entitled Metropolitan cities, and which for convenience will be referred to as its charter. By section

"The following portion of the agreement may be of sufficient interest to warrant its publication here although it was omitted by the court:

"Each dead animal weighing less than 500 pounds, except as otherwise herein provided, $1.00.

"Dead dogs, each, 75 cents.

"Dead cats, each, 25 cents.

"Each load of manure, ashes, or other refuse matter, 50 cents.

"The standard of a load of manure shall be sixty-four cubic feet, and for ashes and other solid refuse shall be 27 cents per cubic foot.

"Each barrel of garbage or refuse matter, thirty gallons or more in size, 30 cents.

"Barrels, boxes, or other receptacles of less than thirty gallons of garbage or other refuse matter, for each ten gallons, 10 cents.

"For removing the contents of any water closet, vault, cess-pool, or privy, 10 cents per cubic foot for the contents actually removed.

"It is further understood and agreed that the rates above specified are the rates not exceeding which the said party of the second part shall be authorized to charge and collect from the party or parties respectively having any of said dead animals, garbage, manure, ashes, refuse, or other matter referred to removed.

"The dead animals referred to above as weighing over or less than 500 pounds are animals such as horses, mules, cattle, calves, goats and the like."

23 thereof it is provided that "the mayor and council shall have power to make and enforce all police regulations for the good government, general welfare, health, safety, and security of the city and the citizens thereof in addition to the police powers expressly granted herein, and in the exercise of the police powers may pass all needful and proper ordinances."

By section 27 it is provided that "the mayor and council shall have power to prevent any person or persons from bringing, depositing, or having or leaving upon or near his premises or elsewhere within the city, any putrid or diseased carcass or any putrid or diseased or unsound beef, pork, poultry, fish, hides or skins of any kind, or any other unwholesome substance, and to compel the removal of the same at the expense of such person or persons."

It requires no argument to prove that the subject of the contract before us is within the strict letter of these provisions of the charter.

The boundary line which divides the police power of the state from the other functions of government is often difficult to discern. As said by Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53: "It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and source of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise." It may, however, with safety be asserted that the legislature cannot under the guise of police regulations arbitrarily invade personal rights and private property. On the other hand it should appear to the court, when such regulations are called in question, that they have in fact some relation to the public health or public welfare and that such is the end sought to be attained thereby. Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 686; Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 303, 57 Am. Rep. 869. But the removal of the noxious and unwholesome matter mentioned in the contract tends directly to promote the public health, comfort, and welfare and is therefore a proper exercise of the police power; nor is the fact that in this instance the city has by contract conferred an exclusive privilege material. From the power thus conferred upon the city is implied the duty to determine the means and agencies best adapted to the end in view. The means adopted appear to be not only a reasonable and necessary regulation but a judicious exercise of the discretion conferred upon the city.

That the object of all such regulations can be best attained by entrusting the work in hand to a responsible contractor who possesses the facilities for carrying it on with dispatch and with the least possible inconvenience to the public is apparent to all. In the case of Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 351, Putnam, J., referring to a similar regulation of the city of Boston, said: "It seems to us the city authorities have judged well in the matter. They prefer to employ men over whom they have an entire control by night and by day whose services may be always had and who will be able from habit to do the work in the best possible way and time. Practically we think the main object of city government will be better accomplished by the arrangement adopted than by relying upon the labor of others over whom the government would have no control."

"We are satisfied that the by-law is reasonable and not only within the power of the government to prescribe but well adapted to preserve the health of the city."

See also River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 7 Mo. App. 845; Walker v. Jameson (Ind.) 87 N. E. Rep. 402; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 816, and also, as applicable in principle, Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259; State v. Lowery, 49 N. J. L. 891; People v. Gordon, 81 Mich. 806; Kilvington v. Superior, 83 Wis. 223, 18 L. R. A. 45.

The alleged excess of power is a mere sanitary measure as obviously so as the familiar and necessary quarantine for the detention of persons exposed to contagious diseases. In either case the privilege, although exclusive, is but an incident to the proper exercise of the general police power of the state.

The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings therein.

*Ordinance No. 1718 of the city of Topeka, entitled, "An ordinance providing for city scavengers, prescribing the duties and regulations governing the same, providing a license therefor, fixing the fees to be charged, penalties for violating rules and regulations thereof, and repealing Ordinance No. 694, published June 3d, 1887, and Ordinance No. 983, published July 19th, 1890," as amended by Ordinance No. 1744, attempts to authorize the creation of a monopoly of a lawful calling, is in restraint of trade, and void.

NOTE.—As to monopoly in contract for removal of garbage, see note to case preceding this one. 37 L. R. A.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of defendant from the custody of the chief of police and jailer of the city of Topeka to which he had been committed for alleged violation of a city ordinance. Petitioner discharged.

Statement by ALLEN, J.:

On the 12th day of September, 1894, there was filed in the police court in the city of Topeka a duly verified complaint against M. E. Lowe, charging that on the 11th day of September, 1894, and prior thereto, he did then and there unlawfully engage in the business of a city scavenger, contrary to the ordinances of the city of Topeka, and especially in violation of Ordinance No. 1718, being an ordinance entitled "An ordinance providing for scavengers," etc., and of ordinances amendatory thereto. On the 13th of September, 1894, upon the written complaint filed against him, a warrant was issued by the police judge of the city to the chief of police, directing him to arrest M. E. Lowe, and bring him before the police judge, to be dealt with according to law. On the 20th of September, 1894, M. E. Lowe presented his petition to one of the justices of this court for a writ of habeas corpus. His petition, omitting caption, exhibits, and verification, was as follows: "The petition of M. E. Lowe respectfully shows: That he is unlawfully imprisoned, detained, confined, and restrained of his liberty by H. C. Lindsey, chief of police of the city of Topeka, and Ed. Woodruff, keeper and jailer of the city prison of said city, in Shawnee county, in this state, at the city jail in the city of Topeka, in the county of Shawnee, Kansas. That the imprisonment, detention, confinement, and restraint are illegal, and that the illegality thereof consists in this, to wit: That the only pretext or cause of such arrest and detention is by virtue of a warrant of arrest issued out of the police court of the said city, upon a complaint charging the petitioner with the alleged violation of a pretended ordinance of the city of Topeka, No. 1718, copies of which warrant, complaint, and ordinance are hereto attached, marked Exhibits 'A,' 'B,' & 'C,' respectively; and that the said pretended ordinance is null and void, in this, to wit: In attempting to create the office of city scavenger, for which there is no authority of law, and in giving the mayor authority to appoint a city scavenger, which is not provided for by law: in attempting to absolutely prohibit any person or persons from engaging in the business of a scavenger unless appointed by the mayor and approved by the council; in attempting to break up the business of this petitioner, in which he has invested a large sum of money, and has been engaged in for several years; and for the further reason the ordinance is in derogation of the vested rights of this petitioner, under a contract entered into between himself and the city of Topeka in May of 1893, and which is now existing in full force and effect, a copy of which contract is hereto attached, marked Exhibit 'D,' and made a part of this petition. Wherefore your petitioner prays that a writ of habeas corpus may be granted, directed to the said H. C. Lindsey and Ed. Woodruff, commanding them to have the body of this petitioner before the supreme court, at a time and place therein to be specified, to do and receive what shall then and there be considered by your honors concerning him, together with the time and cause of this detention and said writ; and that your petitioner may be restored to his liberty. M. E. Lowe. J. S. Ensminger, Atty. for Petitioner."

Section 1 of Ordinance No. 1718, as amended by ordinance 1744, referred to in the petition as Exhibit "C," reads:

"Section 1. That section one of Ordinance number 1718 be, and the same is hereby, 97 L. R. A.

amended so as to read: 'Section one. The mayor shall at the regular meeting in May of each year, by and with the consent of the council, appoint two or more suitable persons, corporations, or firms to act as city scavengers for the ensuing year, or who shall hold said position during the pleasure of the mayor and council. A license shall be issued to such persons, corporation, or firm in which shall be written or printed the name of the person to whom issued, the date thereof and the time when the same shall expire; and all licenses issued to city scavengers shall expire on the first day of May next after the same are issued unless sooner canceled by order of the mayor and council, and all licenses to city scavengers shall be signed by the city clerk, and attested with the seal of the city. No license shall be issued to scavengers until all the requirements of this ordinance shall have been complied with: provided, however, that it shall be the duty of the mayor, by and with the consent of the council, to appoint two or more suitable persons, corporations, or firms to act as city scavenger until the regular meeting in May, 1895, or to fill a vacancy or vacancies whenever the same shall occur before or after time, in the same manner as appointing for a full term.'"

Section 4 provides, among other things: "It shall be the duty of the city scavenger to remove the contents of privy vaults and cess-pools, dead animals, garbage, and offal, when directed by the city board of health or the mayor and council, and the contents of privy vaults and cess-pools, when notified by citizens in the manner hereinafter specified. Citizens may notify said city scavenger, verbally or in writing, of any cess-pool or privy vault he or they may desire to have emptied, and shall tender therewith to said city scavenger the fee for such services as herein specified."

Section 6 contains the following provisions: "It shall be unlawful for any person to engage in the business of a scavenger in the city of Topeka without procuring a license therefor in the manner herein provided, and any person, corporation, or firm who shall so engage in such business shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon being found guilty of said offense shall be fined in any sum not less than five dollars or more than fifty dollars for each offense."

Subsequently a writ of habeas corpus was issued, and a return made attempting to justify the arrest and imprisonment of the petitioner under the provisions of the city ordinance No. 1718, providing for city scavengers. The case was heard before the court at the October sitting for 1894.

Mr. J. S. Ensminger for petitioner.

Mr. D. C. Tillotson for respondent.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case requiring consideration is as to the validity of Ordinance No. 1718, providing for the appointment of city scavengers. By the terms of the ordinance as amended by Ordinance 1744,

It is made the duty of the mayor, with the consent of the council, to appoint two or more suitable persons to act as city scavengers. The duties of the scavengers are prescribed at some length, and include a removal of the contents of privy vaults and cess-pools, dead animals, garbage, and offal. The ordinance fixes the compensation to be paid by private persons for the cleaning of privy vaults and cess-pools, and for the removal of dead animals, but not for any other scavenger work. By section 6 it is rendered unlawful for any person to engage in the business of a scavenger without having a license as prescribed by the ordinance, and a penalty is imposed for a violation of the ordinance. The right of the city council to pass this ordinance is claimed under subdivision 11 of section 11 of the Act to incorporate and regulate cities of the first class, being chapter 18 of the General Statutes of 1889, which provides that the mayor and council shall have power "(11) to make regulations to secure the general health of the city, to prevent and remove nuisances, to regulate or prohibit the construction of privy vaults and cess-pools, and to regulate or suppress those already constructed, to compel and regulate the connection of all property with sewers, to suppress hog-pens, slaughter-houses and stock-yards, or to regulate the same, and prescribe and enforce regulations for cleaning and keeping the same in order, and the cleaning and keeping in order all warehouses, stables, alleys, yards, private ways, out-houses and other places where offensive matter is kept, or permitted to accumulate, and to compel and regulate the removal of garbage and filth beyond the limits of the city."

It is said that the ordinance is a reasonable regulation, enacted for the preservation of the health of the people of the city; that, of necessity, a large measure of discretion is reposed in the mayor and council in selecting the means necessary to preserve the health of the inhabitants; and that in enacting this ordinance the mayor and council have kept within the limits of their powers. That accumulations of filth, decaying carcasses, fermenting garbage, are not only offensive to the senses, but endanger the health of the community, must be conceded. It must also be admitted that the legislature may properly delegate to the mayor and council the power to make all necessary regulations for preserving the cleanliness of the city, and to prevent the accumulation of nuisances. This was the subject under consideration when the provision last quoted was incorporated in the statute. Have the mayor and council exceeded the limits of their authority? In support of the validity of the ordinance, Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 894, are cited. In these cases the act of the legislature of Louisiana granting a corporation the exclusive right to maintain slaughter-houses in the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard, and prohibiting all other persons from maintaining and using slaughter-houses within those limits, was upheld, the chief justice and three of the associate justices dissenting. In the case of Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co., 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, it was held that the exclusive privilege given to the slaughter-house company for the term of twenty-five years by the act under consideration in the case first cited was not binding on the law-making power for that period, but that, under the provisions of the new constitution, the legislature, in the exercise of its police power on subjects affecting public health, might make other and different provisions and regulations, which would have the effect to deprive the company of its monopoly under the charter. The decision was placed on the ground that the power of a state legislature to make a contract of such a character that, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, it cannot be modified or abrogated, does not extend to subjects affecting public health or public morals, so as to limit the future exercise of legislative power on those subjects, to the prejudice of the general welfare. In the cases of River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 7 Mo. App. 345; Alpers v. San Francisco, City & County, 83 Fed. Rep. 503; and Louisville v. Wible, 84 Ky. 290,—the power of a city to make a contract with a person or corporation for the removal of dead animals, not slaughtered for food, from the city, and granting to such person or corporation the exclusive privilege of using the streets of the city for such purposes, was upheld as a proper police regulation. The cases of Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259, and Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 851, merely uphold city ordinances requiring licenses and regulating the business of scavengers.

It will be observed that the ordinance under consideration authorizes the appointment of two or more persons as scavengers. It therefore places it in the power of the mayor to grant to two persons a monopoly of the scavengers' business within the limits of the city. While monopolies of any ordinary legitimate business are odious, we have seen that monopolies are upheld when deemed necessary in executing a duty incumbent on the city authorities or the legislature for the protection of the public health. It is sometimes a matter of great nicety and difficulty to determine whether a particular business or calling is in its nature so directly connected with the public welfare that the performance can only be safely intrusted to some one acting under public authority. So much of the business of the scavenger as consists in removing dead animals, it would seem, under the authorities, may properly be regarded as a public function, for the discharge of which a monopoly may be created. But this ordinance goes further, and gives to the scavengers the exclusive privilege, also, of cleaning privy vaults and cess-pools, and of removing garbage, not only from the streets, but from the private premises of the citizens. By its terms, it would prohibit the owners from performing these services for themselves, or from employing any one else than the persons appointed. It not only makes a monopoly of the cleaning of vaults and cess-pools, which are necessarily offensive to the senses, but it also includes the removal of garbage. It would be somewhat difficult to say just what is included in the term "garbage." Webster defines it as "properly that which is purged, or cleansed away; the bowels of an animal; refuse parts of flesh; offal; hence the refuse animal and vegetable matter from a kitchen." It will be observed that the monopoly under consideration is not one granted directly by the legislature, as in the case first cited, but by a city council, claiming to act under legislative authority.

Section 2 of the Bill of Rights in the constitution of this state reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and are instituted for their equal protection and benefit. No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted by the legislature, which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the same body; and this power shall be exercised by no other tribunal or agency."

This section of the bill of rights clearly prohibits the legislature from delegating the power to a city to grant to any individual the special privilege of carrying on any ordinary business or calling.

The eleventh subdivision of section 11 of the Act concerning cities of the first class, above quoted, it will be observed, authorizes the city council to regulate or prohibit the construction of privy vaults and cess-pools, and to regulate and enforce the cleaning of all places where offensive matter is permitted to accumulate. By the third subdivision of the same section, the mayor and council are authorized to levy and collect license taxes on and regulate a great number of businesses and callings, including that of scavengers. In other parts of the same section, power is given to regulate and order the cleaning of chimneys, to regulate the storage of powder and other combustible and explosive substances, as well as to regulate many other things deemed by the law-makers proper subjects of supervision by the city authorities. The business of a scavenger may not be nice or attractive, but the removal of garbage and filth is a necessary work, which has been ordinarily performed through any agency the party interested might select. If the term "garbage" includes all refuse from the kitchen, then the waste which ordinarily is used, when practicable, to feed swine, can only be removed from the premises by the person appointed under this ordinance. Privies and cess-pools are not ordinarily deemed nuisances per se. They are not so regarded by the statute under consideration. They may be permitted or not by the city authorities, according as the circumstances and surroundings of the particular place or portion of the city render it more or less dangerous to the health of the inhabitants. When constructed, they are on private property; and, in order to remove their contents or to remove garbage not deposited in the streets or alleys, it would be necessary to enter private premises. We are not cited to any case holding that a monopoly of this business may be created.

In Gregory v. New York, 40 N. Y. 373, it was held that the board of health have not power to assume in advance that all the sinks and privies in the city of New York are or will become nuisances, or dangerous to the public health, and contract for the removal of their contents indefinitely, until they or the common council order otherwise, and bind the defendant to pay for them. In the case of State v. Lowery, 49 N. J. L. 891, the defendant was charged with having in the night-time carted, carried, and taken into the township a load of night soil, in violation of an ordinance duly passed by the township committee. It was held that, in the absence of any further showing, the act was not punishable, and in the opinion the court says: "The scavenger, with the use of improved methods of protection, may use the public streets without injury or offense to others; and, cautious as courts are in declaring an ordinance void as being unreasonable, they would hold this ordinance to be so when its penalties were sought to be enforced against any one making a use of the public streets which was harmless in fact. The town cannot deny to citizens the use of its streets to cross the township on any business that is inoffensive. It cannot, by merely declaring an act to be a nuisance, make it such." In Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 113, 13 L. R. A. 587, it was held: "A city ordinance placing restrictions upon the keeping and storing of inflammable or explosive oils is invalid which fails to specify the rules and conditions to be observed in such business, and which does not admit of the exercise of the privilege by all citizens alike, who will comply with such rules and conditions, but which does admit of the exercise of an arbitrary discrimination by the municipal authorities between citizens who will so comply." In Re Nash, 83 U. C. Q. B. 181, it was held that a by-law that "no person shall keep a slaughter-house within the city without the special resolution of the council" was void, because it permitted favoritism, and might be used to grant a monopoly. In Reg. v. Johnston, 88 U. C. Q. B. 549, it was held that a city by-law providing that no person other than chimney inspectors appointed by the municipal council (of whom there were to be three) should sweep, or cause to be swept, for hire or gain, any chimney or flue in the city, was beyond the power of the corporation under the authority given to them to enforce the proper cleaning of chimneys, and a conviction under it was quashed. The case of Richmond v. Dudley, supra, and the one last cited are, in principle, much like the case under consideration for the power of the city authorities to prevent fires is everywhere regarded as of prime importance, and admits no delay in its execution. Horr & B. Mun. Ord. § 231.

The power of the city council to license and regulate the business of scavengers is not now questioned, nor, in view of the express authority contained in the statute above quoted, can there be any question of their power to make and enforce all reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of this disagreeable business. Under the authorities, and especially in view of the constitutional provision quoted, these regulations must leave a way open to every person who will comply with the requirements of the ordinance to engage, at least, in so much of the business of scavengers as relates to entering on private property, and removing filth and garbage therefrom. This ordinance clearly authorizes the restriction of this business to two persons, to be selected by the mayor, thereby providing for a monopoly. This the mayor and council had no power to do.

The ordinance under consideration is therefore void, and the petitioner is discharged.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO., Plff. in Err.,
v.

John G. HAILEY.

(.....Tenn.....)

A passenger on a freight train with the conductor's permission but knowing that he is violating the rules of the road assumes the risk of accidents.

(February 7, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Davidson County, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger on one of defendant's freight trains, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Baxter Smith, for plaintiff in error:

If plaintiff was knowingly violating the company's rule he would not have been lawfully on the train, and consequently would have been an intruder, which is tantamount to being a trespasser, and in such case defendant's liability would have been only for wanton or intentional injury.

Messrs. E. E. Thurman, J. W. Moore, and J. P. Hickman also for defendant in error.

Snodgrass, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for damages for injuries sustained on a freight train in Florida. There was a recovery of $1,000, and the defendant appealed in error.

The plaintiff, with others, applied, through one of the party, for passage on a freight train, and was informed by the conductor that it was against the rules of the company to take passengers on that train without they had a permit from the superintendent, but nevertheless, after so advising them, he took them on the train, and received fare from them as passengers, and they, being so advised, took passage in the caboose. This, with six other cars preceding it, was thrown from the track by a broken wheel, and the injury thus inflicted.

The circuit judge charged the jury that, if the plaintiff obtained passage under these circumstances, he was not entitled to all the rights of a passenger; but he did not tell them just what relation the plaintiff would occupy. He also refused to charge that the defendant owed plaintiff no other duty, under these circumstances, than not to willfully or intentionally injure him. In both respects there was error: The judge should have said to the jury that the regulation disallowing passengers on a freight train was a reasonable one, and the conductor of such a train, in the absence of assumed or proven authority, was not to be presumed as authorized to disregard it; and, if it appeared in evidence that instead of assuming such authority the conductor in fact told plaintiff or his representative making the contract that he did not have it, and the plaintiff then induced him to take plaintiff on the train in violation of such rule and disregard of his obligations to the company, he did not thereby become a passenger, or entitled to the rights of a passenger, but was a trespasser, and took the risk of injury as such. This is the law according to the great weight of authority, and manifestly as a matter of reason and justice. There is no evidence in the record as to what the law of Florida is, and therefore it is presumed to be the same as our own. The rule in this, as in many other states, is that, if one take passage on a train or in a car not provided for passengers, without being advised that he is not permitted to ride on such train or car, he may recover for injuries sustained as a passenger while so riding. Washburn v. Nashville & O. R. Co. 8 Head, 688, 75 Am. Dec. 784. But the rule is different if he has no right so to believe, or is informed to the contrary. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Meacham, 91 Tenn. 428; Trottinger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 11 Lea, 583; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Moore, 49 Tex. 81, 30 Am. Rep. 98; 37 L. R. A.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Campbell, 76 Tex. 174; McVeety v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 45 Minn. 268, 11 L. R. A. 174.

There are cases apparently holding the contrary. The first one is a Pennsylvania decision, under which a shipper was allowed to recover damages for injuries sustained while his freight car was attached to a passenger train, though the freight agent who made the arrangement with him for such shipment told the shipper when the application was made that a rule of the company forbade it. The passenger train to which the car of the shipper was subsequently attached was not then present. When it arrived, however, the freight car was attached, and it thus appears that this action was sanctioned by the freight agent of the company, and all the company's representatives on the passenger train. Under such circumstances, the shipper might well have been assumed to have participated in no wrong and no violation of the rules of the company. He had the right to ask the freight agent to attach his car to the passenger train, and when the agent told him that the rules of the company forbade it he could not know that, before the arrival of the passenger train, the agent might not have obtained the requisite authority to attach it, especially as he subsequently, with the assent of the company's representatives on the passenger train did do so. Lackawanna & B. R. Co. v. Chenoweth, 52 Pa. 382, 91 Am. Dec. 168.

Two other cases cite this one with approval.—Oreed v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 86 Pa. 139, 26 Am. Rep. 693; Dunn v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 58 Me. 187, 4 Am. Rep. 267,—but they are both cases in which the passenger does not appear (as in the case before us) to have been told that he was riding in violation of any rule of the company, and therefore do not fall within the rule attempted to be deduced from the first Pennsylvania case, but are properly decided, under all the cases, and are in strict accord with that herein laid down. If the case in 52 Pa. be, however, treated as authority there for the proposition that a recovery can be had for an injury sustained by one riding on a freight train by inducing a conductor to violate a known rule of the company, of which the conductor at the time informs him, it will not be so treated here, as it is contrary to the former holdings of this court and to the general current of authority.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

The city of Roanoke, on the 29th day of July, 1890, entered into an agreement in writing, duly executed, with the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, whereby the said railroad company agreed on its part to build, and furnish the material therefor, at its own expense, an overhead bridge across the railroad at three points in the city of Roanoke, among the number at Randolph street, where it intersected with Railroad avenue, running parallel to said railroad, and in consideration whereof the city of Roanoke agreed on its part to build the approaches to said bridges. Accordingly, the city of Roanoke proceeded to construct the approach to the bridge to be erected, and which has been erected, by the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company across its road-bed at the point named in Randolph street, and the city prosecuted the work till enjoined, as will be hereinafter stated. On

M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557; Hodges v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 88 Va. 653; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 696, 8 L. R. A. 429. In each of those cases the act complained of was committed by a private corporation for private gain, and not for the public good only. There is, to our mind, a marked difference between a private corporation, or any third party, though claiming, under the authority of the legislature, the right to place additional burdens upon the servitude of a public highway for private gain, and a public corporation clothed with authority from the legislative power to improve its public highways so as to make them more convenient and safe to the traveling public (2 Dill. Mun. Corp. [4th ed.] §§ 715, 716); and on this point see opinion of this court in Hodges v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 88 Va. 655, where Hinton, J., says: "The easement of the public is the right to use and improve the street for the purposes of a highway only. A railroad on the street, being foreign to such purposes, is an interference with the adjoining owner's property rights in the soil, and an acquisition or taking of an estate or interest in his land, for which he is entitled to compensation as in other cases." It is undeniable that the city of Roanoke, in making the improvement in Randolph street of which appellant complains, was the agent of the state, and performing a public duty imposed upon it by the legislature; and that persons appointed or authorized by law to make or improve a highway are not answerable for consequential damages, if they act within their jurisdiction, and with care and skill, is a doctrine almost universally accepted alike in England and in this country. See opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 641, 25 L. ed. 338, and cases there cited. This case, as we have seen, grew out of the construction of a tunnel under the Chicago river along the line of La Salle street, under authority conferred upon the city by its legislative charter; and Mr. Justice Strong further says: "The doctrine, however it may at times appear to be at variance with natural justice, rests upon the soundest legal reason. The state holds its highways in trust for the public. Improvements made by its direction or by its authority are its acts, and the ultimate responsibility, of course, should rest upon it. But it is the prerogative of the state to be exempt from coercion by suit, except by its own consent. This prerogative would amount to nothing if it does not protect the agents for improving highways which the state is compelled to employ. The remedy, therefore, for a consequential injury resulting from the state's action through its agents, if there be any, must be that, and that only, which the legislature shall give. It does not exist at common law. The decisions to which we have referred were made in view of Magna Charta and the restriction to be found in the constitution of every state that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation being made. But acts done in the proper exercise of governmental powers, and not directly encroaching upon private property, though their consequences may impair its use, are universally held not to be a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision. They do not entitle the owner of such property to compensation from the state or its agent, or give him any right of action. This is supported by an immense weight of authority." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 542, and notes, and cases there cited. Proceeding further, this eminent jurist says that: "The extremest qualification of the doctrine is to be found, perhaps, in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557, and in Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. Railroad, 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147. In those cases it was held that permanent flooding of private property may be regarded as a 'taking.' In those cases there was a physical invasion of the real estate of the private owner, and a practical ouster of his possession. But in the present case there was no such invasion." So in the case here under consideration.

A case almost exactly similar to the one we now have under consideration has recently been decided by the supreme court of Minnesota, and reported in the Northwestern Reporter (vol. 60, p. 814), styled Willis v. Winona, 26 L. R. A. 142. The syllabus of that case is as follows: "(1) The city of Winona, under express legislative authority, constructed a public wagon bridge across the Mississippi river, the Minnesota end of which reaches the river bank near the foot of Main street, and at considerable height above the natural level of the land. For the purpose of connecting the bridge, for the purposes of travel and traffic, with Main street and other public streets, the city constructed an approach in and along the center of Main street in front of plaintiff's abutting lot. This approach, which consists partly of solid abutments and partly of a plankway supported by iron columns, gradually ascends from the natural level of the street at one end to the level of the bridge at the other. (2) Held, that the construction and maintenance of this approach does not impose any additional servitude on the street, and does not render the city liable for damages to plaintiff's lot, in the absence of any negligence on the part of the city, and of any statute imposing such liability." Judge Mitchell, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, in summarizing the facts alleged adds to what is stated in the syllabus: "This approach commences in the center of Main street, a short distance south of plaintiff's lot, and gradually rises until it reaches the height of about 25 feet opposite the north end of the lot. This approach is 24 feet wide, leaving a portion of the street on each side at the former grade. It is covered with plank, and is supported by abutments and columns of iron and stone. The construction and maintenance of this approach have materially reduced the value of the plaintiff's lot, but there is no allegation that it touches the body of the plaintiff's lot, or that it was negligently constructed, or in any manner not expressly authorized by the act of the legislature." And upon his statement of what the act of the legislature—that is, the charter of the city—provides with reference to private property taken, etc., it fully appears that it is in effect the same as section 23 of the charter of the city of Roanoke, relied on by appellant. The basis of the claim asserted by Willis against the city of Winona for damages was, as in the case here, based on two grounds: (1) That the Act of 1891 (the charter of Winona), authorizing the building of this bridge, imposes upon the city a positive duty to pay such damages; and (2) that the construction of this bridge approach has imposed an additional servitude upon the street upon which plaintiff's lot abuts. But the court held, in its strong opinion, supported by numerous authorities cited, that, taking all of the provisions of the act (that is, the charter of Winona) together, it was not intended to impose upon the city a liability to pay damages where none already existed, but merely to provide a method of ascertaining and paying damages for such taking of private property as, under existing law, entitled the owner to compensation; and that the construction and maintenance of the bridge approach are not an additional servitude on the street for which the plaintiff could recover damages, saying that "the doctrine of the courts everywhere, both in England and this country (unless Ohio and Kentucky are exceptions), is that, so long as there is no application of the street to purposes other than those of a highway, any establishment or change of grade made lawfully, and not negligently performed, does not impose an additional servitude upon the street, and hence is not within the constitutional inhibition against taking private property without compensation, and is not the basis for an action of damages, unless there be an express statute to that effect."

Stress is laid by appellant's counsel here upon section 23 of the charter of the city of Roanoke, as imposing the duty upon the city to compensate appellant for the taking of its property by the construction of the approach to Randolph street bridge, and in like cases; but we think that that section of the charter refers to the acquisition of property for the opening of new streets, the extension of those already opened or dedicated, and to the building or establishment of work-houses, houses of correction, and other buildings or improvements contemplated in the charter; and, if section 23 has any application to appellant's case, it is, after all, but the embodiment of the established law of the state, and only provides a method of ascertaining and paying damages for the taking of private property under existing law where the owner is entitled to compensation. So, after as careful examination of the authorities reported in other states and the federal reports as we could give, we conclude that, since we find from the authorities cited supra that the building of an approach to a bridge authorized by law to be built is but the grading of the street to adapt it to the uses and needs of the public, the determination of the case under consideration must be governed by the rulings of this court in the cases of Smith v. Alexandria and Kehrer v. Richmond City, supra. The doctrine laid down in those cases is stated clearly by Judge Burks in the first-named case as follows: "The validity of the legislative act, similar to the charters of most of our cities and towns in respect to streets, has not been, and cannot be, questioned; and, the city council having full discretionary power thereunder to improve the streets of the city by grading them, the due exercise of the power cannot, in the nature of things, be wrongful in a legal point of view; and hence, although it may be attended or followed by damage, as a necessary incident, to the owners of adjacent lots, such damage is what is known in the law as 'damnum absque injuria', and imposes no legal liability." 83 Gratt. 211, 36 Am. Rep. 768; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 762, 763. The opinion of the court by Lewis, P., in Kehrer v. Richmond City, 81 Va. 745, but emphasizes the doctrine,—a doctrine that, we admit, appears harsh, and may be really so, when applied to some cases; but it should be remembered that it is not the province of this court to make the law, but rather to enforce it.

It is, however, contended by appellant that because section 50 of the charter of Roanoke requires all contracts for the erection of public improvements or buildings within the jurisdiction of the city council to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, after notice, etc., all the acts and doings of the city in connection with the building or construction of the bridge approach in Randolph street are manifestly contrary to law and illegal,—ultra vires.

We see nothing in that clause of the charter which inhibited the city from constructing public buildings or improvements under direction of its own engineers and officers. It simply provides that when such buildings or improvements are let to contract, it shall be to the lowest bidder, and after advertisement, as provided. Any other construction of that provision would prove dangerous, if not injurious, to any city, since we see from this record that, if that construction had been followed, the approaches to the overhead bridges in the city of Roanoke would have cost the city $8,000 or $10,000 more than they will under the mode of construction adopted by the city.

Upon a review of the whole case, and for reasons stated, we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court of Roanoke city dissolving the injunction awarded in the case, and dismissing appellant's bill, is clearly right in all respects, and must be affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Charles ROSE, Receiver of the Consolidated Mutual Fire Ins. Co., Resp't.,

v.

KIMBERLY & CLARK CO., Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

A contract made by mail for the insurance of property within the state by a foreign company which is prohibited from transacting insurance business within the state directly or indirectly, will not sustain an action by a receiver of the company against the policy holder to recover an assessment.

(March 5, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Winnebago County Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel payment of an assessment upon a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

Action by the receiver of an insolvent foreign mutual insurance company to recover an assessment made upon policy holders. The Consolidated Mutual Fire Insurance Company was an Illinois corporation, having its principal office at Chicago, and it never complied with the laws of the state of Wisconsin relating to foreign insurance companies doing business within this state, and consequently had no license to transact such business. In 1890 the defendant made application to the insurance company for insurance upon its property in Neenah, in this state. The applications were sent by mail to the office of the insurance company at Chicago, and there accepted, and the policies mailed to the defendant at Neenah. The policies contained provisions that the insured assumed a contingent liability equal to three times the annual cash premium, to pay losses and expenses, the same to be paid upon the making of assessments for that purpose by the officers of the company. In December, 1890, the officers of the insurance company made an assessment of 20 per cent upon the policy holders, upon this contingent liability to pay losses and expenses, and the defendant refused to pay. In April, 1891, the plaintiff was appointed receiver of the insurance company by the proper court at Chicago, and duly qualified, and brings this action as such receiver. It appeared that said assessment was necessary to pay the losses and expenses of the company outstanding. Upon these facts, which were substantially undisputed, the trial court held that the policies were valid contracts of insurance, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the assessment, and the defendant appealed.

NOTE.—For restrictions on business by foreign insurance companies, see note to State v. Ackerman (Ohio) 24 L. R. A. 226, and as to what insurance business or other business by foreign companies is done within the state, see note to Cone Export & Commission Co. v. Poole (S. C.) 24 L. R. A. 239.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The insurance contracts in question were made outside of this state upon property within the state, by a foreign company which had not complied with the laws of Wisconsin, and was thus debarred from doing business within the state. The question arising is not whether these contracts can be enforced in the courts of Illinois where they were made. It might well be that, were this action pending before an Illinois court, it would be held that, the contracts being Illinois contracts, and there being nothing in the statutes or policy of that state prohibiting them, they would be held valid and binding. Such, in substance, was the ruling of this court in the case of Seamans v. Knapp, S. & Co. Company (decided at last term) ante, 362, where a contract made in Wisconsin insuring property in Missouri by a Wisconsin insurance company which had no license to transact business in Missouri was upheld. But it is obvious that that decision does not reach or control this case. The question here presented is whether the courts of this state will enforce a contract plainly and squarely opposed to the public policy and laws of the state. Doubtless the general rule of law is that a contract valid where made is valid everywhere, but this rule is not without exception. The provisions of our statutes which prescribe the conditions upon which alone foreign insurance companies may do business within this state are very stringent and sweeping. Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. §§ 1915-1919. They provide, in substance, that no foreign fire insurance company shall, directly or indirectly, take risks or transact any business of insurance in this state, except upon compliance with certain specified requirements. It is unnecessary to state what these requirements are in detail, but it is sufficient to say that they include, among other things, the filing of verified statements showing investments of capital in certain specified securities and to certain amounts, or, in lieu thereof, a deposit with the state treasurer of a certain amount of United States bonds; also, the payment of certain license fees, and the filing of various documents intended for the benefit and protection of policy holders within the state; and only upon compliance with all these requirements is the commissioner of insurance authorized to issue the license which authorizes the doing of business within this state. The object of this statute is so plain that it cannot be mistaken. It is to protect our citizens against irresponsible and worthless foreign companies of the very kind which we have now before us. The evil to be corrected is not the writing of a policy by an unlicensed company within this state alone, but the writing of such a policy at all. Bearing in mind the object of the statute and the evil to be corrected, it is very plain that the object will be largely defeated, and the evil will flourish as before, if it be held that companies without license can establish their agencies just outside of the state line and conduct their business by mail. Now, it will be observed that the legislature was not content with providing that no unlicensed company should make a contract of insurance within this state, but provided that no such company should, directly or indirectly, take risks or transact any business of insurance in this state. The writing of a policy of insurance upon property situated within this state would seem pretty clearly to be, in some degree at least, the transaction of insurance business in this state, whether the policy be written just within or just without the state line. It was said in Stanhillber v. Mutual Mill Ins. Co., 76 Wis. 285, on page 291: "A contract insuring property in this state necessarily involves the doing of business in this state, and hence is subject to the laws of this state." We regard the remark as entirely correct, and fully as applicable to the present case as to the Stanhillber Case. It is not meant by this that the legislation in question has extraterritorial effect, or that it will invalidate a contract made in Illinois, but simply that when that contract is a contract insuring property within this state it is against the policy of our law, and will not be enforced by the courts of Wisconsin unless the conditions prescribed by our law have been complied with. In no other way can the manifest purpose and intent of the statute be reached; any different construction would render the law of little effect. These views necessitate reversal of the judgment.

Judgment reversed, and action remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant in accordance with this opinion.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

M. Foster CHAFEY

John T. MATHEWS, Receiver of James Moore, Insolvent, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. That a mortgage to cover advances by a bank runs to the cashier individually and not to the bank will not prevent its enforcement in favor of the bank, if no one will be prejudiced by the fact that it was taken in that form.
2. Affidavits for renewal of a perpetual mortgage need not state the amount of matured indebtedness if the obligations matured and unmatured exceed the amount of the mortgage.
3. The security of a mortgage is not affected by statements made in good faith by the mortgagee to creditors of the mortgagor that the latter is doing a good business and will be able to meet his obligations, although the statements prove to be untrue.
4. The interest of a vendee of goods by conditional sale will pass under a mortgage of all his stock, so that the mortgagee may maintain replevin for them against an insolvency receiver claiming them for the benefit of all creditors.

(February 12, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gratiot County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain goods forming part of a stock which defendant had taken possession of as receiver of an insolvent. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. B. H. Sawyer, for plaintiff in error;

NOTE.—The above case seems to be a novel one in respect to the right of a mortgagee under a chattel mortgage to claim possession of goods which the mortgagor had obtained under a conditional sale with reservation of title.

On the general subject of such sales, see notes to Weinstein v. Freyer (Ala.) 12 L. R. A. 700; Hineman v. Matthews (Pa.) 10 L. R. A. 283.

The receiver could not impeach a fraudulent conveyance.

The same rule must govern the mortgagee's right to testify in this case as would if the general creditors had, prior to the assignment of Mr. Moore, attached the property purported to be covered by the mortgage.

Bank of Utica v. Finch, 8 Barb. Ch. 294, 5 L. ed. 907, 49 Am. Dec. 175; Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 556; Ladue v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 18 Mich. 380, 87 Am. Dec. 759; Craig v. Tappin, 2 Sandf. The testimony of Mr. Chafey was clearly incompetent as attempting to establish and attach to the mortgage the right or ownership of the bank, and the claims and dealings of the bank with and against the mortgagor, Moore, the bank being a party outside of the record and unknown in the mortgage, and the creditors so far as they were informed by the mortgage and the renewals knew only that Chafey was the real owner and mortgagee.

Creditors who have given credit after the failure to comply with the statute as to renewals, whether with knowledge of the existence of the mortgage or not, are not affected by the mortgage.

tioned in the mortgage; nor do they show the amount of money advanced.

Brown v. Brabb, 67 Mich. 17.

McGrath, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was on the 23d day of January, 1891, and is now, the cashier of the First National Bank at Ithaca. On that date he took from one Moore, who was a customer of the bank, a chattel mortgage in the sum of $4,000, covering Moore's stock of merchandise, and all additions and accessions to said stock, to secure the payment of Moore's obligations, both present and future, to the bank. The bank continued to discount Moore's individual paper, as well as that of his customers, and advance moneys upon drafts drawn by Moore upon his customers, until August, 1893, when Moore made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The assignee failing to qualify, defendant was appointed receiver, and took possession. Plaintiff replevied the stock of merchandise under his mortgage.

It is insisted by defendant:

1. That the mortgage runs to plaintiff individually, and not to the bank. Its purpose, however, was fully understood, not only by the mortgagor but by the creditors. All of the business was done through plaintiff, and no one appears to have been prejudiced by the fact that the mortgage did not run directly to the bank.

2. That the affidavits of renewal filed January 18, 1892, and January 8, 1893, did not correctly set forth the facts as they existed at that time. The renewals allege that "there is due and remaining unpaid on said mortgage the sum of $4,000," and "that the interest of said M. Foster Chafey in the chattels therein and described remains unchanged." It appears upon the face of the mortgage that it was to be a continual indemnity. The mortgage was not required to state the actual amount of the matured indebtedness upon those dates, so long as the obligations, both matured and unmatured, exceeded that sum.

3. That plaintiff made representations to certain creditors which were misleading, and operated as a fraud upon them. It is not claimed that the mortgagee at any time misrepresented the state of the account between the bank and the mortgagor. What is charged is that, upon inquiry made by creditors, plaintiff represented that Moore was doing a good business, and would be able to meet his obligations. These were opinions, merely, and there was nothing to show that they were not given in entire good faith. Indeed, at the time of the failure, Moore was indebted to the bank in the sum of $14,000.—a sum largely in excess of the security held by the bank.

4. That certain goods seized by plaintiff under the writ had been delivered to Moore by the McFarland Carriage Company, under written contracts, by the terms of which the title to the goods was to remain in the carriage company, and it is urged that plaintiff had no right to take these goods under his writ. The right to possession of these goods under the contract in question was at the date of the assignment in Moore. He cannot be said to have had no interest in the goods, and whatever interest he had passed under the mortgage. Whatever payments he may have made upon them inured to the benefit of the mortgagee. The receiver took through Moore, and subject to the mortgage. He cannot be allowed, in this proceeding, to represent the carriage company. The claim of that company is adverse to that of the receiver and the creditors. The carriage company, when it asserts this claim, if it ever does, will do so, not as a creditor, but as having the title to the goods in question. It further appears that the carriage company, on the 14th day of October, 1893, filed its claim as a creditor for the balance of its account, without reference to any claim of ownership. It is not necessary to determine whether the filing of said claim was a waiver of its right to claim title. It is sufficient that Moore mortgaged his interest in these goods—including, as an incident, the right of possession—to plaintiff.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Mary L. G. LAWRENCE, Appt.,

v.

City of LOUISVILLE.

(.....Ky.....)

The vested right to a defense under the statute of limitations after bar of a cause of action is complete, is protected against subsequent changes in the law by the constitutional provision that all "rights" shall continue valid.

(February 9, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Louisville Law and Equity Court in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas F. Hargis, Oscar Turner, Jr., and Matt O'Doherty for appellant.

Mr. H. S. Barker for appellee.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 30th day of January, 1891, this action was brought by the appellant, Mary L. G. Lawrence, against the city of Louisville for damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the neglect of the city in the erection and use of its bridge at the east terminus of Breckenridge street, and that the bridge was defective and perilous, which could be and was discovered by the city; that on the 2d day of June, 1890, she was run over on the bridge, by reason of the defect in the construction and condition of the bridge, and her leg was so mangled and injured that it became necessary to amputate it. Among other defenses made by the city was that more than six months had elapsed from the time the cause of action accrued before the action was instituted, and it pleaded the statute of limitation as a bar to the action. The statute relied upon is an amendment to the charter of the city of Louisville, approved March 29, 1882, and reads as follows: "No action for damages of any character whatever to either person or property, shall be instituted or maintained against the city, unless such action be commenced within six months after the accrual of the cause of action. . . . A demurrer was filed to the paragraph of the answer pleading this statute as a bar to the action. The court overruled the demurrer. Plaintiff declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed.

To review this action of the court the cause is before this court. The demurrer was overruled in January, 1892. The statute of limitation, supra, was held by this court to be constitutional in the case of Preston v. Louisville, 84 Ky. 118. This court held a similar statute in relation to the city of Covington to be constitutional. Covington v. Hoadley, 88 Ky. 444. It is insisted by counsel for appellant that this statute, supra, which barred the action because it was not brought within six months, was not in force when the demurrer was overruled by the court, but that the general limitation law of the state was then applicable, which did not bar an action for such injuries for one year after the cause of action accrued. The present constitution was adopted September 28, 1891. It is contended that by the schedule of the constitution all laws not inconsistent therewith shall remain in force until altered or repealed by the general assembly; that all actions not inconsistent with it are construed as valid, and all laws inconsistent with the constitution shall cease upon its adoption; and that as, by section 59, subd. 5, of the Constitution, the general assembly is prohibited from passing any local or special acts "to regulate the limitation of civil or criminal causes," the special statute, supra, ceased, because it is inconsistent with that constitutional provision. It is claimed, as the special statute ceased, the general law then in force became applicable, and, as the action was brought within one year from the time the cause accrued, the action was not barred. In other words, that the general law became retroactive, and restored her right to maintain her action, and destroyed the complete defense which the city had to it. The question as to whether or not the special act is inconsistent with the constitution, and ceased on its adoption, is not decided, although the court may consider the question involved apparently from that point of view. To reach the conclusion which the court announces in the case, it is not necessary to determine that the special statute has ceased. It is no longer an open question as to the power of the legislative branch of the government to pass limitation laws, and to alter or change them by extending the time for their enforcement, or it may shorten the time by giving a reasonable time for asserting the right. The power to do this before the bar takes place is conceded. In some cases retrospective legislation may be upheld. However, words of a statute ought not to have a retrospective operation unless they are so clear, strong, and imperative that no other meaning can be annexed to them, or unless the intention of the legislature cannot be otherwise satisfied. Mr. Justice Paterson in United States v. Beth, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 399, 2 L. ed. 479; Harvey v. Tyler, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 347, 17 L. ed. 875; Sohn v. Waterson, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. ed. 787. While the first subdivision of the schedule of the constitution continues as valid all actions not inconsistent therewith, the same subdivision continues as valid all rights not inconsistent therewith. It reads as follows: ". . . All rights, actions . . . not inconsistent therewith shall continue as valid as if the constitution had not been adopted. . . ." At the time of the adoption of the constitution, the right to plead the statute of limitation had accrued. It was a complete bar to the action. The language of the constitution shows an intention to preserve that "right" as fully as the second subdivision provides that "actions and causes of actions, except as herein provided, shall continue and remain unaffected by the adoption of this constitution." It follows that this action was unaffected by the adoption of the constitution. The right to recover, or the cause of action, having been extinguished by the lapse of time, the adoption of the constitution did not revive the right or cause of action. Evidently it was not intended that it should be done. The law-making branch of the government has no more power to destroy a defense that has accrued than it has to take the citizen's property "without due process of law." When one is released from a demand by the statute of limitation, his right of defense is as valuable as the right to institute the action. When the defense has accrued, the right to maintain the action is destroyed. When one has occupied land adversely for a given number of years, the statute of limitation destroys the remedy which the owner possesses to recover it. His right was extinguished by the destruction of his remedy. The defense is in the nature of a vested right. In the application of the statute of limitation, it is the same whether the suits arise ex contractu or ex delicto. Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 203, 39 Am. Rep. 558. Though a debt has never been paid, the statute of limitation bars it after a certain lapse of time, and no legislative authority can reimpose the obligation. The obligation can only be imposed by his will and consent. When one is guilty of a tort, and immunity from suit has arisen by operation of the statute of limitation, the legislature cannot deprive him of it, any more than it can the debtor who has been exempted from a demand by operation of the statute of limitation. Naught v. Oneal, 1 Ill. 29 Appendix, was an action for slander, and the court said: "If the cause of action accrued one year or more before the repeal of the statute of limitation, still the old statute of limitation is a good bar to the action. It is a complete bar before the repeal, and the repeal of a statute does not affect the rights acquired under the repealed statute." In Moore v. Lucas, 29 Pa. 262, 73 Am. Dec. 639, the court said: "It is a mistake to suppose that the person barred by the statute loses nothing but his remedy. The law never deliberately takes away all remedy without an intention to destroy the right. Remedies are frequently changed. One is withdrawn and others remain, or one is substituted for another. But when all remedies are taken away after a specified period of neglect in asserting rights, and when this is done for the purpose of promoting the best interests of society, the right itself is destroyed. In Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 554, 18 L. ed. 409, the court said: 'A right without a remedy is as if it were not. For every beneficial purpose, it may be said not to exist.' In Sprecher v. Wakeley, 11 Wis. 440, the court said: 'And although it is generally true that the statute only bars the remedy, and does not destroy the right, yet, when the defense has been vested, no subsequent revival of the right to sue, as by repeal of the statute or other act, without the consent of the party entitled to the defense, could take away or destroy such defense.' Kent, Ch. J., in Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 5 Am. Dec. 291, quotes with approval the declaration as follows: 'A law can be repealed by the lawgiver, but the rights which have been acquired under it while it was in force do not thereby cease. It would be an act of absolute injustice to abolish with the law all the effects which it produced.' In Kinman v. Cambridge, 121 Mass. 558, it was decided that the Statute of 1874 extending the time for filing a petition for damages for land taken to widen a street did not revive an action already barred by the statute existing before the new act was passed. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 480, holds that there is a vested right in a defense to an action, even in the statute of limitation, when thereby the bar has attached. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 455), says: "Regarding the circumstances under which a man may be said to have a vested right to a defense against a demand made by another, it is somewhat difficult to lay down a comprehensive rule which the authorities will justify. It is certain that he who has satisfied a demand cannot have it revived against him, and he who has become released from a demand by the operation of the statute of limitation is equally protected. In both cases the demand is gone, and to restore it would be to create a new contract for the parties,—a thing quite beyond the power of legislation." In Davis v. Minor, 1 How. (Miss.) 183, 28 Am. Dec. 825, the high court of errors and appeals of Mississippi decided that a law reviving the right of action barred by the statute of limitation is void. The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To my mind it is clear that the moment the remedy was gone, by the running of the statute, the right was gone also, and a right to set this lapse of time up as a defense vested in the opposite party, and he could not be deprived of the privilege, without his consent, by subsequent litigation. This must be the rule if a defense may form the subject of a right, and that it may seems to me to be clear." It was decided in Thompson v. Read, 41 Iowa, 48, that the repeal of the statute of limitation cannot act retrospectively so as to disturb rights acquired thereunder, and deprive parties of protection to which they were fully entitled under the prior enactment. The current of decisions in other states treats as a vested right the privilege to plead the statute of limitation when it has run and become a bar to a demand arising either ex contractu or ex delicto. We believe the right of defense is just as important as the right to bring an action. When the right to recover property has been extinguished because of the statute of limitation, we say that the one who thus holds has a vested right. He acquired it, not by a moral, but a legal, remedy. He is, then, beyond the power of the legislature to deplete him of his rights therein, except by his consent or due process of law. From a wise public policy, the legislature has declared that a cause of action is destroyed by certain neglect, thus securing a party a right to withhold his property from subjection to a demand. The legislature has no more right in the one than in the other case, by retrospective legislation, to destroy the right to property; each being held by virtue of the statute of limitation. The right to a defense should be held as inviolate as the right of action. When the remedy is destroyed, the right to maintain the action is extinguished.

From the foregoing views, it will be seen that the court is of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained, although, when the constitution was adopted, the six-months statute of limitation may have ceased, and the one-year statute become operative, as to the city of Louisville. However, this point is not decided.

Judgment affirmed.

(.....Cal.....)

1. An attachment of property of an insolvent bank which has failed and closed its doors cannot be allowed under the Bank Commissioners' Act, § 11, which fully provides for the winding up of insolvent banks by commissioners, and takes them out of the operation of the insolvent act applicable to other corporations.
2. The complaint, answer, and decree in a suit by the people to wind up an insolvent bank are admissible in evidence against the plaintiff in an attachment against such bank to show that its property has been placed beyond the reach of attachment.

assets of the bank which had become insolvent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. A. Barnard, Thomas A. Cator, and W. H. Hutton, for appellants:

The time when attachment ceases to be proper should be the commencement of the proceeding under the act to have the bank adjudged insolvent.

Up to the 15th day of August, 1893, the Pacific Bank was transacting its usual business. The right of attachment then clearly existed; the 16th day of October, 1893, did not dissolve them.

People v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 100 Cal. 120.

The attachments stand in precisely the same position that they would if a receiver were in the bank. The receiver takes the property subject to attachment liens.

The object of the commissioners' bank act is to have the assets of the Pacific Bank applied ratably to the payment of its debts; to place each creditor on an equal footing.

Atty-Gen. v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 53 How. Pr. 22.

Under the bank commissioners' act the assets of the bank are in the custody of the law, under the supervision of the commissioner and no judgment can be rendered.

Those actions must abate because it would be an idle thing for the court to render a judgment and then not be able to enforce it.

Haynes, C., filed the following opinion:

Appeal from an order dissolving an attachment. On the 10th day of August, 1893, the plaintiff brought his action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover from the defendant, a banking corporation, a certain sum alleged to have been deposited with it as a commercial deposit, and on the same day procured a writ of attachment to issue in said action, and which was on the same day levied upon assets of said bank sufficient to cover his claim. On November 17, 1893, the defendant served upon plaintiff notice of a motion to dissolve said attachment, "upon the ground that the attachment was improperly issued and levied, and on the ground that said attachment is dissolved by operation of law, by reason of the transaction of unsafe business and the insolvency and suspension of business by said Pacific Bank, defendant, prior to the issuance of said attachment, and by reason of the judgment of said superior court, duly made and entered, that it was unsafe for said bank to continue business, and that said bank was insolvent, and enjoining said bank from transacting business." Said motion was based upon affidavits served therewith, and upon the records and papers in said superior court in the action entitled: "The People, etc., v. Pacific Bank, No. 42,863." The affidavit of A. Gerberding read in support of said motion shows, in substance, the following facts: That from January 5, 1891, he was a member of the state board of bank commissioners; that the defendant was incorporated in 1863, under an act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the formation of corporations for the accumulation and investment of funds and savings," approved April 11, 1862, under the name and style of the Pacific Accumulation & Loan Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000; that in 1866 the name of said corporation was changed to that of the Pacific Bank, under an act of the legislature approved March 31, 1866, authorizing it to change its name; that said corporation closed its doors for business, and wholly suspended payment of its debts, dues, and liabilities, on the 23d day of June, 1893, and has not since resumed payment; that on said last-mentioned day said bank held in trust for persons, partnerships, and corporations an aggregate fund amounting to about $1,868,041.45; that, prior to said last-mentioned day, said bank commissioners examined said bank, and found that it had been guilty of a violation of law in conducting business contrary to its articles of incorporation in an unsafe manner, and so as to seriously jeopardize the capital, property, and business of the bank, and thereupon directed it, by an order addressed to it, to discontinue such illegal and unsafe practices, and to conform to the requirements of its charter, but that the bank refused and neglected to comply with said order; that on said 23d day of June, 1893, the indebtedness of said bank was largely in excess of the reasonable and actual value of its assets; that the entire capital stock, together with the surplus, had become completely exhausted, and that the directors and stockholders neglected and refused to pay in said depleted stock, or any part of it, and "that on said 23d day of June, 1893, said Pacific Bank was wholly insolvent and remains so insolvent;" that the commissioners reported the condition of the bank to the attorney-general, as required by law; that said attorney-general commenced an action in the superior court on the 14th day of October, 1893, entitled, "The People of the State of California v. The Pacific Bank, a Corporation, et al." in which action it was decreed on November 8, 1893, that said bank was insolvent, etc., and enjoining it and its officers from transacting any further business. The complaint in said action of People v. Pacific Bank alleged substantially the facts stated in the foregoing affidavit of Mr. Gerberding, and, in addition, specified particular acts of mismanagement and of losses sustained by the bank, and its insolvency. The answer of the bank in that case denied all acts of fraud and mismanagement, admitted its insolvency, and alleged that the interest of the creditors and stockholders required that the bank should be enjoined from the transaction of any further business, and that its business and affairs should be closed under the provisions of the bank commissioners' act. This answer, it was further alleged, was duly authorized by vote of the board of directors.

Appellant excepted to the reading of the said complaint, answer, and decree in support of said motion, upon the ground that he was not a party to said action, and was not bound by the proceedings therein. The affidavits read by appellant in opposition to the motion did not deny that the Pacific Bank was insolvent on the 23d day of June, 1893, which was prior to the issuance of the attachment, nor that said bank was incorporated under the Act of 1862, providing for the formation of corporations "for the accumulation and investment of funds and savings" (Stat. 1862, p. 199), but alleged that it conducted the business of a commercial bank, and no other, and advertised and held itself out as "the oldest chartered commercial bank on the Pacific coast;" that the claim upon which his attachment issued was a balance due him upon an ordinary commercial deposit; and upon these facts appellant contends that the property and assets of the bank were properly subject to attachment, and that the court erred in dissolving it; while counsel for respondent contend (1) that the Pacific Bank is a savings bank; that the Act of 1862, under which it was organized, declared that "the capital stock and assets of the corporation shall be a security to depositors who are not stockholders," and that such security is sufficient to prevent an attachment under section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and (2) that, at the time respondent moved to dissolve the attachment, the bank was in liquidation under the bank commissioners' act, and that the judgment of the superior court in the case of People, ex rel. Bank Commissioners v. Pacific Bank, rendered November 8, 1893, related back to the time the bank became insolvent, viz. June 23, 1893, which was prior to the attachment.

Whether the Pacific Bank should be held to have been a commercial bank or a savings bank is an important question, in some aspects affecting the settlement and adjustment of its affairs; but, so far as this appeal is concerned, I think it immaterial, and therefore not necessary to be considered or decided; for if it were beyond doubt or question that it not only conducted its business as a commercial bank, but was chartered as such, I think the attachment was properly dissolved. Under the act creating a board of bank commissioners, and prescribing their duties and powers (Stat. 1877-78, p. 740), and the amendments thereof (Stat. 1887, p. 90), the state not only requires all banks, including commercial as well as savings banks, to report twice each year, under oath, to said board, their financial condition, but through said board exercises the high prerogative power of visitation without notice, and of making an independent examination of its books, papers, bonds, and all securities, "to ascertain the condition of every such corporation, its solvency, its ability to fulfill all its obligations and report its condition to the attorney-general as soon as practicable after such examination." Stat. 1887, p. 91, § 4. Section 11 of said Act, as amended (Stat. 1887, p. 91), further prescribing the powers and duties of said board and of the attorney-general, and the mode of liquidation of insolvent banking corporations, is quoted in full in People v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct., 100 Cal., at pages 111-114, and need not be inserted here. It will there be seen that if the commissioners find that the bank has been violating its charter or the law, or is conducting its business in an unsafe manner, they shall by order direct the bank to discontinue such practices; and if the bank refuses to comply with such order, and if it shall appear to the commissioners that it is unsafe for such bank to continue to transact business, they shall notify the attorney-general of such fact, who, after examination, in his discretion may commence suit to enjoin and prohibit the transaction of any further business; and if the court is of opinion that it is unsafe for the parties interested, or for such corporation, to continue to transact business, and that such corporation is insolvent, he shall grant the injunction, and direct the bank commissioners to take such proceedings against such corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors. This section further fixes the time within which liquidation shall be accomplished; that the commissioners shall have a general supervisory control thereof, may extend the time for final settlement, shall designate the number of officers and employees necessary to close up the business of the corporation, and fix the salaries of the same; and imposes heavy penalties, by fine or imprisonment, or both, upon any officer or employee of any insolvent corporation mentioned in the act if they shall disregard or refuse to obey the directions of the bank commissioners given in accordance with the provisions of the act.

It needs no argument to show that the exercise of the sovereign power of the state over such corporations in the manner above indicated is intended for the protection, not only of the stockholders, but especially for the protection of depositors and all others transacting business with or through the bank. In People v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct., supra, certain creditors of the Pacific Bank, the respondent here, filed a petition in insolvency against said bank, under the Insolvent Act of 1880; and the case there was an application on relation of the bank commissioners for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court from proceeding under the insolvent act against the bank. After quoting said section 11 of the Bank Commissioners' Act, the court said: "We have no doubt that this section was intended by the legislature to provide for every case involving the winding up of the business of a banking corporation, and that it necessarily supersedes the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880 so far as this class of corporations is concerned." This conclusion was approved in Long v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 102 Cal. 449. The case of People v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct., supra, seems to me to be conclusive of the question involved in this case. If the bank commissioners' act operates to take banks out of the operation of the insolvency act, the proceedings under which, though summary and expensive, result in the equal distribution of its assets among its creditors, it is equally clear that it was not intended that the moment a bank closed its doors its assets should be the prey of the first creditor who should secure the issuance of attachments, and thus permit its assets to be converted into money by a still more expensive process, and that the proceeds should be applied to the payment in full of these attachments, leaving other creditors, who, by reason of distance or otherwise, should not be informed of the bank's condition, or be able to secure the prompt issuance of an attachment, wholly without a right to share in its assets. The great care and supervision exercised by the state over banking corporations through the board of bank commissioners indicates a different purpose than that the commencement of proceedings by the state through the attorney-general should be a mere signal to conveniently located creditors to absorb the bank's assets by means of writs of attachment, to the exclusion of equally meritorious creditors less favorably located. The direction of the statute is that if the court should be of the opinion that it is unsafe for the corporation to continue to transact such business, and that it is insolvent, an injunction shall be issued, and thereupon "said judge shall further direct said commissioners to take such proceedings against such corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors," thus clearly showing that the creditors—all the creditors—are interested in and affected by the proceedings in liquidation, and are to be equally protected.

Appellant contends, however, that the right of attachment is a positive statutory right, and that the bank commissioners' act makes no provision for dissolving attachments levied before the machinery of the act was put in motion by the commencement of the action by the people. But, before the attachment was levied, the bank had suspended and closed its doors. The affidavits in support of the motion not only state that fact, but also that it was in fact insolvent, and these facts are not denied. Under these circumstances, the right of attachment did not exist. Section 21 of said Bank Commissioners' Act (Stat. 1877-78, p. 745) declares that "all acts are hereby repealed in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act." It requires no argument to show that the right of attachment under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure is inconsistent with the machinery of the bank commissioners' act, as well as with its obvious purpose and intent. The state never intended that after the continued exercise of its high prerogative powers for the safety of all depositors and creditors, as well as stockholders, its purpose should be thwarted by the seizure of the assets of the bank by one or more creditors, perchance through the connivance of one of its officers or employes. In the later case of People's Home Sav. Bank v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct., 103 Cal. 27, a case involving the construction of the bank commissioners' act, the court said: "The attorney-general is authorized to proceed against the corporation alone, and for the sole purpose, in effect, of winding up its business. In other words, he represents the interests of the people in a matter of public concern."

Appellant's exceptions to the complaint, answer, and decree in the case of People v. Pacific Bank, cannot be sustained. As the suit was by the people under a statute authorizing it, and for the purposes hereinbefore stated, the judgment declaring the bank insolvent is conclusive for all the purposes of the act, and binding upon appellant, so far at least as concerns his right to maintain his attachment; and the pleadings were properly read, for the purpose of showing that the judgment of insolvency was rendered in a case within the statute. If it were otherwise, since the affidavit of Mr. Gerberding that the bank was in fact insolvent on June 28, and ever since remained so, was not controverted the order dissolving the attachment might have been properly sustained without the evidence excepted to, and, if so, appellant was not prejudiced by its admission. As our conclusion is based upon the force and effect of the bank commissioners' act, and proceedings thereunder, a review of the numerous cases cited by appellant which do not refer to this statute could not be profitable. The order appealed from should be affirmed, but without costs to either party, the parties having so stipulated.

We concur: Vandief, C.; Searls, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed, without costs to either party.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF JOHNSON CITY

v.

E. B. MANN et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The difference between the cash and the credit price on a sale of property may be put into the form of interest on a note given for the purchase price without violating the usury law although the per cent agreed upon is greater than the lawful rate of interest.

2. Payment of a principal debt pending suit on a note held only as collateral security leaves it subject to any defense that existed against the pledgeor although the suit may be continued.

NOTE.—Usury in deferred payments of purchase money.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK V. MANN and PEOPLE'S BANK V. JACKSON fairly represent the distinction which runs through the decisions upon this subject. The one line holds that there may be a cash and a credit price for property and that the adoption of the latter will not be usurious although it is made up of the cash price plus interest at an illegal rate. The other line holds that illegal interest cannot be reserved upon the purchase price although it is provided for in the contract of sale. The distinction

3. The fact that in using a blank form, a note is on its face dated at a certain place and made payable there does not prevent it from being considered a contract of another state in which it was delivered when such was the intention.

(October 30, 1894.)

CROSS-APPEALS by complainant and defendant Mann from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County rendered in an action brought to compel payment of a promissory note, the complainant appealing from so much of the decree as held that it had not sufficient interest to maintain the suit, and defendant Mann appealing from so much of the decree as overruled his demurrer to the bill. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Williams & Bowman, for complainant:

The note being given in part payment for a stock of furniture and the rate at eight per cent per annum being contracted for in the preliminary negotiations of the sale, the note is not usurious in Tennessee, where the legal rate of interest is six per centum.

Garrity v. Cripp, 4 Baxt. 88; Brown v. Gardner, 4 Lea, 145; Roger v. O'Neal, 6 L. R. A. 427, 33 W. Va. 159.

Recovery upon the collateral note by the pledgee, does not depend upon the maturity of the original or principal debt; nor is such recovery limited to the amount of the principal debt.

Jones, Pledges, § 664.

The suit by the pledgee upon the collateral note ought not to be defeated by the payment of the principal debt after the suit is brought. The recovery would of course be in the name of the complainant bank, but in trust for the pledgee.

Logan v. Cassell, 88 Pa. 288, 33 Am. Rep. 453; Houser v. Houser, 48 Ga. 415; Jones, Pledges, § 664.

Mr. J. W. Crumley also for complainant.

Messrs. Williams, Henderson & Davis for defendant.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a note in the following words:

seems to be rather fine at first, but further consideration may show it to be substantial. In the one case the purchaser pays a definite price for the privilege of making his payments at a definite time in the future. Default of payment then will subject him only to payment of legal interest until the payment is made. In the other case the purchaser gets no advantage from the high interest. He may pay whenever he can and the amount of illegal interest which he will pay will vary with the time and the whole transaction is in reality nothing more than a usurious contract.

Some of the courts have taken the position that the transaction would not be within the usury laws if the agreement for illegal interest was made a part of the purchase price of the property.

Making the interest part of the purchase price will prevent the contract from being usurious. Beets v. Bidgood, 7 Barn. & C. 453.

If the increased rate of interest is in fact a part 27 L. R. A.

"$2,668.00. Knoxville, Tenn., May 11th, 1891.

"Eighteen months after date I promise to pay to the order of R. G. Johnson $2,668.00, at Holston Banking & Trust Company, value received, with interest at 8 per cent per annum. E. B. Mann." Indorsed: "W. W. Avery. R. G. Johnson."

The note was not paid at maturity, and was duly protested, and notice given, and the bill is filed against the maker and indorsers by the First National Bank of Johnson City and E. S. Wolfe. The bill alleges that the note was executed as part of the consideration for a stock of furniture in Asheville, N. C., and was indorsed to complainant in due course of trade for value and before maturity; that while the note on its face purports to be executed at Knoxville, Tenn., it was in fact executed with reference to the laws of North Carolina, which permit the charge and collection of 8 per cent per annum as interest, and said note was intended to be and was in fact a North Carolina contract; that the stock of furniture was sold on terms of part cash and the balance on a credit, and the rate of interest provided for in said note was but a means of compensating for the time granted for the payment of the balance of the purchase price, and was in no sense meant to be a charge for the use of money, and is not in either aspect usurious, but is a property contract. The bill further alleges that, in addition to the transfer of the note, the claim of Johnson against Mann, based on the original consideration, has been transferred to complainant, and it has been requested to bring the suit by said Johnson. The prayer is for judgment on the note and 8 per cent interest and protest fees, or, in the alternative, for the amount of the original consideration; the recovery to go into the hands of the bank, to be disbursed according to the rights of the parties. The parties were served except Avery, who appears not to have been found, and no further action appears to have been taken as to him. Johnson answered, admitting the execution of the note and the consideration, and that it was a North Carolina contract, and that under the laws of that state 8 per cent was legal interest; that the note was trans-of the purchase price of the land, it is not illegal. Swayne v. Riddle, 37 W. Va. 291; Roger v. O'Neal, 6 L. R. A. 427, 33 W. Va. 159.

Where interest at a greater rate than that allowed by law is in fact a part of the consideration for land, it is not usurious. Rhodes v. Henderson Bldg. & Loan Assn. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 778; Brook v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 537.

That the contract for houses is to be paid in installments with interest at a higher than the legal rate, does not render it usurious if the interest was a part of the contract price of the houses. Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130.

In Van Schaick v. Edwards, 2 Johns. Cas. 362, two of the judges were of the opinion that interest contracted for as part of the purchase price of land was not illegal.

The interest is not usurious if it is part of the original contract price of the land, although there was no cash price fixed. Tousey v. Robinson, 1 Met. (Ky.) 663.

But the majority of the courts have refused to ferred as collateral to Wolfe before maturity, and that the bank had no interest in the note except a right to use its proceeds during certain litigation between Wolfe and Johnson; denies that any claim against Mann on the original consideration had ever been assigned to Wolfe or the bank, and denying that the suit was at his request, and denying all liability. Mann also answered, and with his answer filed demurrer, assigning as grounds: (1) That the note sued on was usurious and illegal on its face, and could not be enforced; (2) that the note extinguished all prior claims; (3) that the suit was multifarious, in seeking to enforce the note and at the same time to set same aside and recover on the original consideration. The demurrer was overruled. The answer set up that there had been fraudulent misrepresentations in the original sale as to the stock of merchandise sold; that the trade was actually made in Tennessee, and the notes accidentally executed in North Carolina, but dated and made payable in Tennessee, and for property located in both states; denies that the contract was a North Carolina contract, or intended to be controlled by the interest laws of that state; that the note is illegal, because it provides for a usurious rate of interest on its face, and its terms cannot be changed by parol; that the bank held the note as collateral, and subject to all equities between the original parties. The case proceeded to proof and hearing, when the chancellor held that complainant, because of insufficiency of interest or title in the note sued on, was not entitled to recover, and dismissed the bill. From this decree complainant appealed, and defendant Mann also appealed from the decree of the chancellor overruling the demurrer, and each appellant has assigned errors.

It further appears in the proof that the complainant bank and Wolfe each held this note simply as collateral, and that the debts for which it was held have been wholly paid, pending this litigation. It is evident the complainants must recover upon the note sued on in this case if they recover at all, as the proof shows conclusively that no assignment of any claim growing out of the original consideration was ever transferred to them, the only transfer made to them or held by them being the note and its indorsements, and there was never any promise to them except as shown by the note. It has been repeatedly held that when a contract is usurious on its face the payee may sue on the original consideration, but an assignee or indorsee cannot recover without an express promise to him. Ottenheimer v. Cook, 10 Heisk. 309. No recovery can therefore be had in this suit against the defendants unless it can be maintained upon the note and its indorsements.

It is next insisted the note is usurious on its face. If so, there can be no recovery upon it, as the court will not enforce an illegal contract. Iser v. Brunson, 6 Humph. 277; Hutchins v. Turner, 8 Humph. 417; Causey v. Yates, Id. 608; Thompson v. Collins, 2 Head, 444; Caruthers v. Andrews, 2 Coldw. 385; Gill v. Creed, 3 Coldw. 298; Thornburg v. Harris, Id. 172; Cate v. Blair, 6 Coldw. 640; Richardson v. Brown, 1 Leg. Rep. 352. And this would be so without any plea of usury sworn to, as the defense rests upon the illegality appearing on the face of the instrument, and not as set up by the pleadings or as developed by the proof. It is insisted, however, in argument, that the note is not usurious, because it was executed in North Carolina, where 8 per cent is legal interest. The note appears on its face to be executed at Knoxville, and is shown by the proof and the face of the note to be payable at Knoxville. It appears that the proposition of sale was submitted to defendant Mann in Knoxville, and accepted by him there, and that fact was wired to Johnson at Asheville. After the invoice was taken at Asheville the note was executed at that place, and delivered at that place, upon a blank used in the Knoxville business, the parties having been interested in a business conducted both at Knoxville and at Asheville. It is also contended that the contract is a property contract, and the rate of interest was part of the purchase consideration given for the property, and was not for a loan of money or forbearance of a debt, which constitutes usury under our law. The aradopt that doctrine and have held that such a contract could not be enforced.

The original contract cannot stipulate for interest at more than the legal rate. Compton v. Compton, 5 La. Ann. 630.

If the additional sum was intended as interest the contract cannot be upheld. Torrey v. Grant, 10 Smedes & M. 89; Parohman v. McKinney, 12 Smedes & M. 631; Mitchell v. Griffith, 22 Mo. 515.

More than the statutory amount cannot be taken on the deferred amounts of the purchase money of real estate, under the name of rent. Scotfield v. McNaught, 52 Ga. 69.

But rent will not ordinarily be regarded as a cover for usury. Seesons v. Richmond, 1 R. I. 298.

Every written agreement to pay interest on a debt in excess of the rate allowed by law as compensation for making the debt payable in the future, or for forbearing to enforce its payment after maturity is in violation of the Texas statutes, whether the transaction involves a loan of money or the sale of property, or any other agreement by 27 L. R. A.

which a debt is created. Fisher v. Hoover, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 81.

If the price is payable at any time and the additional amount is to be paid as long as the principal sum remains due and to cease when it is paid, it is merely a cover for usury and is illegal. Hartranft v. Ublinger, 115 Pa. 270.

Where the price of a thing is permitted to be retained for the accommodation of a purchaser it is as much a loan as if it had been paid to the seller in the first instance and formally returned to the purchaser. Evans v. Negley, 13 Serg. & R. 218.

If the contract plainly is that the additional amount shall be interest at a usurious rate the contract cannot be upheld. Garlington v. Coleman, 2 Speers, L. 238.

A statute prohibiting a contract in which more than a certain rate of interest has been contracted for, received or reserved, will cover the case of a sale of land, upon which interest is reserved at a greater rate in the form of separate notes, one set covering the principal sum and the legal interest.

gument is that the 8 per cent agreed to be given is a part of the consideration to be given, and is but a mode of expressing the difference between the cash and credit price of the goods sold, and that it is not usurious to charge more than legal interest when credit is given, and this difference in credit and cash price may as well be put in the shape of a per cent for the time credit is extended as in the shape of a round sum for such time or credit. In other words, a party may be willing to take for a horse $100 in cash, but would not be willing to sell the same horse on twelve months' credit for less than $120, and such sale at $120 would be legal, and not in any respect usurious; and it is now insisted it cannot matter whether the additional amount of $20 charged for this credit is stated as a round sum or as a per cent upon the $100 for the twelve months' credit granted. This contention is well supported by authorities in our own state and elsewhere. Garrity v. Cripp, 4 Baxt. 86; Brown v. Gardner, 4 Lea, 157; Reger v. O'Neal, 38 W. Va. 159, 6 L. R. A. 427; Touzey v. Robinson, 1 Met. (Ky.) 663; Graeme v. Adams, 28 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130; Cutler v. Wright, 22 N. Y. 472; Hansborough v. Peck, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 509, 15 L. ed. 524. We think the allegations of the bill as well as the proof bring this contract within this rule, even if it should be considered a Tennessee contract. There is in it neither the loan of money nor the forbearance of a debt, and the per cent agreed to be given for the credit was a part of the original consideration for the trade, and we are unable to see in it any device or attempt to evade the usury laws.

There is another feature in the case that it is material to mention. It appears from the proof that pending this litigation the debts due the bank and Wolfe have been paid, for which this note was pledged as collateral, and neither the bank nor Wolfe has now any interest in the recovery. Still, under the law, notwithstanding the principal debt has been paid pending suit on the collateral, such suit may properly continue to judgment, and, if the holder collect the same, he will hold it as trustee for the benefit of the debtor; that is, the owner of the collateral. Jones, Pledges, § 664; Logan v. Cassell, 88 Pa. 288, 32 Am. Rep. 458. But this is only when the maker will not be thereby deprived of some equitable defense he might have against the payee; or, in other words, the holder can only recover subject to the equities of the maker against the payee. Logan v. Cassell, supra; 2 Para. Notes & B. 487; Pearce v. Austin, 4 Whart. 489, 34 Am. Dec. 523.

In this case it is alleged that there are equities as between Mann, the maker, and Johnson, the payee, of the notes, and some proof is taken on that point, but it is not sufficient to determine the rights of these parties as between themselves, nor has the case been passed upon in the court below with a view to an adjudication and determination of these equities. We are of opinion from the record that the contract is a North Carolina contract, and so intended, and the fact that the note is dated Knoxville and payable in Knoxville arises simply from an accidental use of a blank note with these words in it, and not from a design to make it a Tennessee contract, or that it should be governed by Tennessee law. This being so, complainant has the right to collect the note from Mann, and hold the proceeds, as trustee, for Johnson, but subject to all equities existing between Mann and Johnson arising out of the trade between them.

The decree of the chancellor is reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to fix the rights and equities between Mann, the maker, and Johnson, the payee, growing out of their contract of sale and purchase. The costs of the appeal will be paid equally by Mann and Johnson, and the costs of the court below will be adjudged on final hearing.

and the other set, the excess of interest. Crawford v. Johnson, 11 Ind. 258.

Where the price was fixed at $1,000, but the purchaser desiring time, it was agreed that he might have three years if the price was increased to $1,300, and the contract provided that there might be a reduction of 10 per cent per annum upon the amounts paid before that time, it was held usurious. Thompson v. Nesbit, 2 Rich. L. 73.

In Ellenbogen v. Grifley, 55 Ark. 268, it was held that "where a certain price was fixed for property payable in one year at a certain rate of interest and the payment of other charges, each element was as much a part of the consideration for the sale as the other and that since by the terms of the contract the price fixed for the forbearance of money was within the statutory limits, the other charges did not make it usurious." If the per cent charged was a part of the contract price of land it does not appear why there should be a difference if it was in excess of the statutory rate, but the language of the court clearly implies that if it had been in excess of statutory rate, there would have been an unlawful charge for the forbearance of money which would not have been upheld.

There may be a cash and a credit price and it is 37 L. R. A.

lawful and not usurious for the seller to charge more for the property when sold on time, than when sold for cash, but if the land is sold at a cash price and time is given upon a portion of the purchase money and a greater rate of interest than that allowed by law is charged for such time, the contract is usurious; in other words if the contract was that the property should be purchased at a cash valuation and that certain payments therefor were to be deferred in consideration that a greater rate of interest than that allowed by law, was to be paid by the purchaser, then the contract would be usurious. Irvin v. Mathews, 75 Ga. 739; Ford v. Hancock, 36 Ark. 248; Borum v. Fouts, 15 Ind. 50; Newkirk v. Burson, 21 Ind. 129.

There is no loan of money nor forbearance of a debt, within the meaning of the usury laws, when in order to gain time for the payment of the purchase price of property, the purchaser agrees to pay a sum in excess of the cash price which has been asked for the property. Hogg v. Ruffner, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 115, 17 L. ed. 38, in that case the court says a vendor may prefer $100 in hand to double that sum in expectancy, and a purchaser may prefer the greater price with the longer credit; and one who will not distinguish between things that

1. A statute limiting the rate of interest upon any contract "for the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity" applies to a promissory note for the purchase price of real estate.

2. One of three joint makers of a note for the purchase price of real estate is not limited in setting up the defense of usury to the portion corresponding with his interest in the land, and the fact that he has purchased the interests of his co-makers is immaterial.

(January 19, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Fairfield County sustaining defendant's defense of usury in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. E. McDonald, for appellant:

The note having been given for the purchase money of land, is not a "contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity."

It was not the intention of the legislature to interfere with individuals in their ordinary transactions of buying and selling.

Scott v. Lloyd, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 418, 446, 9 L. ed. 178, 188.

It is neither a present loan nor is it a forbearance in respect to some debt previously existing, but is a part of the contract price for land sold and conveyed.

Swayne v. Riddle, 37 W. Va. 291; Harnsbarger v. Kinney, 6 Gratt. 287.

When a party buys land upon his own terms the contract is not in violation of the statute against usury.

Wheeler v. Marchbanks, 32 S. C. 594.

The interest of Adam Jackson alone could be affected thereby.

The defense of usury is personal to the borrower, or party to the contract against which it is alleged.

Stein v. Indianapolis Bldg. Loan Fund and Sav. Assn. 18 Ind. 287, 81 Am. Dec. 858, notes; Stephens v. Muir, 8 Ind. 352, 65 Am. Dec. 764; Ladd v. Wiggin, 35 N. H. 421, 69 Am. Dec. 558; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 987, p. 453; Cheney v. Dunlap, 5 L. R. A. 465, 27 Neb. 401.

Messrs. Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for respondent:

An offer to sell land at one price for cash, or at a much higher price on a long credit, has nothing usurious in it as there is neither a loan nor a forbearance of a debt.

7 Wait, Act. & Def. 619; Wheeler v. Marchbanks, 32 S. C. 594.

But where by the sale of land, chattels, or any other species of property a money debt is created and a higher rate of interest than the law allows is charged on such debt, it is usury.

Hogg v. Ruffner, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 115, 17 L. ed. 88; Crawford v. Johnson, 11 Ind. 258; 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 618, 619; Newkirk v. Burson, 21 Ind. 129; Scotfield v. McNaught, 52 Ga. 69; Shober v. Hauser, 20 N. C. 91.

Usury laws apply to mortgages in the same manner that they apply to contracts in general, and the same principles of law are applicable to the inquiry, whether they are usurious or not.

1 Jones, Mortg. § 638; 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 616; 1 Hilliard, Mortg. 585.

A stranger cannot set up the defense of usury. But it is otherwise with one claiming under and in privity with the mortgagor in law or otherwise; thus, a purchaser from the mortgagor or a second mortgagor.

1 Hilliard, Mortg. 599; Post v. Dart, 8 Paige, 640, 4 L. ed. 573; Brolasky v. Miller, 9 N. J. Eq. 807; Doub v. Barnes, 1 Md. Ch. 127; Westerfield v. Bried, 26 N. J. Eq. 857; Bridge v. Hubbard, 15 Mass. 96, 8 Am. Dec. 86; differ may say with apparent truth that B pays 100 per cent for forbearance, and may assert that such a contract is usurious, but whatever truth there may be in the premises the conclusion is manifestly erroneous.

The principle of that case was applied in Gruell v. Smalley, 1 Duvall, 358.

It will not make the contract usurious although the credit price is made up of the cash price plus interest at an illegal rate. Brown v. Gardner, 4 Lea, 145.

In every article of value the time within which its price is to be paid affects its value, it being worth less for cash, more on short time, and still more than on long time. Garrity v. Cripp, 4 Baxt. 86. In that case the following note was held not to be usurious: "One day after date I promise to pay $20.00 for 40 bushels of corn at 50 cents per bushel, bearing interest at ten and one half per cent (a legal rate). If this note is not paid on the 8th day of July, the note is to be paid at 60 cents per bushel or $24.00, bearing interest at ten and one half per cent."

Crawford v. Johnson and Borum v. Fouts are limited, and it is stated that their doctrine is true only where there was a cash price fixed and the usurious rate was taken upon that and not where the interest represents the difference between the cash and credit price of the land.

When a contract for land is made upon a basis of a certain cash price and the purchaser is unable to procure the money and the vendor agrees to deliver the deed upon the execution of notes for an amount fifteen per cent above the cash price, the transaction will not be usurious. Dykes v. Bottoms (Ala.) June 15, 1893.

A mortgage given for land is not rendered usurious by the fact that the purchaser not being able to comply with the terms of the owner of the land requiring a certain amount cash agrees to give a mortgage for a greater amount in consideration of which the vendor agrees to execute a deed in case the mortgage can be disposed of in the market for the amount of cash demanded by him. Brooks v. Avery, 4 N. Y. 225.

Gary, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought for a foreclosure of a mortgage of realty, executed by Adam Jackson, James Jackson, and Albert Gladney to Calvin Brice and John A. Brice and assigned by them to the plaintiff herein after maturity. The mortgage was given to secure the payment of a note which had been executed by the defendants for the purchase money of the mortgaged premises. It was the joint note of all the defendants for the sum of $1,595, with interest from date at 10 per cent per annum, and was dated the 1st day of January, 1888. Before the commencement of this action James Jackson and Albert Gladney had conveyed their interests in the mortgaged premises to Adam Jackson, and he alone answered the complaint. His answer interposed the defenses of payment and usury. The referee to whom the case was referred filed a report adverse to the defendant. The case came on for trial before his honor R. C. Watts, presiding judge, on exceptions to the report of the referee. His honor modified the report by sustaining the plea of usury and in other respects not material here. The plaintiff appealed to this court on the following exceptions: "(1) For that his honor erred in holding that the plea of usury was applicable to the note set forth in the complaint, and that the plaintiff could not recover anything except the principal of said note, without costs. (2) Because his honor erred in not holding that the said note was given for the purchase money of the tract of land described in the mortgage, and for that reason the interest mentioned and charged therein was not usurious. (3) For that his honor erred in not holding that the note, having been given for the purchase money of land, was not a 'contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity,' and therefore the plea of usury should not have been sustained. (4) For that his honor erred in not holding that the plea of usury, even if applicable, could only affect said note and mortgage to the extent of the interest of Adam Jackson in the land at time said note and mortgage were executed."

This case is ruled by the principle laid down in the case of Thompson v. Nesbit, 3 Rich. L. 78, the facts of which are as follows: To an action of assumpsit on a note for $1,800, credited by $750 paid at various times, the defendant pleaded usury. The note was given for a negro sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The plaintiff asked $1,000 for the negro. The defendant was willing to purchase at that price, but could not pay the cash. The plaintiff was willing to give any time that the defendant wanted if he could have the price increased by the addition to the $1,000 of 10 per cent per annum until payment should be made. After consultation with several persons as to the best means of carrying out their bargain so as to steer clear of usury, it was agreed that the defendant should fix the time, and the plaintiff the price. The defendant said he must have three years; the plaintiff said he must have $300 more. Whereupon the bill of sale was drawn, expressing the consideration to be $1,000, and the note was drawn in the following words: "Three years after date I promise to pay H. Thompson or bearer thirteen hundred dollars, to be paid at such times as I please, and to deduct 10 per cent per annum off of the amount paid at each payment. 11th Nov., 1889. Samuel Nesbit." The intention was that 10 per cent per annum should be added to each payment from the time it was made until the note became due, so that the defendant should have the right of paying as he pleased within three years, and upon every payment should have interest calculated in the same manner as it had been done on the $1,000. His honor left it to the jury to say whether there was a bona fide sale of the negro at $1,800 upon credit with a stipulation of advantage to the defendant upon payments anticipated, or the purchase money of land in installments of a certain amount each is valid and cannot be defeated for usury.

After a contract for the sale of land has once been taken out of the statute of frauds by the taking of possession, the parties cannot agree to postpone payment of the purchase price for a consideration which is greater than the statutory rate of interest. Stewart v. Cross, 66 Ala. 22.

If the price of goods is payable in sixty days and at the expiration of that time an agreement for further credit is made, interest cannot be charged from the time of purchase but only from the time of such agreement. White v. Friedlander, 36 Ark. 82.

Other contracts.

Where by a contract for the sale of goods fifteen per cent is to be added to the purchase price in case they are not paid for within thirty days, the question is one of intention whether the fifteen per 27 L. R. A.

cent is in fact a part of the price of the goods or is interest illegally reserved for the forbearance. Bass v. Patterson, 68 Miss. 310.

A sale of goods on three months' credit which stipulates that in case the money is not paid at the end of that time, there shall be an allowance of a certain amount per month until the debt is paid, is not usurious. Floyer v. Edwards (1774) 1 Cowp. 112.

A contract to pay a certain gross sum for sheep and in addition two pounds of wool for each sheep, each year for two years, is not necessarily usurious. First Nat. Bank of Marshalltown v. Owen, 23 Iowa, 185; Gilmore v. Ferguson, 28 Iowa, 220.

If the title to property is passed through the lender for the purpose of disguising the usurious character of the transaction, it will not be upheld if the loan was in fact made upon usury. Babcock v. Stimmel, 38 N. Y. S. R. 1005.

Paying a third person who assists the intending purchaser to carry out his agreement, a profit on the transaction for the accommodation rendered, will not be usurious. Wheeler v. Marchant, 30 S. C. 594.

whether there was forbearance of $1,000 upon usurious terms. The court in that case said: "The effect of the agreement is precisely the same as if the note had been taken for $1,000, the price of the negro, with usury at 10 per cent per annum. . . . No proof of a corrupt agreement is necessary, for the contract may be usurious, though the parties did not know that it was against law." The court also held that "the jury should have been instructed that the uncontradicted state of facts submitted to them presented a case of usury, and that they should find for the plaintiff only that balance." The plea of usury was sustained. The case of Wheeler v. Marchbanks, 83 S. C. 594, does not conflict with the case just mentioned. Chief Justice Simpson, in delivering the opinion of the court in Wheeler v. Marchbanks, says: "It is sufficient for us to say that the question involved is whether the transaction between the parties, and which gave rise to the action below, was a loan of money by the plaintiff to the defendant, or was a sale of land to said defendant by said plaintiff." In that case the circuit judge found that the facts made out a sale of the land; whereas, in the case at bar, interest eo nomine, at a greater rate than was allowed by law was charged in the note secured by the mortgage.

We do not think there is force in the fourth exception of appellant. The defendant was liable on the note to the full extent, and had the right to plead usury to such extent. The purchase by the defendant from his co-mortgagors of their two-thirds interest in the land did not relieve him from liability on the note, and therefore should not affect his defense of usury.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

McIver, Ch. J., concurring:

If the question whether the contract evidenced by the note set out in the complaint was such a contract as would fall under the usury law, under the undisputed evidence in the case, were an open question, I should feel bound to hold that the usury law did not apply to such contract. The contract here sought to be enforced, having been entered into on the 1st day of January, 1888, before the Act of 1882, approved 21st December, 1882, went into effect, the twenty days not having expired, must be governed by the law which was in force at the time the contract was entered into. That law will be found in the Act of 1877 (16 Stat. at L. p. 325), incorporated in Gen. Stat. 1882 as section 1288. That statute forbids the taking or charging interest, at greater rate than 7 per centum per annum, "upon any contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity." It will be observed that the statute does not forbid the taking or charging of interest at a greater rate than 7 per cent per annum upon any contract for the payment of money, but only upon any contract for "the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity." Hence, when the question is whether a given contract falls within the provision of the statute, the inquiry must necessarily be whether it is a contract for "the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity." If it is, then the statute applies; but if it is not, then the statute does not apply. If the legislature intended that the usury law should apply to any contract for the payment of money, it would have been very easy and most natural for them to have said so. But they did not use any such general language, and, on the contrary, expressly confined the operation of the statute to contracts of a particular and specified character, to wit, contracts "for the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity." Now, in this case the undisputed evidence is that the contract here in question was a contract to pay the purchase money of a certain tract of land, and not a contract for the hiring, lending, or use of money, or other commodity. It seems to me, therefore, that under a proper construction of the statute the contract here sought to be enforced is not a contract to which the usury law applies; and I would so hold, in the absence of controlling authority to the contrary. But in the case of Thompson v. Nesbit, 2 Rich. L. 78, cited by Mr. Justice Gary in the leading opinion, and fully and fairly there set forth, requires a different construction; and yielding to the authority of that case, as I am bound to do, I must concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Gary. It is true that the case just cited arose under the Act of 1880 (6 Stat. at L. p. 409), and not under the statute which was in force at the time the contract in question was made; but the language of the two statutes, so far as relates to the particular question here under consideration, is, in my judgment, substantially the same, and therefore the construction placed by the former court of appeals upon the language of the Act of 1880 must be regarded as authoritative construction of similar language in the Act of 1877. It is also true that in the previous case of Garlington v. Coleman, 2 Speers, L. 288, it is plainly intimated by O'Neill, J., who cites the case of Beets v. Bidgood, 7 Barn. & C. 453, that the usury law (Act of 1880) did not apply to a contract to secure the payment of the purchase money of property sold. But I do not understand that that was a point decided in that case. At all events, the case of Thompson v. Nesbit, supra, was subsequently decided, and is therefore the controlling authority; especially when we find that Judge O'Neill, who had prepared the opinion of the court in Garlington v. Coleman, subsequently concurred in the decision in the case of Thompson v. Nesbit. As to the other question, I do not deem it necessary to add anything to what has been said by Mr. Justice Gary.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

David ROBERTS

City of DETROIT, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Recovery for the loss of services of a wife and expense incurred by her personal injury on a defective sidewalk cannot be had against the city, under How. Stat., §§ 1446c-1446h, which authorizes a recovery only by a person "sustaining bodily injury," or the owner of a "horse . . . or vehicle, or other property" injured by defective highways or sidewalks.
2. The mere imposition of a public duty to keep highways in repair upon a municipal corporation does not create a private right of action for injuries sustained by an individual.

(September 25, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages caused to him by reason of injuries sustained by his wife in falling upon a defective sidewalk in defendant city. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. John J. Speed for appellant.

Mr. Thomas Hislop for appellee.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff recovered a judgment against the city of Detroit, based upon the loss of the service of his wife, who was injured by falling upon a defective sidewalk. Money paid for surgical attendance and nursing constituted a part of the damages recovered. The only question presented for our consideration is whether he had a right of action.

Municipal corporations, in Michigan, are liable for injuries resulting from their neglect to repair public highways only where made so by statute. That there is no common-law liability was decided in the case of Detroit v. Blackaby, 21 Mich. 84, 4 Am. Rep. 450, which was a cross-walk case. It was followed by McCutcheon v. Homer, 48 Mich. 483, 38 Am. Rep. 212. The earlier case contains an exhaustive discussion of the subject, holding that the duty of cities to repair highways is a public one, and that a right of private action does not lie for negligence in such cases. Subsequently a statutory liability was created, and it is under this that the plaintiff must recover, if at all. The statute consists of several sections, viz., 8 How Stat. §§ 1446c-1446h, inclusive. Section 1 (1446c) provides: "That any person or persons sustaining bodily injury upon any of the public highways or streets in this state, by reason of neglect to keep such public highways or streets, and all bridges, sidewalks, crosswalks, and culverts on the same in reasonable repair, and in condition reasonably safe and fit for travel by the township, village, city or corporation, whose corporate authority extends over such public highway, street, bridge, sidewalk, crosswalk, or culvert, and whose duty it is to keep the same in reasonable repair, such township, village, city, or corporation shall be liable to and shall pay to the person or persons so injured or disabled, just damages, to be recovered in an action of trespass on the case before any court of competent jurisdiction." So far as this section is concerned, it limits the liability to cases of bodily injury. The second section covers property interests. It is as follows: "If any horse or other animal, or any cart, carriage or vehicle, or other property, shall receive any injury or damage by reason of neglect by any township, village, city or corporation to keep in repair any public highway, street, bridge, sidewalk, crosswalk, or culvert, the township, village, city, or corporation whose duty it is to keep such public highway, street, bridge, sidewalk, crosswalk, or culvert in repair shall be liable to and shall pay the owner thereof just damages, which may be recovered in an action of trespass on the case before any court of common jurisdiction." The plaintiff's case does not fall within the first section (1) because he has no right to recover for the bodily injury—i. e. pain and suffering, etc.—of another; (2) because the statute in terms limits the recovery to the person so injured or disabled. Under another statute the right of action has been held to extend to administrators or persons injured. Racho v. Detroit, 90 Mich. 92. If his case is covered by the second section, it must be because he is injured in his property. It is asserted that he is so injured, inasmuch as he has lost the services of his wife, and had been obliged to spend money for her recovery. We think that this position is not tenable. Services (which may or may not be rendered) can hardly be called present property, as was held in Reed v. Belfast, 20 Me. 246, where a father was denied relief upon a claim of loss of services of a minor son who had been injured upon a defective highway. Moreover, while this statute uses the word "property," it is preceded by several words descriptive of particular kinds of property, and the provision is thereby limited to things of a like kind. In the language of Chief Justice Shaw: "Therefore, though the word 'property' is used, it follows words designating goods and chattels, and could not extend to mere rights." Harwood v. Lowell, 4 Cush. 810; Ohldey v. Canton, 17 Conn. 475. Counsel cites the following cases supporting this rule of construction: American Transp. Co. v. Moore, 5 Mich. 868, 886; McDade v. People, 29 Mich. 50; Board of Education v. Detroit, 80 Mich. 505; Brooks v. Cook, 44 Mich. 817; Wood v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 81 Mich. 358, 363.

Our attention is called to the case of Hunt v. Winfield, 86 Wis. 154, 17 Am. Rep. 482, as an authority sustaining the plaintiff's position, but the Wisconsin statute is broader than that of Michigan, providing that if any damage shall happen to any person, his team, etc., such person may recover. It may therefore be distinguished from the statute of this state.

NOTE.—As to the husband's right to recover in general for injuries to his wife, see Skoglund v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (Minn.) 11 L. R. A. 223, and note. The above case is peculiar in respect to the statutory provisions which are applied to defeat such right of action.

Counsel for the plaintiff make the further point that section 1446c makes it the duty of cities to keep their streets in reasonable repair, so that they may be reasonably safe and fit for travel, etc., and argues that, the duty being imposed, the liability must follow; citing the case of Nanticoke v. Warns, 106 Pa. 373, in support of the proposition. "Whatever the law may be in other states, Pennsylvania towns and boroughs are bound to keep roads and streets in repair, and are liable for injuries resulting solely from negligence in performing that duty. The liability is the consequence of a neglect of a statutory duty, and the right of a person does not depend on the construction of a statute providing who may recover, and for what, in case of injury from defect in the highway." That case seems to recognize the fact that some states hold otherwise, and as already seen, that is true of Michigan. See Detroit v. Blackeby, 21 Mich. 84, 4 Am. Rep. 450, which asserts the doctrine that the imposition of a public duty upon a municipal corporation does not create a private right of action for injuries sustained by an individual.

Again, the statute under discussion gives certain rights of recovery, but only against corporations whose duty it is to keep streets in repair. This appears from both sections 1446c and 1446d. The succeeding section prescribes the duty. As these sections must be construed together, and in the light of the previous decisions of the court, it cannot be held that the effect of this statute was to give a right of action to everybody because it imposed a public duty. If such was the legislative intent, the first two sections were superfluous.

No new trial will be granted.

Long, J., did not sit. The other Justices concurred.

John T. RICH, Relator,
v.

William CHAMBERLAIN.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A transfer of a convict from one place of imprisonment to another is not such a judicial act that it cannot be performed by the governor under authority of statute.
2. The constitutional power of the governor to grant a pardon or commutation of sentence is not infringed by a statute providing a board of pardons to investigate the facts on petition for a pardon and to report the results of their investigation with such recommendations as to them shall seem expedient.

NOTE.—As to encroachments on the power of the governor in respect to pardons and reprieves, see also Parker v. State (Ind.) 23 L. R. A. 850; People v. Monroe County Court of Sessions (N. Y.) 23 L. R. A. 856, and People v. Cummings (Mich.) 14 L. R. A. 285, and note.

where such recommendations have no binding force upon the governor.

(March 19, 1895.)

APPLICATION by the governor of the state for a writ of mandamus to compel the warden of the state prison to comply with relator's order to transfer a convict from the state prison to the house of correction. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred A. Maynard, Atty-Gen., for relator.

Messrs. Wilson & Cobb, for respondent:

Act number 150 of the Public Acts of 1893, providing for "the advisory board in the matter of pardons," is unconstitutional.

Section 2 of article 5 of the Constitution vests the pardoning power in the governor.

This provision necessarily imposes upon the governor the responsibility of examining personally all applications for pardons and acting upon his own judgment from a knowledge of the facts and circumstances.

People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 28; People v. Moore, 62 Mich. 498; People v. Cummings, 14 L. R. A. 285, 83 Mich. 251.

The statute does not require that the rules of the different prisons shall be uniform. Good time when earned is a vested right which can only be forfeited in pursuance of the rules under which earned.

Re Walsh, 87 Mich. 466; Re Canfield, 93 Mich. 644; State v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52.

The duty is imposed upon the courts of determining judicially to what prison a person convicted of a crime shall be sentenced. Such determination must be embodied in and become a part of the sentence.

This shows clearly that it was the intent and understanding of the legislature that the determination of the prison should form a constituent part of the sentence.

Section 1, article 6, of the Constitution vests the judicial power in the courts, which includes the determination of the punishment to be inflicted in criminal cases, within the statutory provisions, and the particular prison at which such punishment shall be inflicted.

People v. Cummings, supra.

It would not be within the power of the court to change the place of confinement, after the sentence is once imposed.

People v. Mesrobian, 76 Mich. 228; People v. Kelley, 79 Mich. 320.

The section is unconstitutional, as an attempt to confer upon the advisory board and the governor judicial powers.

Chandler v. Nash, 5 Mich. 409; Rowe v. Rowe, 28 Mich. 353; Re Buddington, 29 Mich. 473; Re Burger, 39 Mich. 208; Allor v. Wayne County Auditors, 43 Mich. 97.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Act 118 of the Public Acts of 1893 is an act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the laws relative to the three prisons known as the state prison at Jackson, the branch of the state prison at Marquette, and the house of correction at Ionia." A board of control was provided for each, consisting of three members, to be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, of which board the governor is ex officio a member. These boards were authorized to make general rules for the government of their respective prisons. Section 28 of this law authorizes the governor to order the transfer of prisoners from one to another of these prisons, upon the recommendation of the state board of pardons. Upon such recommendation the governor issued his order and warrant, as provided in the law under discussion, for the transfer and removal of one William K. Stevenson, a convict, from the state prison to the house of correction. The warden of the state prison refused compliance, and these proceedings were instituted by the governor to compel it.

The warden returns that his refusal was in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the board of control of the prison directing him not to obey the command of the governor, for reasons therein set forth. A copy of this resolution, signed by two of the appointed members, is attached to the answer of the warden. The authority for transferring prisoners is found in section 28, Act 118, Laws 1893.

It is contended that the transfer is a judicial act, and can only be performed by an officer clothed with judicial powers; that the determination of the circuit judge as to the prison in which the convict should be confined is a judicial determination; and that the prisoner has a right to remain in such prison for the period of his imprisonment; or, at all events, that he cannot be summarily removed without a hearing. It is said that the law discriminates between the prisons; that certain offenders cannot be sentenced to the state prison; and that the worst criminals cannot be sentenced to the house of correction, which is said to be designed for the less hardened class of criminals. The legislature has full authority to provide prisons, and to determine where prisoners may be sent; and the courts have no discretion as to the place to which criminals may be sentenced except as the legislature gives it. Such discretion is lodged with the circuit judges, and they act judicially in its exercise. But this doctrine is a qualified one, or rather the order of the judge is qualified by the law and such rules and regulations of the prisons as may have been lawfully adopted. Every sentence is subject to these, although it does not mention them. The law requires every person convicted of murder in the first degree to be sentenced to solitary confinement and hard labor for life. Yet, under the law and prison rules, such prisoners are taken from their solitary confinement after a short time, and are allowed to work with other convicts.

Again, all sentences direct that the prisoners be confined in the state prison; but, under the law, they may be hired to do work outside of the walls, in factories or mines or upon the highways, different states having different rules. The sentence is always imposed and received under and interpreted by the law to which it is subject. The judge and the prisoner act with the knowledge of this fact, and must be presumed to understand that, while the judge may or may not sentence a prisoner to one or another institution, there is an existing law under which he may be lawfully transferred. The sentence impliedly subjects him to this when, in the discretion of the proper executive officer or board, crowded prisons or any other reasons require or make it advisable. We need not determine whether this would be applicable to cases of sentence before the law providing for transfer took effect. The judicial act is fully performed by the sentence, which, though in form absolute, involves conditions imposed by law by which the prisoner's rights are limited and to which they are subject; and while the court may not, in terms, sentence certain classes of offenders to one or the other of the prisons, the sentence construed by the law is to the designated prison, but subject to transfer in accordance to law.

It was urged at the hearing that section 28 was defective, and did not make the necessary provision to protect the rights of convicts; that there is no requirement to transfer his personal effects from one prison to the other; and that no method is provided by which it can be determined whether or not he was entitled to what is called "good time" at the time of the transfer. Doubtless, these are the subjects of rules made by the boards of control, but, if not, the former is of little importance, while, as to the latter, the prisoner might be amply protected by a presumption of good behavior, unless the contrary should appear. The action of the governor, under this statute, must be based upon a recommendation of the advisory board of pardons, and, if such board has no legal existence, its recommendation would be of no validity, and could not be a substantial basis of action by the governor. This board was established in 1889, and a new act was passed in 1893, under which the present board exists. The board consists of four members, appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. The board may appoint a clerk, may hold sessions when and where occasion may require, send for persons and papers, and administer oaths. Its duties are to investigate the cases of convicts, confined in the various prisons, who may petition for pardons or for license to go at large, and to report to the governor the results of investigations, with such recommendations as, in the judgment of its members, shall seem expedient, either in respect to pardons or commutations, or refusal of pardon or commutation. The act provides, further, "that upon receiving the result of any such examination, together with the recommendations aforesaid, the governor may, at his discretion, upon such conditions with such restrictions, and under such limitations as he may deem proper, grant the desired pardon, or commutation." Const. art. 5, § 11, provides that "he [the governor] may grant reprieves, commutations and pardons after convictions, for all offenses except treason, and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions, and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper, subject to regulations provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons. He shall communicate to the legislature at each session, information of each case of reprieve, commutation or pardon granted, and the reasons therefor." This section of the constitution, in express terms, lodges the pardoning power with the governor, and with it the co-ordinate branches of government have nothing to do, except as the legislature may by law provide how applications may be made, and is entitled to a report of action taken. People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 28; People v. Moore, 62 Mich. 498; People v. Cummings, 88 Mich. 251, 14 L. R. A. 285; United States v. Wilson, 82 U. S. 7 Pet. 150, 8 L. ed. 640; Ex parte Wells, 59 U. S. 18 How. 307, 15 L. ed. 421; Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 383, 18 L. ed. 366. The power conferred by this section of the constitution is practically unrestricted, and the exercise of executive clemency is a matter of discretion, subject, perhaps, to the remedy by impeachment in case of flagrant abuse. It cannot, however, be treated as a privilege. It is as much an official duty as any other act. It is lodged in the governor, not for the benefit of the convict only, but for the welfare of the people, who may properly insist upon the performance of that duty by him, if a pardon is to be granted. "A pardon is an act of grace, proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. It is the private, though official, act of the executive magistrate, delivered to the individual for whose benefit it is intended." Opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Wilson, 82 U. S. 7 Pet. 150, 8 L. ed. 643. Lord Coke defines "pardon" as "a work of mercy, whereby the king, either before or after conviction, forgiveth any offense," etc. 3 Inst. 283. See also 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 898.

There are many reasons why a power of this kind should be confided to the highest executive officer. It involves a wide discretion. The proceedings upon the trial may be reviewed. New evidence may be taken upon which to rest the pardon, thus, in effect, granting a new trial. It may be ex parte, after the witnesses have disappeared or are dead. It may be and often is based upon an alleged reform of an offender. Youth or age may furnish an excuse for its exercise. Petitions which a good-natured public sign without reading, and importunities of interested persons and friends, may be expected wherever there is hope of success. It is therefore of the highest importance to the public that this power should be carefully exercised, and that the fullest responsibility should rest upon the person to whom it is confided. The office of governor seems to be generally considered the proper one with which to lodge such responsibility, and the public have the right to insist upon his performance of the duty. Not only is it beyond the power of the legislature to impose the duty upon others, but it should not in any way lessen his responsibility to the public, when he sets aside the judgment of court and jury by opening the doors of a prison to a convicted felon. If the act in question does this, it should not be sustained. The effect of it is to establish a sort of tribunal open to convicts, where the question of whether they should be pardoned or be licensed to go at large may be tried. The conclusion reached,—i. e. the result,—accompanied by a recommendation, must be certified to the governor, who then grants or refuses a pardon, as he may think advisable.

We understand that the practice of this board is to conduct its investigations with care and thoroughness, to require notice to be given to the authorities, to reduce proof to writing, and to return the same, with a report in detail, to the governor. This, however, seems to be under rules of its own devising, or prescribed by the governor, for the act requires nothing of the kind. This is unimportant, however, as it might be remedied by legislation. But the vital defect in the act is that it tends to substitute the judgment of the board for that of the governor. It can be truly said that the opinions of the board need not be controlling. But the tendency is naturally to offer an opportunity, if not an inducement, to an overburdened magistrate, to depend upon the judgment of a board in which he has confidence, and which has made a more careful investigation than he has made, and to act upon the recommendation of such board, while the public have a right to the fullest exercise of his own understanding and judgment, which they have signified by their constitution that they desire. This right should not be thwarted or placed in jeopardy by a law whose natural result may be expected to contravene the spirit of the constitutional provision. A loose exercise of the pardoning power is greatly to be deplored. It is inexcusable. It is a blow at good order, and is an additional hardship upon society, in its conflict with crime and criminals,—a conflict which is irrepressible, and in which the criminal has many, and possibly undue, advantages. The erection of a court of pardons is of such doubtful expediency, offering, as it does, an opportunity to the convict—practically within the doors of every prison—to press his suit for pardon, that it should never be permitted until the people have signified a willingness that the safeguards placed in their constitution be removed. The erection of a court of pardons is to invite unworthy applications. A practice grows up. It offers a premium to pardon-brokers, and the pardon, in place of remaining a matter of high executive discretion, based upon legitimate clemency, degenerates to a routine award of a committee, to be obtained and justified by compliance with fixed rules, and sought as an assertion of right rather than clemency. This section contemplates that the legislature may regulate the manner of applying for pardons, but this should not be construed to confer the power to limit the discretion of the governor to grant pardons or to require any other officer to first pass upon the question. All power is taken from the legislature except that of regulating the manner of applying to the executive. Act 150 does not profess or attempt to do this. Its title is silent upon the one and only subject in relation to pardons which the constitution permits the legislature to act upon. It nowhere provides how applications for pardons shall be applied for, or that such applications shall be uniform. It does not regulate applications for pardons. It provides for a board, which must act in cases where petitions are filed, and gives no authority to the board to act in the absence of petitions. It seems to regulate the board which the act creates, instead of regulating the manner of making application to the only officer authorized to grant pardons. Under the claim that it is prescribing a manner of applying for a pardon, it imposes a duty to investigate and report, and professes to authorize the governor to act upon such report and recommendation. If this means anything, it is that the governor might lawfully forego any investigation, and act upon the recommendation of the board, substituting their judgment for his own. The answer to this is that we cannot suppose that the governor will pay any attention to the recommendation, because the constitution imposes a duty upon him. The act does not regulate the method of applying for pardons. It does provide for a sort of investigation, which we are told that the legislature intended should be disregarded. In my opinion, this was not the legislative intent. On the contrary, it was expected that the governor would do just what the legislature undertook to provide that he might do, viz., act upon the report and recommendation without personal investigation. If there were no board of pardons, a governor would not be likely to feel at liberty to grant a pardon upon a mere application, without investigation. If he did, such a practice would not meet public approval, nor would it be a proper discharge of his duty. Yet the act in question provides that he may do that very thing, and, to sustain the act, the argument must be made that the legislature did not mean what the language expressly states, but intended that the report and recommendation should be wholly disregarded by the governor.

Our attention has not been called to a case involving the question that has been discussed. Our own investigation has disclosed that, by most state constitutions, the pardoning power is lodged with the governor, as it is with the president under the Federal Constitution. In several states the power of the governor is restricted, possibly to cut off any danger of an undue exercise of the power. In most of these, however, the consent of the governor is indispensable. It is, however, a significant fact, and one that bears forcibly upon this case, that we have found no instance where a board has been created by statute, but invariably by constitutional provisions. In Florida, pardons may be granted by the governor, justices of the supreme court, or a major part of them, provided that the governor be one. Fla. Const. art. 6, § 12. In Louisiana, the governor may act by and with the consent of the senate. La. Const. 1868, title 8. In Maine, after conviction, the governor may pardon, with the advice of a council of seven members chosen by the general assembly. Me. Const. art. 5, § 11. In Massachusetts, the governor and a council of nine chosen by the legislature may grant pardons. Mass. Const. art. 8, chap. 2, § 1. In Nevada, the governor, justices of the supreme court, and the attorney-general constitute the board. The governor must concur. Nev. Const. 1864, art. 5, § 14. In New Hampshire, the governor acts, with the advice of a council of five elected by the people. N. H. Const. art. 51. In New Jersey, the governor, chancellor, and six judges of the court of error constitute the board. The governor must act. N. J. Const. art. 5, § 10. In Pennsylvania, the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, and secretary of interior affairs constitute the board. Any three may act. Pa. Const. 1878, art. 4, § 9. In Vermont, the governor and a council consisting of lieutenant governor and 13 councilmen, to be elected by the people, exercise the pardoning power. Vt. Const. 1793. Michigan appears to be the only state that has attempted to regulate the matter of pardons by statute. As we have already said, the subject is expressly removed from legislative interference, and we think that the Law of 1898, providing for the advisory board, is clearly unconstitutional. Being so, said board could not lawfully make the recommendation which is a condition precedent to an order to transfer a prisoner. We think that the writ should be denied.

McGrath, Ch. J., concurred with Hooker, J.

Grant, J.: We concur in the opinion of Brother Hooker, except that portion wherein he holds the law providing for the board of pardons to be unconstitutional. We also agree with him in saying that "the pardoning power should be carefully exercised, and that the fullest responsibility should rest upon the person to whom it is confided." That power is vested exclusively in the governor of the state, and any law which restricted this power would be unconstitutional and void. While, however, the constitution unqualifiedly vests this power in the governor, it, at the same time and with equal clearness, vests in the legislature the power to provide, by law, regulations relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Article 5, § 11. Under this power, it would clearly be competent for the legislature to provide as regulations that the petition or application should be under oath; that it should be first submitted to the judge and prosecuting attorney, for them to indorse thereon or attach thereto such statements as they might deem proper to make touching the merits of the application, and designed to furnish the governor information upon which to base his action; that the testimony taken upon the trial, if it exists, should accompany the petition; and that testimony under oath should be taken at the prison or elsewhere bearing upon the reasons urged in the petition for pardon. Is there any doubt of the right of the governor under this constitutional provision, without any act of the legislature, to ask the opinion or advice of any of these officers, or to ask either to examine the facts, the conduct of the prisoner or any other material facts upon which conviction was based, and report to him, without any abandonment of his constitutional duty? How else can he obtain the necessary facts upon which to base intelligent action? In the absence of any law providing regulations, the governor possesses the undoubted right to require, as a condition precedent to the consideration of application, that it shall be accompanied by these statements. Certainly, a law which imposes no other regulations than those which he himself might impose is not unconstitutional.

The law in question does nothing more than to prescribe the regulations for obtaining the information which must be conceded to be necessary for an intelligent and proper exercise of the pardoning power. No governor ought to pardon without having before him the facts upon which the conviction was based, as well as the conduct of the prisoner after conviction. This law does nothing more than to prescribe the methods and regulations for obtaining this information which is so necessary for an intelligent and proper exercise of the pardoning power. The section of the act upon which is based the alleged unconstitutionality reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of said board to investigate the cases of such convicts now or hereafter confined in the state prisons and house or houses of correction as may petition for pardon, or for a license to be at large, and to report to the governor the results of their investigations, with such recommendations as shall in their judgment seem expedient either in respect to pardons, or commutations, or refusal of pardon or commutation. Upon receiving the result of any such examination, together with the recommendations aforesaid, the governor may at his discretion upon such conditions, with such restrictions and under such limitations as he may deem proper, grant the desired pardon or commutation, which warrant shall be obeyed and executed instead of the sentence originally awarded." Pub. Acts 1893, Act No. 150, § 6. It was not the purpose or intention of this act to infringe upon the constitutional prerogatives or power of the governor. The name given to the board in section 1—viz. "the advisory board in the matter of pardons"—clearly indicates this. In practice, as shown in Brother Hooker's opinion, the board assumes none of the power of the governor to pardon, but recognizes its sole duty to be to gather information; and for this purpose it conducts its investigation with care and thoroughness, requiring notice to the authorities and proofs to be taken and returned to him for his examination. The fact that such board is authorized to make recommendation is no infringement upon executive power. It might as well be held that the report and recommendation of the circuit court commissioner, to whom a case in equity has been referred, were an infringement ment upon the power of the court, upon which the constitution and the law have conferred exclusive jurisdiction. It has been a common practice heretofore for the trial judge, the prosecuting attorney, and the jury who tried the prisoner to recommend to the governor that he be or be not pardoned. It might as well be held that such recommendations were an unconstitutional interference with his power as to hold that the recommendations of this board were unconstitutional. The recommendations in the one case are of no greater significance than in the other. In neither case have they any binding force upon him, and the law neither provides nor intends that they shall have. We hold the law to be constitutional, and the power to transfer convicts from one prison to another valid.

A statute authorizing execution to issue against individual members of a limited partnership to the extent of the unpaid portions of their subscriptions, if execution against the association has been returned unsatisfied, does not violate the constitutional provision requiring due process of law, where it allows judicial investigation as to the amount remaining unpaid on such subscriptions.

APPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to vacate an order which had been granted, refusing to permit execution to go against the individual members of the Detroit Cycle Company upon a judgment which had been recovered against the company. Granted.

Statement by Grant, J.:

The relator, a foreign corporation, recovered judgment against the Detroit Cycle Company, a limited partnership association, for $1,705.50 and costs, being for goods sold. The cycle company was organized under chapter 79, How. Stat. Execution was issued,

NOTE.—While limited partnerships such as that involved in the above case have been created under the laws of a considerable number of states in which the above decision will be important, it would seem that additional importance attaches to the case by reason of statutes in some of the states authorizing execution against stockholders on judgments against a corporation. This remedy has not yet been much contested. It would seem that the same rule would apply in case of executions against stockholders that would apply to executions against members of a limited partnership on judgment against the company. As to the close relation of joint-stock companies to corporations, see People v. Coleman (N. Y.) 16 L. R. A. 153, and People v. Wemple (N. Y.) 6 L. R. A. 303.

and returned nulla bona. The plaintiff then moved the court for an order directing execution to issue against the individual members of the defendant to the extent of the portions of their subscriptions, respectively, in the capital of the company not paid up. The motion was based upon the files and records of the cause, and an affidavit thereunto attached, which set forth the judgment, the organization of the defendant, the issuance of execution and return, a copy of its articles of association, showing that the association consisted of three members; that the capital stock was $10,000, subscribed for in equal amounts by each of its members; that $1,000 was paid in by each at the time of the organization; that the balance of the capital, $7,000, was to be paid from time to time, as needed; that subsequently each member paid in $500, and that the balance of the capital had not been paid. The affidavit further alleged that the defendant had mortgaged all its property to one creditor, and that each member had executed a note to the defendant for the balance of his unpaid subscriptions, and had then turned these notes over to that creditor, with the agreement that they were not to be paid; that such action was in fraud of other creditors who were entitled to the amount of the unpaid capital to apply upon their debts. A copy of this notice and of the affidavit was duly served upon the defendant association, and each of its members. These members appeared specially at the hearing of the motion, and protested against its consideration by the court, because section 2366, How. Stat., which provides for the issuing of an execution against the individual members, is unconstitutional and void, in that it violates section 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and section 83 of article 6 of the Constitution of this state, both of which provide that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The judge sustained this contention, and denied the motion. Relator thereupon applied to this court for the writ of mandamus to compel the vacation of this order made by the respondent.

The section upon which the question arises reads as follows: "The members of any such partnership association shall not be liable under any judgment, decree, or order which shall be obtained against such association, or for any debt or engagement of such company, further or otherwise than is hereinafter provided, that is to say: If any execution or other process in the nature of execution, either at law or in equity, shall have been issued against the property or effects of the company, and if there cannot be found sufficient thereof whereon to levy or enforce such execution or other process, then such execution or other process may be issued against any of the members to the extent of the portions of their subscriptions respectively in the capital of the association not then paid up: provided always, that no such execution shall issue against any member except upon an order of court or of a judge of the court in which action, suit, or other proceeding shall have been brought or instituted; and 27 L. R. A.

the said court or judge may compel the production of the books of the association, showing the names of the members thereof, and the amount of capital remaining to be paid upon their respective subscriptions, and from them or other sources of information, ascertain the truth in regard thereto, and may order execution to issue accordingly; and the said association shall be and it is hereby required to keep a subscription list book for that purpose, and the same shall be open to inspection by the creditors and members of the association, at all reasonable times: provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to exempt the members of such partnership association from individual liability for all labor performed for the association."

Mr. Otto Kirchner, with Messrs. Bowen, Douglas & Whiting, for relator:

Unincorporated joint-stock companies existed in England, and although prohibited by a statute of George I. on account of the famous "bubble," they have been recognized as existing in this country at common law. Their existence in the state of Michigan has been recognized by several of the decisions of this court.

See Re Ticknor's Estate, 13 Mich. 44; Butterfield v. Beardsley, 28 Mich. 412; Allen v. Duffie, 43 Mich. 1, 38 Am. Rep. 159.

All the members are individually liable for the debts of the association, and real estate held by them is held as by ordinary partnerships.

But associations similar in all particulars to the one in question in this litigation first made their appearance in the state of Pennsylvania.

In Maloney v. Bruce, 94 Pa. 249; Bement v. Philadelphia Impact Brick Mach. Co. 12 Phila. 494; and Cox v. Watts, 157 Pa. 95,—judgment was first obtained against the defendant association, and then precisely in the manner in which relator is acting in this case, the lower court, after ascertaining the fact that there were unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the association, ordered executions to be issued directly against the members who hold the unpaid stock.

In Shible v. Strong, 128 Pa. 315, the court holds that "plaintiffs had a right to sue them as a limited partnership association in the mode pointed out by the act because they held themselves out as such association, and upon failure to recover their debt by execution against the association, they might have had execution against the non-paying members, if any there were, for the amount of their unpaid subscriptions.

It can make little difference how the court is moved, provided due notice is personally given the members of the defendant association.

Lauder v. Tillia, 117 Pa. 304.

The statute should not be declared unconstitutional unless the conflict between the constitution and the statute is palpable and free from reasonable doubt.

Green v. Graves, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 351; Scott v. Smart, 1 Mich. 295; Southworth v. Palmyra & J. R. Co. 2 Mich. 287; Seirs v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 251; Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 820; People v. Blodgett, 13 Mich. 127; People v. Maha- ney, 13 Mich. 481; Inkster v. Carver, 16 Mich. 484.

These defendants are not in position to raise the question of its unconstitutionality. They are absolutely estopped to do this.

Not only a corporation and its members, but also those who have had dealings with the corporation as such, are estopped in subsequent litigation between the members of the association and those persons who have thus dealt with it, to deny the legality of the formation of the corporation.

Swartwout v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 24 Mich. 389; Merchant's & Mfrs. Bank v. Stone, 88 Mich. 779; Hall Mfg. Co. of Grand Rapids v. American Railway Supply Co. 48 Mich. 331; Esty Mfg. Co. v. Runnels, 55 Mich. 130; Eaton v. Walker, 6 L. R. A. 102, 76 Mich. 679; Carson City Sav. Bank v. Carson City Elevator Co. 90 Mich. 550; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Miller, 91 Mich. 166; McCarthy v. Lavasche, 89 Ill. 270, 81 Am. Rep. 88; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill. 296; Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S. 675, 24 L. ed. 168; Fykin v. Springfield, 112 Mass. 509; Beal v. Bass, 86 Me. 325; Corpus Christi v. Central Wharf & Warehouse Co. (Tex.) Sept. 13, 1894.

Inasmuch as the respondent, holding the circuit court in chancery, had full power to pass upon the matter of relator's petition and award execution against the parties for the amount of their subscriptions remaining unpaid, it would seem to follow that it is competent, by statute, to confer upon him the same power when holding the circuit court at law.

The power thus conferred is equitable in its nature, and the partners are therefore not entitled to a trial by jury of the matter involved.

Flaherty v. McCormick, 113 Ill. 588; State v. Churchill, 48 Ark. 426; Mahan v. Cavender, 77 Ga. 118; Re Burrows, 88 Kan. 675; Bikenderry v. Edwards, 67 Iowa, 619, 56 Am. Rep. 360; McKinsey v. Squires, 83 W. Va. 41; Carleton v. Rugg, 5 L. R. A. 198, 149 Mass. 550.

The partners have waived any claim they might have had to a jury, by associating under the statute they must be deemed to have assented to and accepted all its provisions.

People v. Murray, 5 Hill, 468; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 215 et seq.

Messrs. Russel & Campbell, for respondent:

The statute provides for no notice to the persons against whom the execution is to issue. This is fatal to its constitutionality.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joint-stock companies, similar in character to those authorized by the statute of Michigan, were early organized in most of the states, and were recognized as lawful without legislative enactment. Their existence and methods were early modified and controlled by statute. An act, similar in character, was passed by the legislature of New York in 1849. Pennsylvania, in 1874, enacted the first law in this country for the organization of limited partnership associations. In 1877 the legislature of Michigan passed an act similar in all essentials to that of Pennsylvania. It is almost an exact reprint of it. The Pennsylvania act first required the capital stock to be paid in cash. It was afterwards amended so as to permit contributions to be made in real or personal estate. Virginia, New Jersey, and Ohio enacted the same law in 1875, 1880, and 1881, respectively. In Pennsylvania alone does the law appear to have come before the courts of last resort for construction. The supreme court of that state in many decisions has sustained its validity in its entirety, and has expressly passed upon the question now before us. Such decisions are entitled to great respect by the courts of sister states, and in most cases are held to be controlling when the law has been enacted after the construction placed upon it by the court of that state. The following are the leading cases in Pennsylvania sustaining the act: Maloney v. Bruce, 94 Pa. 249; Bement v. Philadelphia Impast Brick Mach. Co. 13 Phila. 494; Lauder v. Tillia, 117 Pa. 304; Lauder v. Logan, 128 Pa. 84; Cox v. Watts, 157 Pa. 98. All the decisions of that state were rendered after the passage of the act in Michigan, and therefore it cannot be said that the legislature adopted the construction which that court has given. The decision in the case now before the court must be reached with the well-recognized principle in view that "the power declaring laws unconstitutional should be exercised with extreme caution, and never where serious doubt exists as to the conflict. In case of doubt, every possible presumption, not clearly inconsistent with the language and the subject-matter, is to be made in favor of the constitutionality of the act." Sears v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 259, and authorities there cited. The due process of law required by the constitution means that notice or summons by which a party is tendered his day in court, with the right to frame an issue and be heard before a judgment can be rendered or execution issued which shall take away his liberty or property. This constitutional provision was "intended only to protect persons from being deprived of their property without their assent unless by due process of law." The same objection was raised to an entry of judgment upon an appeal bond against the sureties without notice to them. But it was held that the bonds should "be read in all respects as if the whole of the statute in reference to the appeal, the bond, and mode of entering up judgment upon it were recited at large in the bond." Chappee v. Thomas, 5 Mich. 58. So the summary seizure upon a warrant, without a suit, of the property of a defaulting township treasurer and his sureties was held not to have been made without due process of law. Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201. This was upon the ground that the warrant was an administrative, and not a judicial, process. An able and instructive discussion by Mr.

Justice Cooley on the meaning of due process of law will there be found.

It appears conceded that if, under this statute, the members of the association are entitled, as a matter of right, to their day in court in a proceeding where the issue of fact may be framed and determined, the notice given is due process of law. But it is insisted that the statute makes no provision for a trial, and it is left to the court's discretion to give one. This point was expressly decided in Lauder v. Tillia, supra, in which execution was issued against the members without notice to them. The court held that, when the property of the association was exhausted, the court should subrogate the creditor in its demands against its members for unpaid subscriptions; that the association was not in position to show cause for its debtors; and that the rule to show cause why execution should not issue should be served upon the members. That the creditors of such associations are entitled to the unpaid subscription is too clear for argument. The proceeding is analogous to that authorized by statute, whereby the judgment creditor may summon his judgment debtor or other persons before the court, after return of an execution nulla bona, to disclose property subject to an execution. The proceeding against the members in the original suit and in the court, in which judgment has already been rendered against them in their collective capacity, is ancillary to that suit and judgment. By their own voluntary act in organizing they have read the statute into their articles of association, and have solemnly agreed with their creditors that execution may issue against their unpaid subscriptions. The issue to be determined by the court is simple, viz., how much, if any, of their subscription is unpaid? The statute clearly contemplates and provides for an investigation by the court, for it is authorized to compel the production of the books, and to ascertain the truth from other sources of information. The court has jurisdiction and is clothed with all the machinery necessary to frame the issue and afford a trial with all the incidents of a judicial proceeding. What other course should be pursued? The creditors are certainly not without remedy, for this would result in the accomplishment of a gross fraud. Should they resort to a court of equity? No such course is provided by this statute, and all parties would still be in the same court, and before the same judge, and with the same issue. Is there any objection or lack of power in the legislature to authorize the court of law to determine the question? We can see none. We think it the obvious purpose of the statute to avoid an expensive proceeding in chancery, which might necessarily result in the appointment of a receiver. It must be presumed that the legislature understood that it was conferring this power upon a court already equipped with the necessary machinery to bring the parties before it and to adjudicate their rights. The learned counsel for the respondent cite and appear to rely mainly upon Parsons v. Russell, 11 Mich. 113, 89 Am. Dec. 728, and Risser v. Hoyt, 53 Mich. 185. It is unnecessary to review these decisions at length. We think the distinction between them and the case at bar is apparent. In Parsons v. Russell the boat and vessel law was held unconstitutional and void, because it provided that a vessel could be seized and sold upon the mere assertion of a debt, without any proof to substantiate the claim before a judicial tribunal, and without any judgment or decree allowing the sale. In Risser v. Hoyt, Act. No. 193 of 1883, to prevent debtors from giving preference to creditors, etc., was held unconstitutional for many reasons. It was held that the act provided for no judicial proceedings whatever, nor for any adjudication upon the allegations of the petitions filed. Three opinions were written, in but one of which was any reference made to the point that the act provided for the taking of property without due process of law. In the present case the members of the association, through the suit against it, have had their day in court to test the relator's claim, and judgment has been duly entered. The relator is entitled to a levy upon all the assets of the association and to a sale thereof in satisfaction of his judgment. The subscriptions of the members are a part of such assets, which they are legally and morally bound to contribute. The statute and their own solemn agreement have provided a simple method by which such assets can be reached. The proceedings taken by the relator were such as are contemplated by the statute, and constitute due process of law.

The other Justices concurred.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of MT. CARMEL, Appt.,
v.

(.....Ill.....)

1. A city may do anything with its streets not incompatible with the end for which streets are established, under the powers given by the Illinois general incorporation act to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave, or otherwise improve its streets and sidewalks, and vacate the same.

2. Under the power given by the Illinois statutes to a city to vacate streets, it may vacate a strip upon each side of the street

NOTE.—For rights of abutting owners in respect to trees on streets, see Chase v. Oshkosh (Wis.) 15 L. R. A. 553, and note; Tate v. Greensboro (N. C.) 27 L. R. A.

so as to narrow it, where the purpose of narrowing is not for the benefit of private owners, but because it is deemed that so great a width of street is not required for public use and convenience.

3. An ordinance vacating a strip upon each side of a street for the purpose of narrowing it is not invalidated by a provision that such strip is donated and given to the abutting lot owners, where the strip was laid out upon the original plat of the city by dedication from the land owners, as upon the vacation of such strip the title of the abutting owners to such strips become absolute by operation of law, and such provision is mere surplusage.
4. A street line fixed by a valid ordinance vacating a strip along both sides of the street as originally laid out applies to and is coincident with the outside line of such street as mentioned in a subsequent ordinance providing for and locating a sidewalk with reference to such line.
5. Shade trees in the public streets of a city in Illinois are the property of the municipality, and it has complete control over them.
6. A city council in Illinois has authority to order a sidewalk six feet wide to be built along the line of a street 95 feet wide, adjoining the lots of abutting owners.
7. The location of a sidewalk upon a street is, under the Illinois statute, within the discretion of the city authorities, and cannot be interfered with by the courts.
8. A court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere by injunction with the action of municipal authorities within their well-recognized powers, or in the exercise of a discretionary power, unless the power or discretion is manifestly being abused to the oppression of the citizen.
9. Municipal authorities will not be enjoined from cutting down shade trees two feet in thickness standing within the line of a sidewalk ordered to be constructed, where they would constitute permanent obstructions if left standing.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Appellate Court, Fourth District, modifying and affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wabash County which granted an injunction restraining defendant from cutting trees in the street in front of complainant's property. Reversed.

Statement by Baker, J.:

The appellees are the owners and in possession of lot 329, situated on the north side of Sixth street in the city of Mt. Carmel, Illinois, near the center in width of which lot is located their dwelling house, in which they have resided for about thirty years. On each side of the front of their house, in the street, are two large maple trees, about 40 feet high and 2 feet in diameter. They were planted about the year 1857, and the nearest is situated 6 feet from the south line of the lot and north line of the street as the city was originally platted. The sidewalks here before constructed were always placed between said lot and trees. The uniform width of the streets of the city was 99 feet.

In July, 1891, the city council passed an ordinance in relation to lawns and sidewalks, and narrowing or cutting down the width of streets, and donating certain portions of ground to the property holders. The first six sections of said ordinance were as follows:

"Sec. 1. That there shall be set aside for sidewalk and other purposes hereinafter mentioned 18 feet on both sides of all the streets in said city that were originally laid out and are now 99 feet wide, except Market street.

"Sec. 2. That the city surveyor, under the supervision of the street committee, shall survey and lay off said 18 feet along both sides of said streets, and shall designate the outside line of said 18 feet.

"Sec. 3. That in making such survey no street or any part thereof shall be less than sixty-three (63) feet in width, measuring from outside to outside line of said 18 feet.

"Sec. 4. That a strip 2 feet wide next to the property, lands, lot or lots abutting on said streets shall be and is hereby vacated, donated and given to, and shall be a part of said lands, lot or lots.

"Sec. 5. That 6 feet of the remaining 16 feet, next to the property, lands, lot or lots on both sides of said streets shall be set apart upon which to build sidewalks, and the remainder of said 16 feet, namely, 10 feet more or less, on both sides of said streets shall be set apart for lawn purposes.

"Sec. 6. That the city shall retain and have full control of said 16 feet, along both sides of said streets set apart for sidewalk and lawn purposes, and shall have the right to grade said 11 feet on both sides of said streets set apart for sidewalk and lawn purposes, so as to make said 10 feet correspond with the established grade of said city."

On July 25, 1892, the city council passed an ordinance for the construction of a brick sidewalk 6 feet in width on the north side of Sixth street. Said ordinance provided that "said sidewalk shall be made and constructed along the outside line of said street and adjoining the property, lands, lot or lots abutting on said street."

The city, in constructing the sidewalk under said last-mentioned ordinance, recognized the outside line of Sixth street as the one established by the ordinance of July, 1891, whereby 2 feet of each side of the street was vacated and donated to the adjoining lot owners, thereby extending the sidewalk into the street so far as to include the larger part of the bodies of the above mentioned trees; and these trees the city officials proposed to cut down and move out of the way of said improvement.

Thereupon appellees filed their bill in chancery, and prayed for and obtained a writ of injunction. Upon a hearing in the circuit court the injunction was made perpetual. Upon appeal to the appellate court, the injunction was so modified as that it should remain in force only so long as there is no public necessity for a sidewalk along lot 329 in excess of the width of 6 feet. The decree, as thus modified, was affirmed.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the general incorporation act under which the city of Mt. Carmel is organized, it has power to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave, or otherwise improve its streets and sidewalks, and vacate the same. It may do anything with its streets which is not incompatible with the end for which streets are established. Roberts v. Chicago, 28 Ill. 249; Murphy v. Chicago, 29 Ill. 279, 81 Am. Dec. 807. And where the municipal authorities are acting within their well-recognized powers, or are exercising a discretionary power, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere, unless the power or discretion is being manifestly abused to the oppression of the citizen. Brush v. Carbondale, 79 Ill. 74.

The rights of the parties to this controversy seem to depend largely upon the question whether the city, under its power to vacate streets, has power to vacate only a portion of a street. Under the familiar rule, that the whole of a thing includes all of its parts, it would seem that it has. In Hyde Park v. Dunham, 85 Ill. 569, this court, speaking of the village there a party, said: "The corporate authorities are vested with complete control, as is every other municipal corporation, over its streets. They may contract or widen them, whenever, in their opinion, the public good shall so require. Property owners purchase and hold subject to these powers, and they have no vested right to deny the widening, contracting, or otherwise improving any street." From the decisions in Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 103 Ill. 879, 40 Am. Rep. 598, and People v. Hyde Park, 117 Ill. 462, there is a plain implication that a municipal corporation may vacate a part of a street as distinguished from the vacation of an entire street. In Meyer v. Teutopolis, 181 Ill. 552, an ordinance of the village vacating a certain portion of a street in that village was held valid. In Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L. R. A. 293, the ordinance was not held invalid on the ground that only a portion of the street was vacated. It was a part of the particular case, that the ordinance assumed to vacate not the whole but a portion only of the street there involved, but the gist of the decision was that the corporate authorities had no power to so vacate for the sole benefit and use of a private person. The vacation of an entire street, under like circumstances, would be alike ultra vires. The rule there laid down would be applicable to the case of the whole of a street, as well as to that of a portion of it. We said: "The municipal corporation holding and controlling its streets in trust for the use of the general public, without power of converting them to any other use, it follows, necessarily, that the right to 'vacate the same' is to be exercised only when the municipal authorities, in the exercise of their discretion, determine the street is no longer required for the public use or convenience." No reason is perceived why a city council might not under some circumstances, and in the exercise of a sound official discretion, conclude that a portion of a street, either in length or in width, was not necessary for public use and convenience; and that public interests would be subserved by vacating the same, and thus freeing the municipality from the duty and burden of keeping it in good and safe condition and repair.

This case is wholly different from Smith v. McDowell, supra. It conclusively appears upon the face of the ordinance, as well as from the other evidence in the record, that the vacation of parts of the public streets was for entirely legitimate purposes, and in furtherance of what the city council, in the exercise of the discretion vested in them by the statute, deemed a wise and salutary public policy.

The streets were all 99 feet wide, and it was evidently concluded that so great a width of street was not required for public use and convenience, except in respect to Market street, the business street of the city. And, so, the ordinance was passed, and the cost of paving and maintaining a useless width of public highway lifted from the shoulders of the municipality and its taxpayers.

It is claimed that section 4 of the ordinance is void; that the city authorities had no power to sell, donate, or give away parts of the public streets that they held in part.

It is ordained in the ordinance "that a strip two feet wide next to the property, lands, lot or lots, abutting on said streets, shall be and is hereby vacated." It is admitted that the original plat of the city and streets was signed by the attorney in fact of the proprietors of the land, and that this makes it a common-law dedication of the streets. Gosselin v. Chicago, 103 Ill. 623; Earl v. Chicago, 186 Ill. 277; Thomsen v. McCormick, 186 Ill. 185. It therefore resulted, when the strips two feet wide were vacated by the city, that they became parts of the lots adjoining them, and the lot lines were extended 2 feet. And it also resulted that by operation of law the titles of the owners of the abutting lots to the portions of the strips located in front of their respective lots became absolute, and freed from the incumbrance of the easements that had been upon them.

It follows that the concluding words of the section, to the effect that the strip taken from the streets was donated and given to the lot or lots, were but mere surplusage.

The Ordinance of 1891 was and is valid. And when the city council, by the Ordinance of July 25, 1892, made provision for the construction of a brick sidewalk 6 feet in width on the north side of Sixth street and that it should be made and constructed along the outside line of said street and adjoining the lot or lots abutting on said street, the line so fixed by the ordinance applied to and was coincident with the lot line and street line as fixed by the prior Ordinance of 1891.

Shade trees in the public streets of a city are the property of the municipality; and it has complete control over them. Baker v. Normal, 81 Ill. 108.

There was nothing unlawful in the conduct of the city officials. The council had authority to order a brick sidewalk 6 feet wide to be built along the line of the street and adjoining the lot of appellees. It is to be presumed that there was a public necessity for its construction. At all events, that was a matter that the statute submitted to their discretion. The two large trees were in the line of the sidewalk ordered, and the larger part of their bodies were within the limits upon which the sidewalk was located by the ordinance. The sidewalk could not be constructed in conformity with the ordinance, without cutting them down and removing them. If left standing, they would be permanent obstructions. We do not think that the proposed action in the premises of the city officials can justly be regarded as wanton, or as so unreasonable and oppressive as to give a court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere. Brush v. Carbondale, 78 Ill. 74. In fact it seems to us that it would be more unreasonable to destroy the symmetry and impair the convenience and safety of the sidewalk, by either leaving obstructions in it that are 2 feet in diameter, or by turning it out, on the south side of the trees, 6 or 7 feet into the roadway of the street, or by contracting it, on the north side of the trees, to the width of 4 feet—than it would be to cut down the trees that do not belong to appellees, but afford shade to their premises.

In our opinion, both the decree of the circuit court, and that decree as modified by the appellate court, are erroneous; as is also the judgment of affirmance.

The judgment and the decrees are reversed; and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to dissolve the injunction, and dismiss the bill of complaint for want of equity, at the cost of the complainants therein.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

GOODLANDER MILL CO., Piff. in Err.,
v.
STANDARD OIL CO.

1. Crude petroleum is not so dangerous that a shipper is bound to so protect and guard it that harm therefrom shall come to no one, but his duty is performed by providing a suitable vehicle able to encounter the usual risks of transportation.
2. Negligence in omitting to have a proper valve in the outlet of a tank car is not the proximate cause which will render the shipper liable for the destruction of a mill a few feet from the railroad track at the point of destination, which results from the act of the consignee's agents in opening the outlet of the tank upon which they were unable to prevent the oil from flowing down into the furnace room of the mill and catching fire.
3. The proximate cause of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequences unbroken by any efficient intervening cause produces the injury and without which the result would not have occurred.

(May 31, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Illinois to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of certain property which was destroyed by fire through defendant's alleged negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Jenkins, Circuit Judge:

In November, 1887, the defendant shipped in a tank car from Lima, Ohio, to the Ft. Scott Gas Company, at Ft. Scott, Kan., some 6,000 gallons of crude petroleum, deliverable to that company at East St. Louis.

NOTE.—For a somewhat similar case involving the question of negligence toward employes in failing to provide a stopcock in a pipe connecting an oil tank with a burner, see Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Laack (Ill.) 18 L. R. A. 215.

For a case of negligence in shipping naphtha, see Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 677. 37 L. R. A.

The tank car had a discharge pipe in the bottom and about the center of the tank, some four inches in diameter, and projecting about six inches below the bottom. The projection was threaded to receive a heavy cap screw. Within the tank the discharge pipe is fitted with a heavy valve to prevent the escape of oil. The valve rests upon a shoulder in the upper part of the discharge pipe. Below the shoulder there are four concaves made in the valve, to permit the flow of oil upon raising the valve. An inflexible iron rod is attached to the valve, extending through the dome on the top of the tank, and projecting a foot or more above it. Within the tank at the top there is a coiled wire spring, arranged to hold the rod down, and keep the valve in position, closing the outlet. To discharge the contents of the car through the lower discharge pipe, the cap is unscrewed and the pipe coupling attached. The valve, by means of the rod, is then lifted, and the oil permitted to flow through the outlet into the pipe, and conducted to the reservoir provided for its reception. The tank car arrived at Ft. Scott on the 17th of November, and was received by the consignee on the next day. The gas company caused the car to be removed from the yard of the railroad company, where it was delivered, and to be placed upon the switch track of another company located in a street a half mile away, between the property of the gas company and the steam flour mill of the plaintiff in error. This was done for the purpose of piping the petroleum contained in the tank into the reservoir of the gas company, located beyond the mill, and upon the further side of an intercepting street. The railroad track upon which the tank car stood was three feet distant from the furnace room of the mill, the latter being three feet below the level of the railroad track at that point. The car was placed directly opposite the window of the furnace room of the mill. On the afternoon of the 18th of November, and before or at the time of the removal of the car on that day it was observed by the engineer of the switch engine that the tank was leaking, the oil dripping at the outlet under the car, and forming a pool upon the ground. On the morning of the 19th of November, two servants of the gas company undertook to discharge the oil into the reservoir of the gas company, through a pipe laid from the reservoir to the tank car. One of them examined the rod at the top of the car, and reported to the other that it was pushed down, indicating the valve to be in proper position. The other went under the car with a wrench to remove the cap, and attach the pipe leading to the reservoir. He observed that the cap was loose, and removed it with his hand; and it is stated in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error—without reference to the record for verification of the statement—that this man observed, as he went under the car for the purpose of removing the cap and attaching the coupling, that the oil was leaking some, but that he did not deem the fact of moment, supposing that the valve was in its proper position, and would prevent the discharge of the petroleum until it was raised. Upon removing the cap, the oil flowed out before the coupling could be attached; and despite the efforts made to prevent, and before the car could be removed from its position, the oil flowed down the descent, through an open window, into the boiler room, and also upon some hot ashes located at the rear of the engine room and boiler house, and some eight feet distant from the car, and caught fire, whereby the mill and its contents were destroyed, and property of the value of about $107,000 consumed. After the fire and upon examination of the tank, it was discovered that it contained no valve; that it had been removed, but how or when is not disclosed by the evidence, but presumably before the tank car was filled with the oil for shipment. The evidence established that crude petroleum oil will give off a vapor or gas which will flash at a temperature of 90°, igniting by contact with fire, and explosive in its ignition; that it is in common use for fuel purposes; and that it is about as volatile as turpentine. The action against the Standard Oil Company by the mill owner is predicated upon negligence in omitting to have a proper valve in the outlet of the tank. At the trial of the cause, and upon the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the court directed the jury to find a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Bunn, District Judge.

Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do, or doing something which a prudent or reasonable man would not do.

Defendant is bound to use the most recently invented and approved appliances to prevent injury to the public in the transaction of its business, and it is liable to any member of the public for damages sustained by such member by reason of any neglect of that duty; and the law considers injurious such acts as a reasonable careful man would foresee might be productive of injury and which he would abstain from doing.

Messrs. W. G. Ewing and Virgil P. Kline for defendant in error.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Without doubt, whether a given act or omission is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for a jury. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256. This, however, is subject to the well-settled rule that the court should withdraw a case from the jury, and direct a verdict, when the undisputed evidence is so conclusive that the court should set aside a verdict in opposition thereto. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Chicago, 128 U. S. 727, 733, 81 L. ed. 287, 288; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 473, 35 L. ed. 213, 215; Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 150 U. S. 245, 87 L. ed. 1068; Union Pac. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434. The ruling directing a verdict upon the evidence presented by the plaintiff sanctions a review of that evidence here, to enable us to determine whether, as matter of law, upon the testimony adduced, a verdict for the plaintiff could have been sustained. American Paper-Bag Co. v. Van Nortwick, 9 U. S. App. 25, 8 O. C. A. 274, 52 Fed. Rep. 752.

We are confronted, therefore, with certain questions, always interesting and often perplexing, touching the law of negligence,—whether, upon the facts stated, the defendant stood in breach of duty to the plaintiff, and whether the omission to provide a valve for the discharge pipe of the tank was the proximate cause of the destruction of the plaintiff's mill.

It is not every one who suffers loss from another's negligence that may recover therefor. Negligence, to be actionable, must occur in breach of a legal duty, arising out of contract or otherwise, owing to the person sustaining the loss. Kahl v. Love, 37 N. J. L. 5; National Sav. Bank of District of Columbia v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621. Mr. Wharton defines "legal duty" to be "that which the law requires to be done or forborne to a determinate person, or to the public at large and as correlative to a right vested in such determinate person or in the public." Whart. Neg. § 24. There was here no contractual relation between the parties. Any duty arising out of the contract was due to the gas company, not to the plaintiff. If, by reason of the shipment of the petroleum, a legal duty arose in favor of the plaintiff, it was a duty distinct and apart from the contract,—a duty implied by law. The duty, then, upon which the plaintiff must rely, was a duty owing by the defendant to the public. The law imposes the obligation that one should so use one's property that injury should not result therefrom to another. This duty, however, is not absolute; but one is responsible for negligent use, for failure to do or forbear that which the law requires to be done or forborne in respect of the use. If the failure to provide a valve was in breach of a duty owing to the public, it must be because the character of the shipment was such and so dangerous that the defendant owed the duty to all who might in any way be brought in contact with it, to so protect and guard it that harm therefrom should come to no one. One who uses a dangerous agency does so at his peril, and must respond to the injuries thereby occasioned, not caused by extraordinary natural occurrences, or by the interposition of strangers. Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 279, affirmed Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 8 H. L. 330. The books are replete with cases falling within and illustrating this principle. Thus, in Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, an apothecary carelessly labeled a poison as a harmless medicine, and sent it so labeled into the market. He was held liable to all who, without fault on their part, and in consequence of the false label, were injured by its use. Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298; Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 53 Am. Rep. 715; Davis v. Guarneri, 45 Ohio St. 470,—are like cases.

The rule is limited, however, and justly so, to instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury, such as are essentially and in their elements instruments of danger; to acts that are ordinarily dangerous to life or property. Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351, 357, 1 Am. Rep. 548. 27 L. R. A.

And so, where the wrongful act is not immediately dangerous to the life or property of others, the negligent party is liable only to the party with whom he contracted. Collis v. Selden, L. R. 8 C. P. 496, cited with approval in National Sav. Bank of District of Columbia v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 204, 25 L. ed. 621, 624. Thus, in Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen, 514, the defendant, a wholesale druggist, negligently delivered to a customer sulphide of antimony for black oxide of manganese. The purchaser, a retail druggist, delivered the package unopened to the plaintiff, both supposing the substance to be black oxide of manganese. In that belief the plaintiff proceeded to use the same in combination with chloride of potassium,—a substance with which the oxide may be safely and properly used, but from the combination of which with sulphide of antimony a dangerous explosion follows. The plaintiff was injured by the resulting explosion, and brought suit. The court held the defendant not liable, and, after declaring that there existed no privity of contract between the parties, says:

"We think it equally clear that the plaintiff shows no cause of action ex delicto against the defendant. The insuperable difficulty is that the averments in the declaration do not disclose any duty or obligation which rested on the defendants towards the plaintiff in the sale of the article to the person from whom the plaintiff purchased. As has been already stated, it was an innocuous substance, which became dangerous only when used in composition with another chemical agent. It was not sold by them with any knowledge or understanding of the purpose for which it was intended to use it, nor did they know that it was to be resold to the plaintiff. There being no duty imposed on the defendants towards the plaintiff arising out of any contract, this action is to be maintained, if at all, by showing a breach of some duty or obligation imposed on them by law. They have been guilty of no actionable carelessness or negligence, unless it can be shown that they were bound to use some care or caution upon which the plaintiff has right to rely. Failing to show this, or to aver a state of facts from which the law would imply it, the gist of this action, which is founded on alleged negligence and want of due care, is wholly wanting. We know of no rule or principle of law by which a vendor of an article can be held liable for mistakes in the nature or quality of an article arising from his carelessness and negligence, which causes loss or injury to other persons than his immediate vendee, where there has been no fraudulent or false representation in the sale, and the article sold was in itself harmless; especially where the sale is made without any notice to the vendor that the article was bought for a third person, or that it was intended to be used in combination with other substances which may make it dangerous or injurious to person or property. In such case a vendor assumes no responsibility, and incurs no liability beyond that which results from his contract with his vendee. With remote vendees of the article, who purchase it by subsales from those to whom it was originally sold, he enters into no contract, either express or implied, and takes on himself no obligation or duty whatever. Nor has he done any wrongful or illegal act towards third persons for the consequences of which he is liable. The general principle applicable to this class of cases is that a vendor takes upon himself no duty or obligation other than that which results from his contract. For breach of this, he is liable only to those with whom he contracted. All others are strangers. The law fastens on him no general or public duty arising out of his contract for the breach of which he can be held liable to those not in privity with him."

And so in Loose v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638, the manufacturer of a steam boiler constructed it improperly and of poor iron, knowing that it was to be used in the vicinity of and adjacent to dwelling houses and stores; so that, in case of an explosion while in use, there would be likely to be destruction to human life and adjacent property. After delivery and acceptance by the purchaser, and while in use by him, an explosion occurred, in consequence of such defective construction, to the injury of a third person. It was held that the latter had no cause of action against the manufacturer.

In Bailey v. Northwestern Ohio Natural Gas Co., 4 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 471, the defendant, under contract with another, put in fixtures for using natural gas for heating a steam boiler connected with an engine in the electric plant of that other. By reason of negligence and imperfect construction of the fixtures, an explosion ensued, and the engineer in charge of the boiler and engine was injured, and brought suit. It was held that there was no contract relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the defendant owed him no duty. It was there conceded that gas, under certain circumstances, might be a dangerous article; that it was explosive when allowed to escape so as to come in contact with flame. It was not in and of itself dangerous. And the defendant was acquitted, although the imperfect fixtures were placed by it for the purpose of being used in connection with the use of gas as fuel. See also, Blakemore v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 8 El. & Bl. 1035; Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 787; Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 12 L. R. A. 746; Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 12 L. R. A. 322.

There is a class of cases of which Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 506, and Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311, are examples, holding the builder of a scaffolding to be used by workmen, and negligently constructed, rendering it unsafe, liable for an injury occurring from its use. These cases recognize the rule that the liability of the builder is in general only to the person with whom he contracted, but rest liability to third persons upon the ground that the defect was such that it rendered the article in itself immediately dangerous, and that serious injury was the natural and probable consequence of its use. Of the same character is the case of Necker v. Harvey, 49 37 L. R. A.

Mich. 517, holding the constructor of an elevator, while in possession of and operating it, liable to a stranger for injuries arising from its negligent and unsafe construction; otherwise, if possession had been surrendered.

We are thus brought to the question whether crude petroleum may properly be classified as a "dangerous agency," within the meaning of the rule. It is an extensive article of commerce, transported by rail to all parts of the land, shipped in steamers and sail vessels to all parts of the world. It is innocuous of itself. It is dangerous only when in considerable quantity it is brought in contact with fire. It is in general use for fuel and other purposes. It is no more volatile than turpentine, no more explosive than gas; does not necessarily, in its handling, involve imminent danger to any one. It is not a dangerous agency of itself, but becomes such by subjection to a high degree of heat, or from actual contact with fire. The shipment of such an article of commerce casts upon the shipper a certain duty to the public,—that of providing a suitable vehicle for the petroleum in all respects adapted to the purposes of carriage, and able to encounter the usual risks of transportation, so that the petroleum in its transit should not be exposed to danger of ignition from causes incident to its transportation, reasonably to be anticipated. We think that to be the true limit of the shipper's duty, and that duty, as it appears to us in this case, was properly discharged. The petroleum was contained in a tank impervious to fire. The shipment reached its destination in safety. The case is not like that of the shipment of explosives, the character of the shipments being concealed. Brass v. Mailland, 6 El. & Bl. 470; Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. N. S. 553; The Nitro-Glycerine Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 524, 21 L. ed. 206. Here the contents of the tank were declared by the peculiar construction of the car. The properties of the petroleum were known to the consignee and to the public equally with the defendant. They are matter of common knowledge. There was here no disguise and no concealment.

It may be said that it was the duty of the shipper so to equip the car that its contents might be safely discharged in ordinary methods and by the exercise of due care. This we may concede. It was a duty, however, growing out of the contract, and owing to the consignee; and, for failure therein, the shipper would be liable to the consignee for the damages naturally and proximately flowing from such failure. That duty, however, was not owing to the plaintiff, the material shipped not being in and of itself essentially dangerous.

The proximate cause of an injury is that cause which, in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the result would not have occurred.

In Etna Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 130, 24 L. ed. 395, 398, the court says: "The proximate cause is the efficient cause,—the one that necessarily sets the other causes in operation. The causes that are merely incidental, or instruments of a superior or controlling agency, are not the proximate causes and the responsible ones."

The remote cause is that cause which some independent force merely took advantage of to accomplish something not the probable or natural effect thereof. The absence of the valve was doubtless, in a sense, a cause of the injury,—an antecedent cause; but, where the negligent act is not wanton or malum in se, the law stops at the immediate, and does not reach back to the antecedent, cause. The causal connection between the negligence and the hurt is interrupted by the interposition of an independent human agency; and, as Mr. Wharton expresses the thought, "the intervener acts as a nonconductor, and insulates the negligence." The test is: Was the intervening efficient cause a new and independent force, acting in and of itself in causing the injury and superseding the original wrong complained of, so as to make it remote in the chain of causation, although it may have remotely contributed to the injury as an occasion or condition? Here the gas company gave the negligent act a mischievous direction. If but for such interposition the defendant's negligence would have produced no injury, the causal connection is broken, because the intervening act made the act of negligence, otherwise innocuous, operative to injury. The injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act, and such as ought to have been foreseen in the light of attending circumstances. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256. There the court says: "The question always is, Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury,—a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury?"

The negligent omission of the valve did not necessarily set the other causes in operation. It was, in the language of the Boon Case, above referred to, the incidental cause, or the instrument of a superior and controlling agency, and was therefore not the proximate and responsible one. If the owner of a magazine in which gunpowder is stored should carelessly leave open its door, and a responsible human being should enter with a lighted candle, knowing of the presence of the gunpowder, and an explosion should ensue, could it be affirmed that in any legal sense the careless act of leaving open the door was the cause of the explosion? So here the gas company had received this oil into its possession. It was entirely harmless in and of itself. The natural and probable consequence of the negligent act of omission charged upon the defendant was the leakage and loss of the oil. The omission of the valve did not render it dangerous. If not interfered with, the omission of the valve had no tendency whatever to produce the injury complained of. The petroleum was subject to ignition, and its ignition at the time and place produced the injury.

That was caused by subjecting it to contact with heat and fire. That was done by the gas company, which had possession and control of the oil, and acted independently, and not under the direction of the defendant. The company was chargeable with knowledge of the properties of petroleum, and had actual knowledge, through its servants, that the oil was leaking from the discharge pipe, and this prior to the removal of the car from the yards of the carrier. With this knowledge, the company placed the car within three feet of the engine and boilers of a mill located below the grade of the railway, and with knowledge of the leakage, sufficient, in view of the dangerous proximity of fire, to place a careful person upon diligent inquiry, undertook to discharge the oil in close proximity to hot ashes, and near an open window of the boiler room. We cannot say that the negligent omission of the valve "necessarily set the other causes in operation;" nor can we say that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act. In marshaling the probable consequences which ordinary sagacity should have foreseen as probably resulting from the omission of the valve, it would, as we conceive, appear unlikely and abnormal that this injury should result. We are of opinion that the intervening and independent act of the gas company was the efficient cause, self-operating, by which the negligent act of the defendant was rendered effective to an injury that was not the probable and natural consequence of the act. Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653; Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567, 96 Am. Dec. 683; Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co. 189 U. S. 238, 85 L. ed. 154.

The cases to which we are referred are not in conflict with the principles asserted, and are quite distinguishable in the facts from the case at bar. In Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Keighron, 74 Pa. 316, the negligent act of the company's servant caused a collision which set fire to the cars of a train, which fire directly communicated to and destroyed plaintiff's house, situated within 20 feet of the track. There the negligent act was immediately dangerous, and there was no intervening cause between the negligence and the injury.

In Lynn Gas & Electric Co. v. Meriden F. Ins. Co., 158 Mass. 570, 20 L. R. A. 297, a fire occurred in the wire tower of the plaintiff's building, through which the wires for electric lighting were carried from the building. The fire was extinguished without contact with other parts of the building, and with slight damage to the tower or its contents. By reason of the fire, a connection was made between the lightning arresters, causing a short circuit; and the short circuit resulted in an extra strain upon the belt through the action of electricity, thereby causing, in a part of the building remote from the fire and untouched thereby, a disruption of the fly wheel of the engine and other damage. It was held, and justly so, that there was unbroken connection between the fire and the injury, and without the intervention of a new cause acting from an independent source.

We are of opinion that if, upon the facts presented, a jury had rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, it would have been the duty of the court to have set aside the verdict, and that, therefore, the court below rightly directed a verdict for the defendant, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

Charles W. SCOTT

v.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 9, IN WILLIAMSTOWN.

(.....Vt.....)

1. An allegation of unavoidable accident, or of default or neglect of duty by an officer, is necessary under Rev. Laws 1880, § 973, to avoid a plea of the statute of limitations by reason of the failure of a prior writ, whether that is regarded as an abatement or otherwise.
2. Usage cannot excuse a failure of the warning of a school district meeting to specify the business or question to be considered, as required by Rev. Laws 1880, § 621.
3. The person who is the prudential committee of a school district empowered to hire and remove teachers, has no right himself to act as teacher.
4. A school district is liable to pay for services of a teacher who, though duly licensed to teach, had no valid contract where he taught without objection, and properly kept and returned the school register by reason of which the district drew public money according to the attendance at his school.

(December 8, 1894.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Washington County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover for services as teacher of defendant's school and for repairs made upon the schoolhouse which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Reversed.

A demurrer to a replication to the plea of the statute of limitations was overruled and exceptions duly reserved under a stipulation that the case might proceed without prejudice. Plaintiff resided in the school district and was appointed prudential committee by the selectmen of the town. In September, 1885, a meeting of the district was held under the following warning: "The legal voters of school district No. 9 in the town of Williamstown are hereby notified to meet at schoolhouse in said district on the 18th day of September, 1884, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, to consider and act on the following propositions: (1) to choose a moderator to govern said meeting; (2) to see if the district will vote to sustain a school or schools in said district, and to fix the time for the commencement of the terms thereof, and the length of such terms; (3) to see if the district will vote a tax upon the grand list to defray the expense of such school or schools, or take other measures therefor; (4) to transact any proper and necessary business." At that meeting the district voted to sustain a school for eight months beginning September 2 and to provide for the instruction of those who might wish to attend school in the winter in adjoining districts. Plaintiff as prudential committee not being able to satisfactorily provide for the instruction of the scholars in the adjoining district, decided to teach the school himself. The district drew the public money upon the attendance of the scholars during the term. Plaintiff made some repairs upon the schoolhouse and provided some fuel for which he charged $2.50.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Edward W. Bisbee, for defendant:

The replication must show all that is necessary in order to bring the case within the provision of the statute relied on, if the plaintiff would have the benefit of that provision.

Poland v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 47 Vt. 77.

Presumptions which arise from pleadings are to be those most unfavorable to the party pleading.

Stephens, Pl. p. 333; Phelps v. Wood, 9 Vt. 398; Spear v. Curtis, 40 Vt. 59; Hayes v. Stewart, 23 Vt. 622.

To bring a case within the equity of the statute, the replication must show a case in which affirmative equity requires the operation of the statute; and must preclude the idea that the exigency for such extension resulted in any part from the fault of the party asking for it.

Poland v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 47 Vt. 73;

Babcock v. Brown, 25 Vt. 550, 60 Am. Dec. 290; Davison v. Heffron, 31 Vt. 687.

The plaintiff was elected prudential committee, and as such it was his duty to protect and guard the interests of the district. This he could not do by setting himself up as teacher, because his own financial interests thereby became adverse to those he was required by law to protect.

Judevins v. Hardwick, 49 Vt. 180; Davenport v. Johnson, 49 Vt. 403.

Messrs. W. A. & O. B. Boyce for plaintiff.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The replication to the statute of limitations is demurred to. The replication seeks to bring the case within the statute (Rev. Laws 1880, § 973), that if, in an action commenced within the time limited, the writ fails of a sufficient service or return by unavoidable accident, or by default or neglect of the officer to whom it is committed, or is abated, the plaintiff may commence a new action for the same cause within a year; and it alleges, in effect, that this plaintiff seasonably commenced a former action for the same cause, and that the writ therein was served on the defendant only fifteen days before the return day, and that, for that reason, the defendant being a corporation, and therefore entitled to at least thirty days' notice, the county court dismissed the action on motion, to which the plaintiff excepted, but, as he did not file his exceptions in time, the judgment became final, and that this action was commenced within one year thereafter. The replication is not good as constituting an answer to the plea on the ground of a failure of sufficient service of the writ in the former action, for it does not allege that such failure was by unavoidable accident, nor by default or neglect of the officer to whom the writ was committed, as was necessary to bring the case within the statute. Nor is the replication good as constituting an answer to the plea on the ground of abatement of the former action, for the abatement was caused solely by reason of the failure of service, and it would be illogical to give the abatement greater effect as an answer to the plea than is given to the thing that alone caused the abatement, such thing itself being, when occasioned as mentioned in the statute, substantive ground for allowing another action to be brought.

NOTE.—As to contracts by officers in a double capacity, see note to Tiptecanoe County v. Mitchell (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 520.

The offer to show that for eight or nine years the district had used this same form of warning in respect to having scholars instructed out of the district was properly excluded. The statute (Rev. Laws 1880, § 521), required that warnings for school district meetings should specify the business to be transacted or question to be considered at such meetings. This warning contained nothing upon the subject of having scholars instructed out of the district, and usage could not supply the defect. The powers of the district being wholly statutory, they could not be enlarged nor diminished by proof of usage. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 356. Abuses of power and violations of rights derive no sanction from time nor usage. Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 103. The vote to have the scholars instructed out of the district being void, the plaintiff, as prudential committee, was at liberty to "appoint and agree with a teacher to instruct" a school in the district; and the question is whether he could himself instruct the school, and recover for it on the quantum meruit. As said in Brown v. School Dist. No. 9 in Clarendon, 55 Vt. 43, there are cases in this state that seem to indicate that agents and officers of corporations have authority to pledge the credit of the corporation to one another; but, after a review of some of the cases the true rule is there said to be that a committee may do by one of its members what it has a right to do by all, and that, for all things furnished or done by one or all, recovery can be had on the quantum meruit or valebant, and that it is not understood to have been decided by this court that a committee with authority only to contract have power to enter into agreements with themselves. The 27 L. R. A.

case of Langdon v. Castleton, 80 Vt. 285, not referred to in Brown v. School Dist. No. 9 in Clarendon, comes nearer to holding that than any other, perhaps. There the plaintiff was agent of the defendant town to prosecute and defend suits in which the town was interested, and, being himself a lawyer, he prosecuted a suit in that capacity; and it was held that he could recover for his services and disbursements therein. The question is not discussed in the opinion, the court merely saying that it saw no reason why the plaintiff was not legally entitled to be paid, and that such had been the general understanding and practice in such cases. But the statute concerning the powers of such agents is different from the statute concerning the powers of prudential committees of school districts in respect of hiring teachers. Such agents are chosen, to use the language of the statute, "to prosecute and defend suits in which the town is interested." This language does not in terms nor in effect, we think, restrict the authority of the agent to contracting for legal services, but leaves him at liberty to perform them himself, if competent. It has always been quite the practice for towns to elect lawyers as such agents, because they could act in the double capacity of agent and lawyer, and thereby make it cheaper and better for the town. But the statute (Rev. Laws 1880, § 515), concerning the authority of prudential committees of school districts was much more restrictive. Its language was, "shall appoint and agree with a teacher to instruct the school, and remove him when necessary." This confined their authority to appointing and agreeing; and, as their official power in this regard was fiduciary, the case would seem to fall logically within the principle that it is against public policy to allow one standing in such a relation to contract with himself concerning the subject of his trust; and, when we consider that it was the duty of such committees to remove a teacher when necessary, the case all the more clearly falls within that principle, for it is fundamental that a man shall not be a judge in his own case, and that doctrine is not alone applicable to strictly judicial officers, but to every one who acts in a judicial capacity, as a prudential committee did when he sat to determine whether it was necessary to remove a teacher or not. The law of this subject is so well settled and so familiar that we deem the citation of authority unnecessary, but those desirous of looking into the books will find an instructive case in Pickett v. Wiota School Dist. No. 1, 25 Wis. 551, 8 Am. Rep. 105. That case goes much further than this court has gone, and would prohibit recovery in many cases where we permit it; but the ground and reason of the law is there well stated. We hold, therefore, that the plaintiff had no authority to teach the school himself.

The parents in the district sent their children to school without objection, and the plaintiff kept the school register properly, and duly returned it to the town clerk's office, and the district drew public money according to the attendance that term; and the question arises whether by reason of these things, or of any and which of them, the district became liable to the plaintiff for his services. If it did, it was upon the ground of assent and ratification. It is said that when work done for a corporation without complete legal authorization is for a corporate purpose, and beneficial to it, and the price reasonable, strong evidence of the assent of the corporation is not required, but that such assent must be shown, and that ratification, whatever its form, must be by the principal or by authorized agents. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 464, 465. The work in question comes within this proposition, in that it was done without such authorization, was for a corporate purpose, and, presumably, beneficial to the corporation, and we think it further comes within it in that it was assented to and ratified by an authorized agent. By reason of the plaintiff's services in teaching the school and properly keeping and seasonably returning the school register, the district became and was entitled to a proportionate share of the public moneys, which share the district received in due course; and it was presumably, as the statute provided it should be, paid over to the treasurer of the district, who was, by statute, fully authorized to accept and receive it, which made his act in this behalf, in legal effect, the act of the district. And so the question is, Had the district, by authorized corporate action, accepted and received this money, would it thereby have made itself liable to the plaintiff for his services? We think it would have, on the ground that if one accepts, or knowingly avails himself of, the benefit of services performed for him without his authority, and the fruits of which he can reject, he shall be held to pay therefor a reasonable compensation,—a principle as applicable to a corporation when the services are performed in and about a corporate business as to an individual. One cannot, in such a case accept in part and reject in part. If he accepts in part, he thereby ratifies and confirms the whole.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

Margaret H. COLGROVE et al., Respts.,
v.

Fred. J. SMITH et al., Appts.

(102 Cal. 220.)

Persons having a franchise to lay water pipes in streets cannot relieve themselves from responsibility for negligence in failing to cover the pipes properly by letting the work to independent contractors and requiring the latter by express stipulation to perform its duty.

(March 30, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The case was first heard in department and Commissioner Haynes handed down an opinion containing the following portions, which did not appear in the opinion of the court in banc, which was afterwards handed down in response to a petition for rehearing:

It is very different from the erection of a building, or the doing of other work upon private property, which does not constitute a nuisance, and which causes no danger to the public unless negligently performed. The owner, in such case, is under no contract relation to the public. He owes a duty, however,—that of care to prevent accidents; but when he selects a competent workman, and intrusts the whole work to him, he discharges that duty. But if I am under a duty to another, created by contract or by statute, it is obvious that I cannot relieve myself of any of its obligations by contracting with another to do the same work; or, if a work which I may lawfully do creates a danger to others, I cannot escape liability by contracting with another to do it; for by contracting with another I authorize him to create the danger. But where the work is unattended with danger, except from negligence, a contract to do the work excludes negligence, and the contractor is liable. Attention is not called by counsel to any case in this court where the question here presented appears to have been considered, but authorities elsewhere are abundant, and quite generally uniform in support of the views above expressed. In Gray v. Pullen, 5 Best & S. 270, A. was empowered, under the metropolis local management act (18 & 19 Vict.), to make a drain from his premises to a sewer by cutting a trench across a highway, and filling it up after the drain should be completed. For this purpose he employed a contractor, by whose negligence it was filled up improperly, in consequence of which damage ensued to B. Held, that A. was responsible in an action by B. In Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321, 326, Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "A man who orders a work to be executed, from which, in the natural course of things, injurious consequences to his neighbor must be expected to arise, unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, is bound to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief, and cannot relieve himself of his responsibility by employing some one else to do what is necessary to prevent the act he has ordered to be done from becoming wrongful. There is an obvious difference between committing work to a contractor to be executed, from which, if properly done, no injurious consequences can arise, and handing over to him work to be done, from which mischievous consequences will arise unless preventive measures are adopted." In Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470, the defendant, having employed a coal merchant to put coals into his cellar, was held liable for injury suffered by the plaintiff from his falling through the cellar opening, which had been left open by the negligence of the coal merchant's servants. In this case, after referring to the general rule placing the liability upon an independent contractor, the court said: "That rule, is, however, inapplicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do, nor, by a parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is intrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfillment, whereby an injury is occasioned."

Appellants contend that in this state municipal corporations are not liable for injuries resulting from imperfections in the streets, and upon this ground attempt to distinguish this case from a large number of cases where the city was primarily liable, and also from other cases where the person or corporation which had obtained permission to do the work had agreed with the city to be answerable for all damages that might be sustained. Whether or not the city of Pomona was liable for the injury to respondent is immaterial. The contractors, O'Neill and Osler, were undoubtedly liable, and if so, appellants would have been liable, had they done the work themselves; and the question here is whether they did or could relieve themselves from responsibility by letting the work to independent contractors. Nor does the fact that there was not an express contract between appellants and the city to answer all damages at all affect the question, since the implied obligation arising from the franchise and the character of the work imposed upon them a liability for injuries caused by their negligence, in every respect as conclusive as an express contract. Chicago v. Robbins, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298; Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 657, 18 L. ed. 427, and St. Paul Water Co. v. Ware, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 566, 21 L. ed. 485, all sustain the view we have taken. Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. 149 Mass. 335, 4 L. R. A. 218, and Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123, on appellants' brief, are directly against them. The first of these cases was that of a street-railway corporation which employed a contractor to lay a new track in a city street, and through whose negligence it not properly guarding the work the injury happened. The railway company was held liable. The court said: "If the performance of a lawful contract necessarily will bring wrongful consequences to pass, unless guarded against, and if, as in the present case, the contract cannot be performed except under the right of the employer, who retains the right of access to the premises, the law may require the employer, at his peril, to see that due care is used to prevent harm, whatever the nature of his contract with those whom he employs." In the American cases above referred to will be found cases cited from many of the states sustaining the same doctrine. Appellants, however, seem to rely principally upon the case of Atlanta & F. R. Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, and Fulton County Street R. Co. v. McConnell, 87 Ga. 756. In the first of these cases the court recognizes and enumerates the exceptions to respondent superior, but concludes that the facts do not bring it within any of the exceptions. The correctness of its conclusion in that case may well be doubted, though whether correct or not need not be considered here, since the case at bar comes clearly within the second exception to the general rule there stated, and to which the learned justice cites Bowser v. Peato, and Pickard v. Smith, supra. The broad distinction between that case and the case at bar is apparent, since the trenches could not be dug in the streets of Pomona without danger to those having occasion to use the streets, while a railroad embankment could be constructed without danger of creating a nuisance by impounding water which by stagnation produced malaria, and thereby became a nuisance. The second case, Fulton County Street R. Co. v. McConnell, supports appellant's contention, but the court clearly came to a wrong conclusion. But three cases are cited in support of the conclusions reached by the court. One of these, Overton v. Freeman, 11 C. B. 867, was a "common pleas" decision made in 1852, and which is in direct conflict with Gray v. Pullen, 5 Best & S. 970 (decided in 1864, in exchequer chamber, on appeal from queen's bench); and upon the appeal Overton v. Freeman was not only cited in the argument, but quoted from, and, though it is not referred to in the opinion, it was clearly overruled. Another of the cases there cited is Hackett v. Western U. Tele. Co. 80 Wis. 187. There the defendant contracted with a railroad company to erect for it a line of telegraph. A hole was left unguarded overnight, into which a child fell, and was injured. A clear distinction between that case and the one at bar is stated by the court as follows: "The railroad company was not required, by its contract, to dig any hole in a traveled public street;" while here the work was required to be done in a public street in a city, and the negligence was in doing improperly that which the contract required to be done, and not in some matter collateral to, and not required to be done in the performance of, the contract. The other case referred to in the case of Fulton County Street R. Co. v. McConnell is that of Atlanta & F. R. Co. v. Kimberly, above noticed.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Vancielief, C.; Temple, C.

The independent contractors who performed the work in this case are alone liable, and the doctrine of respondent superior does not apply.

Messrs. A. W. Hutton, P. C. Tonner, and J. W. Swanwick, for respondents:

Appellants had no right to use the streets of the city of Pomona for the purpose of laying water-pipes therein except upon compliance with the provisions of the constitution in regard to such use, and as they have failed to show that they complied with those provisions, they were mere trespassers upon the street, and liable for any injury resulting from their negligence, without regard to the question of independent contractor.

Wood, Mast. & S. § 316, p. 624; Stone v. Cheshire R. Corp. 19 N. H. 427, 51 Am. Dec. 192.

This case falls within the well-established exceptions to the independent contractor rule.

Per Curiam:

Action for personal injuries. Appeal by defendants from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial. Appellants, as copartners doing business under the name of the Citizens' Water Company of Pomona, obtained from the city of Pomona, by ordinance, a grant or franchise to dig trenches and lay pipes in the streets of the city for the purpose of selling to and supplying its inhabitants with water. Afterwards, on June 1, 1889, appellants contracted with M. O'Neill and Frank Osler to dig and fill the trenches for the pipe at a specified price per 100 feet, a part to be 2 feet wide, and part 20 inches wide, and all 30 inches deep. The contract contained the following clause: "Said ditches to be filled as required by city ordinance. All road crossings to be properly tamped and kept in repair for sixty days after completion of the work. Parties digging ditch to be responsible for all damages resulting by reason of injury to, or breaking of, any pipes owned by other persons." The ordinance required the grantee (appellants) or its assigns, immediately after laying the pipes, to restore the streets to their former condition, and have the same in as good repair as before; the work to be done under the direction, and to the satisfaction, of the superintendent of streets. Plaintiff Margaret A. Colgrove (wife of her coplaintiff), on June 15, 1889, was driving along Garey avenue, where defendants' pipe had been laid, and the trench improperly filled with loose dirt, in which her buggy wheels sank, whereby she was thrown out and injured. There were no guards along the line of the trench, nor any notice of its unsafe condition. Several exceptions were taken to evidence, and to the refusal of the court to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendants; but all these exceptions present a single question, arising upon the issue raised by defendant's answer, to the effect that O'Neill and Osler were independent contractors, in the exclusive control of the work of filling up the ditch, and for whose negligence defendants claim they are not liable.

It is commonly stated—and, in a large class of cases, correctly—that the principle of respondet superior does not apply where the negligent or wrongful act is that of an independent contractor, or of his servant or employé, unless the superior has been guilty of negligence in contracting with an unfit person. For a full discussion of the general doctrine above stated, see Roswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 845. But there are exceptions to the general doctrine, and this case, we think, is one of them. The board of trustees of the city was charged by the law with the care and maintenance of the streets in a safe and proper condition for the use of the public. Appellants could not lawfully dig trenches and lay water pipes without express authority from the city. If they had undertaken to do so, and had contracted with another to do the work, they would not, by such contract, have relieved themselves from liability to the city for the trespass, nor to individuals who might have sustained special injury. Nor does the fact that they obtained from the city a franchise or permission to dig up the street and lay their pipes relieve them from more than the unlawful character of the work. They stand in a contract relation to the public, represented by the city authorities, to do the work in the manner required by the ordinance, and cannot relieve themselves of the duty imposed by that contract by contracting with another to do the work. These trenches could not be dug in the street without danger to the public. If done without authority, a nuisance would necessarily be created; and, if not done in the manner required by the ordinance, the departure creates a nuisance.

I. The power generally.

The right to pass laws imposing hard labor as a part of the punishment for criminal acts is almost universally upheld and seldom questioned, except under constitutional provisions with which particular enactments on that subject have sometimes been supposed to conflict.

This is particularly the case in England, in which nearly if not all of the punishments provided for expressly include hard labor or penal servitude, and it has not been found that the question of the power to do so has ever been raised, though the cases in which such punishment has been inflicted have uniformly treated the statutes providing therefor as valid. The absence of judicial determination on the subject is probably due to the fact that England has no constitutional restrictions upon legislation similar to those under which the question has arisen in the American states.

In this country several of the states, distinctively California, North Carolina, and Vermont, have made provision by constitutional enactment for punishment by hard labor.

And the states acquire an ownership of the services of convicts sentenced to imprisonment for crime through the operation of constitutional provisions prohibiting involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime. Comer v. Bankhead, 70 Ala. 493.

This provision is found in the Federal Constitution, and in the constitutions of a large majority of the states.

2. The city council of the city of Topeka has the power by ordinance to require the keepers of boarding houses, restaurants, and hotels to furnish the street commissioner the names of persons liable to poll tax boarding or lodging in their houses, and to impose a fine for refusal to do so.

3. A judgment duly rendered by the police court of a city cannot be held void because of a defense of which the prisoner did not avail himself.

4. Ordinance No. 91 of the city of Topeka, approved May 12, 1870, permitting prison-

But in Holland v. State, 23 Fla. 123, it was held that authorizing the employment at hard labor upon public works of all persons imprisoned in the jails under sentence upon convictions of crime or for failure to pay fines and costs, is purely a legislative act which violates no constitutional provision.

And the whole subject was said to be within the power of the legislature, subject only to the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments, in State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429; People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11; Mason & Foard Co. v. Main Jellico Mountain Coal Co. 87 Ky. 463.

Nor is a statute authorizing county commissioners to employ at hard labor upon public works all persons imprisoned in the jails under sentence upon conviction of crime or imprisonment for failure to pay fine and costs rendered unconstitutional, or made the exercise of a judicial function, by the fact that it does not contemplate that its terms shall be pronounced as a part of or incorporated in the record of the sentence of the court, or that they were not so pronounced or incorporated. Holland v. State, 23 Fla. 123.

The power to impose such punishment is also inferentially upheld in numerous cases turning upon other questions, but in which punishment by the imposition of labor was incidentally involved. To set forth all such cases would involve the incorporation into this note of a large portion of the criminal law of many of the states, therefore a few only are given by way of example.

Thus in United States v. Cobb, 43 Fed. Rep. 570, it was held that an offense punishable by imprisonment not exceeding one year without hard labor is not an infamous offense which must be prosecuted by presentment or indictment.

And in People v. Hawkins, 10 Misc. 65, affirmed by the general term in 85 Hun, 43, N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 698, requiring goods made by convict labor in another state to be branded, labeled, or marked as convict-made when exposed for sale in New York, was held to violate the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

And in Bronk v. Riley, 60 Hun. 439, N. Y. Laws 1888, chap. 586, prohibiting the use of certain machinery for manufacturing purposes in any of the penal institutions of the state and the employment of the convicts therein at certain labor, was held to apply only to the state prisons and prisons and reformatories constructed by the state and not to a penitentiary erected by a county which was managed by a local board, and the moneys of which are subject to the control of the board of supervisors, though prisoners from other counties might be confined in it under contract with the state.

So in State v. Martindale, 47 Kan. 147, and State v. Kirk, Id. 151, it was held that a law providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for employes of the state, does not apply to the officers, guards, and employes in the penitentiary, for the ers committed to the city prison for the violation of a by-law or ordinance of the city, necessary for the preservation of order and the welfare of society, to be employed by the city marshal at labor, either on the streets or public work of the city, or in a public or private place, being credited $1 a day on the judgment for each day's work performed, is not in conflict with section 6 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the state, or article 18 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude.

5. The marshal and policeman of a city, and any persons aiding and abetting them, are liable in damages for unnecessary cruelties and indignities inflicted by them on prisoners in their charge.

(Allen, J., dissents from proposition 4.)

reason that convicts therein are required by law to labor ten hours per day.

And in State v. Charles, 14 La. Ann. 659, a slave was held to have the right to appeal from a judgment in a criminal case sentencing him to corporal punishment but acquitting him of any capital offense on a prosecution for having struck a white man so as to cause the shedding of blood, under La. Const., art. 62, granting the right of appeal in all criminal cases punishable with death or imprisonment at hard labor.

And in Smith v. State, 8 Lea, 744, the county court was held to have no power in the absence of express legislative authority to adopt rules and regulations giving the superintendent of the guards authority upon his own determination of the facts to inflict corporal punishment upon county convicts sentenced to hard labor in the county workhouse.

And in Porter v. Waters-Allen Foundry & Mach. Co. (Tenn.) Feb. 2, 1895, it was held that an employé who voluntarily engages in labor with convicts in his master's employ does not thereby release him from liability for injuries sustained by reason of the master's failure to use the required caution in employing, controlling, and retaining the convicts.

II. Constitutional restrictions.

The constitutional prohibition against involuntary servitude was designed to prevent the re-establishment of slavery once prevailing in some of the states in any form, and does not apply to the punishment of offenders against the law by the imposition of labor. Monroe v. Meier, 35 La. Ann. 1193.

And a misdemeanor is a crime which may be punished by imprisonment at hard labor within the meaning of this provision. Re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383.

Thus, requiring the father of a bastard child committed to the county jail in default of payment of the fine and costs adjudged against him to work upon the public roads does not contravene the constitutional provision of the United States and of North Carolina, prohibiting involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime, as under N. C. Code, § 35, the begetting of a bastard child is a misdemeanor. Myers v. Stafford, 114 N. C. 234.

And statutes authorizing punishment for misdemeanors by imprisonment at hard labor do not violate constitutional provisions that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Durham v. State, 39 Tenn. 723.

So imprisonment at hard labor is not of itself a cruel or unusual punishment within constitutional provisions prohibiting it. State v. White, 44 Kan. 514.

Nor is labor on the public streets a cruel or unusual punishment, or contrary to the policy of the law. Ex parte Bedell, 20 Mo. App. 125.

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for false imprisonment. *Reversed.

Statement by Allen, J.:

D. W. Boutwell brought suit in the district court of Shawnee county against the city of Topeka, D. C. Metaker, its mayor, John F. Carter, Joseph Reed, Pat. Wilson, J. W. Gardiner, Henry Bernard, John Ewing, and Ben. Williams, charging them with assault and battery, false imprisonment, and other wrongs and indignities connected with such imprisonment, for which he demanded damages. A demurrer on the part of the city of Topeka to the petition was sustained. Demurrers of the other defendants were overruled. Metaker, by his answer, denied general punishment, or contrary to the policy of the law. Ex parte Bedell, 20 Mo. App. 125.

The prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments applies only to those of a barbarous character unknown to the common law. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429; People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11.

Thus imprisonment at hard labor for an offense of minor importance is not a cruel or unusual punishment within constitutional prohibitions merely because it is much more severe than the punishment imposed for similar offenses of much greater magnitude. State v. White, supra.

And Kan. Laws 1887, chap. 150, § 1 (Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 2152, § 31), making illicit intercourse with a female under eighteen years of age a felony for which any male person may be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor for a period not less than five nor more than twenty-one years, does not conflict with section 9 of the Bill of Rights prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments. Ibid.

Nor is one hundred dollars fine or the alternative of five months' work excessive punishment for an act of fornication by a young woman whose position, pecuniary or physical, is not shown to be special or peculiar. Hunt v. State, 31 Ga. 140.

And a sentence to imprisonment at hard labor for two years for obtaining $3 by means of a fraudulent device imposed under a statute making two years the minimum and fixing no maximum penalty is not cruel or unusual within the constitutional prohibition. State v. Williams, 13 Mo. App. 415, affirmed 77 Mo. 310.

Nor is a fine of $50 and imprisonment at hard labor in a house of correction for three months for maintaining without a license a tenement for the illegal keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors an excessive, cruel, or unusual punishment. Pervear v. Massachusetts, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 475, 15 L. ed. 603.

The prohibition of the Federal Constitution against cruel and unusual punishments does not apply to state legislation but to national only. Ibid.

So a statute authorizing the imprisonment of the defendant in a criminal action in the county jail, or at the discretion of the court at hard labor for the county for failing to pay or confess judgment for the costs, does not contravene a constitutional provision prohibiting imprisonment for debt, as in criminal cases the costs are not a debt. Morgan v. State, 47 Ala. 34.

And imprisonment for the costs incurred by the state under sentence to hard labor for their satisfaction does not violate the constitutional prohibition, though the officers and witnesses have recourse for their fees against the fine and forfeiture fund of the county only. Bailey v. State, 37 Ala. 44.

And in Nelson v. State, 46 Ala. 124, it was said erally the allegations of the petition. Carter alleged that he was the duly appointed and acting marshal of the city of Topeka; that on the 14th of September, 1887, the plaintiff was tried before one Joseph Reed, police judge of said city, upon a charge of unlawfully refusing to give, upon request, to the street commissioner of said city, the names of certain persons, liable to pay a poll tax, then lodging in a certain boarding house, of which said plaintiff was the keeper; that the plaintiff was found guilty of said charge, and sentenced to pay a fine of $25, and committed to the city prison until such fine should be paid; that the plaintiff was also tried, on the same day, before said police judge, upon a charge of resisting an officer in the discharge of his duty, found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of $75, and committed to the city prison for the nonpayment thereof; that it became his duty, as marshal, to confine and safely keep the plaintiff until he should comply with said judgments; that, the plaintiff being an able-bodied man, the defendant as marshal did, by virtue of Ordinance No. 91 of said city, command the plaintiff to work at breaking rock on the rock pile, which the plaintiff refused to do; that in his treatment of the plaintiff he used no more force than was necessary to execute the judgment of the court, and perform his duties as the custodian of such prisoner. The defendant Wilson alleges that he was a policeman of the city; that a warrant was duly issued by the police judge and placed in his hands, commanding him to arrest the plaintiff on a charge of unlawfully refusing to furnish the street commissioner the names that a sentence to hard labor until the costs of the prosecution are paid at a designated rate per day is not equivalent to a sentence of imprisonment until the costs are paid, and does not violate the constitutional prohibition.

To hold a convict for any contractual liability for advances made by his surety, however, whether in money or in property, would be imprisonment for debt within the meaning of the Constitution. Smith v. State, 22 Ala. 40.

Nor is a statute authorizing the letting and hiring of labor of convicts to be performed at designated coal mines an ex post facto law as to convicts previously sentenced when they were required to be kept at hard labor at the prison previous to the enactment thereof. Mason & Foard Co. v. Main Jellico Mountain Coal Co. 87 Ky. 467.

But in Ex parte Hunt, 23 Tex. App. 361, it was held that a law reducing the rate per day allowed a county convict as credit on his fine and costs when working it out by manual labor does not apply to a judgment rendered prior to its enactment, as it would require the infliction of a greater punishment and therefore it would be ex post facto.

So the letting of the labor of convicts to a corporation under legislative authority in consideration of their being fed, clothed, and provided for by the hirer is not a donation or gratuity within the meaning of the Georgia constitutional provision requiring the concurrence of two thirds of each branch of the general assembly to the grant of a donation or gratuity. Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 66 Ga. 499, 38 Am. Rep. 793.

The constitutional prohibition against fixing the price of manual labor by law refers exclusively to contract labor and does not apply to a sentence imposing a fine for an offense and requiring the offender in default of payment to labor at a designated rate per day until the same is paid. Monroe v. Meuer, 35 La. Ann. 1192.

Nor is Kentucky Act of April 10, 1878, under which penalties for misdemeanors in certain cases can be satisfied by requiring the accused to labor for the county for a designated period unconstitutional, as discriminating between the rich and poor because the rich are able to satisfy their fines with money. Com. v. Sherley, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 641.

And an act authorizing the courts of a county to sentence persons convicted of misdemeanors to confinement at hard labor in the house of correction is not unequal in its operation and therefore unconstitutional because it applies to that county only where by another statute all the boards of county supervisors in the state are authorized to establish houses of correction for the confinement at hard labor of persons convicted of similar offenses. Re Bergin, 31 Wis. 363.

Tennessee Act of 1815, chap. 23, however, providing that a convict shall be further held in the workhouse after working out the imprisonment and all the costs in the case, to work out all costs which may accrue after conviction for clothing and other necessities, violates Tennessee Bill of Rights, section 8, declaring that no man shall be taken or imprisoned or deprived of his liberty but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, as the duration of such imprisonment would be determinable alone by the superintendent or keeper of the workhouse. Knox v. State, 9 Baxt. 202.

And South Carolina Act of 1885 as amended by Act December 20, 1892, is unconstitutional under S. C. Const. 1868, art. 1, § 19, limiting the jurisdiction of justices in criminal cases to offenses for which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment for thirty days, so far as when taken in connection with S. C. Gen. Stat., § 2615, it authorizes the addition to a sentence of imprisonment thereunder, a requirement of hard labor. State v. Williams, 40 S. C. 373.

And a trial justice has no power thereunder to sentence a person convicted of the offense of carrying concealed weapons to be imprisoned at thirty days' hard labor. Ibid.

Sentence to imprisonment with hard labor is an infamous punishment within the provision of the Federal Constitution requiring prosecution of infamous crimes by presentment or indictment. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 29 L. ed. 89.

III. Necessity of express authority.

The rule that express statutory authority is necessary to the imposition of hard labor as a punishment for crime is almost universal.

The word "imprisonment" alone and unqualified, when used in criminal statutes, does not import imprisonment at hard labor. State v. Hyland, 38 La. Ann. 799; State v. Ryder, Id. 224.

Thus in United States v. Cobb, 43 Fed. Rep. 570, it was said that the only case in which a person can be sentenced to a jail or penitentiary not exceeding one year under federal statutes is where the statutes prescribe hard labor as part of the punishment and leave the term of imprisonment in the discretion of the court, citing Robinson's Case tried at a former term.

So a statute authorizing a city court to punish offenses by fine and imprisonment confers no authority to impose a sentence to labor on the streets as a punishment. Ex parte Reynolds, 37 Ala. 138.

And a sentence of imprisonment at hard labor in state prison for the term of one year upon conviction of a misdemeanor punishable only by imprisonment in a penitentiary or county jail for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $500 or by both is without authority and void. People v. Kelly, 97 N. Y. 212.

of persons, liable to poll tax, lodging in a boarding house of which he was keeper; that he proceeded to serve such warrant; that the plaintiff resisted arrest with deadly weapons; that he used no more force in making the arrest than was reasonably necessary. All of the other defendants justified under the processes referred to in the answers of Carter and Wilson. Ordinance No. 426, providing for the collection of poll taxes, contains this section: "Sec. 4. It is hereby made the duty of all proprietors, or keepers of all boarding houses, restaurants, or hotels in the city of Topeka, to furnish to the street commissioner, when required so to do, the names of all persons boarding or lodging in their houses, and any such person, who shall neglect or refuse so to do, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction thereof in the police court of said city, be fined in the sum of not less than $5.00 nor more than $25.00 for each offense." Ordinance No. 36, relating to misdemeanors, contains the following section: "Sec. 14. That any person conducting himself in a riotous or disorderly manner, or who shall resist or oppose any officer in the discharge of his duty, or who shall openly use profane or indecent language, or indecently expose his or her person, or commit any nuisance upon any street, sidewalk, alley, or other public place of the city, shall be fined in a sum not less than $1.00 nor more than $100.00." Ordinance No. 91 provides that persons committed to the city prison may be compelled by the marshal to work at hard labor, and, in case of refusal to so work, that they shall be kept in close confinement, and fed on bread and

And upon whom a fine is imposed with a direction that he be imprisoned in case of nonpayment under Cal. Penal Code, section 241, authorizing punishment by a fine or by imprisonment or by both, cannot be required while so imprisoned for nonpayment of the fine to perform labor on the streets or other public works. Ex parte Kelly, 85 Cal. 154.

So a judgment of imprisonment for contempt of court pursuant to California Code, § 1446, allowing imprisonment in the county jail until the fine imposed is paid or satisfied by such imprisonment or otherwise does not authorize or justify imprisonment at hard labor. Re Fil Kl, 80 Cal. 201.

And a sentence to imprisonment at hard labor under Pennsylvania Act of January 29, 1820, cannot be imposed on conviction for fraudulent insolvency and concealment of effects in order to derive future benefit, being denounced by Pennsylvania Act of March 18, 1816, for which the prescribed punishment is a term of imprisonment only. Guldin v. Com. 6 Serg. & R. 554.

So a sentence to imprisonment in the county jail at hard labor is illegal under a statute imposing a punishment of imprisonment in the penitentiary or county jail in the discretion of the court, though hard labor is made an essential part of a sentence to imprisonment in the penitentiary by a prior statute. Daniels v. Com. 7 Pa. 371.

And Purdon's Pennsylvania Digest, 645, empowering the court to extend the period of confinement in certain enumerated cases to seven years, does not include larceny, the punishment for which is specially fixed by statute and cannot exceed three years' imprisonment at hard labor. Grimes v. Com. 15 Serg. & R. 74.

And stealing property not exceeding $100 in value in a dwelling house in the night-time is punishable under Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 129, as a simple larceny only, by imprisonment for not more than one year, and a sentence for that offense to solitary confinement in addition to one year's confinement at hard labor is reversible error. Tully v. Com. 4 Met. 357.

Nor can a person convicted of a misdemeanor who is sentenced to the county workhouse to work out the fine and costs in default of paying or securing the same pursuant to Tennessee Act of 1885, chap. 83, be detained to work out the tax on litigation imposed by Milliken & Vertrees' Code, § 612, upon the party taxed with the costs or prosecutions by presentment or indictment, as it is not costs or collectible as such but a specific tax imposed for revenue purposes only. Johnson v. State, 85 Tenn. 325.

And a sentence for keeping a nuisance under Iowa Code, section 4002, providing that the person convicted may be imprisoned until the fine is paid, 27 L. R. A.

to imprisonment until fine and costs are paid by labor, is erroneous as Iowa Code, section 4502, limits the power of the court to direct imprisonment to one day per every three and one third dollars of the fine, and under section 4736 thereof one sentenced to labor is entitled to credit of one dollar and a half a day on the judgment. State v. Jordan, 39 Iowa, 387.

And a trial justice has no power to sentence a person convicted of the offense of carrying concealed deadly weapons to be imprisoned at thirty days' hard labor under R. C. Const. 1865, art. 1, § 19, limiting the jurisdiction of justices in criminal cases to offenses for which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment for thirty days, and South Carolina Act, December 20, 1893, limiting the punishment for that offense to a fine of $100 or to imprisonment for thirty days. State v. Williams, 40 S. C. 373.

So additional hard labor in default of the payment of a fine cannot be imposed under a statute declaring that the punishment for the offense shall not exceed a stated number of years with or without hard labor, also authorizing the imposition of a fine where the accused is sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for the entire term and to the payment of a fine in addition thereto. State v. Hyland, 38 La. Ann. 708; State v. Ryder, Id. 294.

Nor can such additional labor be imposed where a fine has not been imposed as the penalty or a part of the penalty for the crime in question, under Louisiana Act No. 88 of 1878, section 1, providing for imprisonment at hard labor, and that the defendant may be charged with the costs of the prosecution, and that when a fine is imposed as a part of the penalty liquidation of such fine and costs may be enforced by sentence of additional labor. State v. Brannon, 34 La. Ann. 942.

In Weaver v. Com., 29 Pa. 445, however, it was held that the word "hard" in a sentence to imprisonment at hard labor, following the language of a previous statute, will be treated as surplusage and not as vitiating the sentence when the later acts upon the subject exclude it.

And in Hodge v. Queen (Ontario), 5 Crim. L. Mag. 391, it was held that power to impose punishment by imprisonment for enforcing any law, conferred by the British North American Act No. 15, § 92, includes the power to impose its usual accompaniment hard labor.

IV. Exception when labor is a part of the prison discipline.

Where the punishment provided for by the statute is imprisonment alone, a sentence to confinement at a place where hard labor is imposed as a consequence of the imprisonment is not in excess water only, until they consent to work. On the issues so joined the case was tried. After the testimony was concluded, special questions for the jury to answer were filed and handed up to the court by the defendants' counsel, with the instructions asked by the defendants, but no announcement of the fact was made, and plaintiff's counsel did not know, at that time, that such special questions were presented. After the court had charged the jury, and after the opening argument for the plaintiff and the first argument for the defendants had been made, the court's attention was called to the special questions by the defendants' counsel just as the court adjourned for dinner. Thereupon the court handed the questions to counsel for plaintiff, which was the first knowledge they had of their existence, who, upon the opening of the court at 2 o'clock, objected to the presentation of said special questions, and also asked an opportunity to be heard by the court respecting the legality, fitness, and relevancy to the issue of said proposed questions, to which counsel for the defendants objected. Thereupon the court refused to submit the special questions to the jury. The jury were charged that section 4, under which the original complaint was filed in the police court, was void, and plaintiff's arrest unlawful; that, such being the case, the plaintiff could not be guilty of any offense in resisting said officer in making said arrest; that the judgment of the police court was illegal, and the subsequent imprisonment of the plaintiff was unlawful and false. It was shown on the trial that on the 18th day of September, 1887, a complaint was filed by Wilson, charging of the power conferred. Ex parte Karstendick, 98 U. S. 386, 23 L. ed. 889.

This ruling was cited with approval in Ex parte Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. ed. 107, and United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 38 L. ed. 631, but both cases turned on other questions.

Thus criminals sentenced by United States courts to the penitentiaries of a state under a statute making them subject to the same discipline and treatment as convicts sentenced by the state courts are subject to hard labor as a part of the imprisonment when by the laws of the state prisoners are subject thereto unless otherwise provided in the sentence, although hard labor was not made a part of the punishment by the terms of the sentence. Ex parte Geary, 2 Biss. 485.

And in Millar v. State, 2 Kan. 174, "penitentiary" was held to be an English word signifying a prison or place of punishment in which convicts sentenced to hard labor are confined by authority of law, and a sentence to hard labor in the penitentiary was sustained though no statute authorized punishment by confinement at hard labor.

So a sentence to imprisonment at hard labor where the statutory penalty for the offense is imprisonment only is not invalid or ineffectual where hard labor is made a consequence of the imprisonment by statute as the feature of hard labor would have been implied in a sentence of imprisonment only. United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 38 L. ed. 631, reversing 57 Fed. Rep. 200; Brown v. State, 74 Ala. 478; Miles v. People (N. Y.) 4 Cent. L. J. 507.

And a judgment sentencing a prisoner to the state prison need not expressly state that he be put to hard labor where hard labor is a component part of the confinement in such prison. Gibbs v. State, 45 N. J. L. 379, 46 Am. Rep. 782; People v. Sadler, 97 N. Y. 146; State v. Dick, 10 La. Ann. 461.

Such a sentence implies that the convict is to be subjected to the treatment prescribed for others confined at the same place for similar acts. State v. Dick, supra.

And a statutory provision that the convict is to be received, kept, and employed in the manner prescribed by law is simply directory to the keeper of the prison and not a part of the sentence, the omission of which would invalidate it. People v. Sadler, supra.

So a finding by the jury, on trial of a slave for murder, of guilty without capital punishment in accordance with the provisions of Louisiana Act of 1846, page 118, will be taken as intending that the defendant shall be sentenced to hard labor for life in the state penitentiary as provided in section 2 thereof. State v. Dick, supra.

V. Construction of statutes conferring the power generally.

An act upon which a summary conviction is 27 L. R. A.

founded, empowering justices to impose either fine or hard labor at their option, authorizes them to impose hard labor for default in the payment of a fine. Queen v. Justices of Tynemouth, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 647.

Under S. C. Gen. Stat., § 2615, it is within the discretion of the judge pronouncing a sentence for selling liquor without a license in violation of Gen. Stat., § 1734, whether it shall be in the penitentiary or the county jail and whether it shall be with or without hard labor. State v. Boyd, 85 S. C. 269.

And in State v. Jack, 14 La. Ann. 885, it was said that both corporal punishment and imprisonment at hard labor might be inflicted on a slave under Louisiana Act of 1837, p. 233, giving the court power to commute the sentence and inflict a lesser punishment where the crime charged is punishable with death or imprisonment at hard labor for life.

And in State v. Turner, 18 S. C. 108, it was held that South Carolina Act of 1878 (16 Stat. at L. 468) providing that where imprisonment is authorized by a statute a prisoner convicted thereunder might be sentenced to imprisonment in jail or penitentiary with or without hard labor is a general law applicable to statutes afterwards enacted as well as to those previously in force.

So article 74 of Texas Penal Code conferring power upon juries to direct that confinement may be solitary in whole or in part to labor at its discretion where the penalty for the offense committed is imprisonment in the penitentiary for life does not conflict with article 612 thereof as originally adopted providing that murder might be punished by death, solitary confinement in the penitentiary for life, confinement to labor for a term of years, etc. Cockrum v. State, 24 Tex. 304.

And imprisonment at hard labor as a punishment for misdemeanors is authorized by Milliken & Vertrees' Code, section 6259, which is not repealed by Tennessee Workhouse Law of 1876 providing for imprisonment at hard labor for fines and costs only, which does not purport to be a revision of the former law. Durham v. State, 80 Tenn. 723.

So La. Stat. April 6, 1843, § 7, authorizing juries to pronounce sentence of death, imprisonment at hard labor for life, or imprisonment for a shorter term in cases in which capital punishment or imprisonment at hard labor for life is inflicted for a crime committed by a slave, was not repealed by Louisiana Statutes of June 1, 1846, authorizing the jury in capital cases to qualify their verdict by adding "without capital punishment," as this was intended for the government of free persons alone. State v. Lewis, 3 La. Ann. 808.

And where a term of two years is fixed on conviction for forgery it is within the discretion of the court under Ala. Code 1876, §§ 4342, 4450, to elect whether it shall be hard labor for the county or the defendant with a violation of section 4 of Ordinance No. 426, above quoted. A warrant was issued on such complaint, and placed in the hands of Wilson, who was a policeman, to serve. The plaintiff resisted arrest. Wilson called others to his assistance, overpowered the plaintiff, put him in a wagon, and took him to the city prison, where he was kept until the following day. On the 14th he was taken before the police judge for trial. He refused to plead. Thereupon a plea of not guilty was entered for him, witnesses were examined, he was found guilty and fined $25, and ordered to stand committed until such fine should be paid. The same day another complaint was filed, under section 14 of Ordinance No. 36, above mentioned, charging the plaintiff with resisting an officer in serving a warrant on plaintiff. He was arraigned on this charge also, and refused to plead. A plea of not guilty was entered for him. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $75 for this offense, and committed to the city prison. The marshal kept him in custody under these commitments until the 17th day of September, when he was released from custody by giving a bond in a habeas corpus proceeding in the district court of Shawnee county, and afterwards, on the 8th day of November, 1887, was discharged under such proceedings by said court. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against all of the defendants for $2,100. The defendants bring the case here for review.

Messrs. Douthitt, Jones & Mason, for plaintiffs in error:

The court erred in this case in refusing to imprisonment in the penitentiary. Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1.

In Texas it is deemed to be the duty of the court in a trial for murder under the constitution and statutes to inform the jury by the charge that the punishment therefor might be commuted to imprisonment at hard labor for life, a failure to perform which is a ground for the reversal of a conviction. Marshall v. State, 33 Tex. 664.

And an instruction to the jury that if they find the defendant guilty of murder they will assess the punishment at death or at solitary confinement in the penitentiary for life, etc., intended to be in conformity to Texas Penal Code, article 74, is erroneous as it requires them to make the punishment of solitary confinement if they fix it at imprisonment for life and does not leave them the discretion contemplated by article 612 thereof to make the confinement solitary or the whole or a part of it at labor. Cockrum v. State, 24 Tex. 394.

So Tex. Const., art. 5, § 8, empowering the jury in a capital case to substitute imprisonment for life at hard labor in lieu of the death penalty, is not a repeal of the former law inflicting the death penalty or an amelioration thereof which will entitle a defendant whose offense was committed before the enactment thereof to elect whether he will be tried under the old or the new law as provided for in Texas Criminal Code, article 14. Dawson v. State, 33 Tex. 491.

a. Upon what courts conferred.

The power of the court to impose labor as a punishment usually if not universally depends upon its jurisdiction to try the offense for which such punishment is prescribed.

In Ex parte McKivitt, 55 Ala. 236, however, it was held that authority to sentence to hard labor for the county for the payment of costs was confined by the express words of the statute to county, circuit, and city courts, and did not extend to a justice of the peace.

But in Re Long, 37 Ala. 46, it was conceded by the court in argument that the amendment incorporated in Ala. Code 1886, § 4504, conferred it upon all courts having jurisdiction to try and convict of criminal offenses.

In South Carolina the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in criminal cases is limited to offenses for which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment for thirty days, by article 1, section 19, of the Constitution of 1868, thus prohibiting the imposition of labor. State v. Williams, 40 S. C. 373.

b. For what crimes imposed.

The object of this subdivision is not to detail all 37 L. R. A.

the crimes and misdemeanors which have been made subject to punishment by the imposition of labor, which would seem to be impracticable, but merely to show what has been construed to be within and what not within such statutes in cases in which the question has been raised.

Thus Pennsylvania Acts March 7, 1789, April 5, 1790, and April 4, 1807, substituted punishment by imprisonment at hard labor in the place of whipping and the pillory as practiced at common law.

Under these statutes it was held that hard labor might be inflicted on persons convicted of altering, publishing and passing a bank note of another state with intent to defraud, in Lewis v. Com. 2 Serg. & R. 551.

And that conspiracy to alter forged notes of a foreign bank with intent to cheat and defraud is thus punishable, in Clary v. Com. 4 Pa. 210.

And the rule was applied to conspiracy to defraud by use of false bank notes, in Collins v. Com. 3 Serg. & R. 230.

And to publishing a counterfeit note of the Bank of America, in Com. v. Searle, 2 Binn. 332, 4 Am. Dec. 446.

So in Com. v. Morton, 1 Kulp, 276, it was held that Pennsylvania Code of 1860 does not repeal prior laws as to attempts to commit crimes and an attempt to commit burglary is punishable by seven years' imprisonment at hard labor.

And a sentence to imprisonment at hard labor in the county jail and to pay a fine of $150 and cost of prosecution is proper in Pennsylvania, on conviction of a keeper of the common jail for voluntarily suffering three prisoners to escape who were charged respectively with arson, counterfeiting, and larceny. Weaver v. Com. 29 Pa. 445.

But an assault with intent to pick a pocket is not an offense for which infamous corporal punishment could have been inflicted at common law and cannot be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, under Pennsylvania Act of April 5, 1790. Rogers v. Com. 5 Serg. & R. 463.

In North Carolina the father of a bastard child who is committed to jail in default of payment of the fine and costs imposed upon him in bastardy proceedings may, under § 3448 of the Code empowering the county authorities to provide for the employment on its public highways of all prisoners confined within its jails, be required to work on such highways until the fine and costs are paid or he is otherwise discharged by law. Myer v. Stafford, 114 N. C. 234.

The offenses for which it was intended by the Kentucky Statute (Gen. Stat. chap. 29) to prescribe the punishment of hard labor, are such as may be punished thereunder by fine and imprisonment in the county jail and no offenses for which a greater submit to the jury special questions asked for as appears in record.

Code Civ. Proc. par. 286; Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fekheimer, 36 Kan. 45; Wyandotte v. Gibson, 25 Kan. 248; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Plunkett, Id. 193; Bent v. Philbrick, 16 Kan. 190.

Whether section 4 of Ordinance 426 is constitutional and legal or not, the warrant issued under the same was a protection for the police officer, if he proceeded to execute the same in good faith and in a reasonable manner.

Mr. W. A. S. Bird, also for plaintiffs in error:

The warrants were regularly issued, and are fair on their faces, and are a complete protection to the officers.

Shelby Iron Co.* 97 Ala. 626; Re Durant, 60 Vt. 176; Re Miles, 52 Vt. 609.

Messrs. G. C. Clemens and D. Overmayer for defendant in error.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Many questions are discussed by counsel. We shall consider only such as are necessary for the disposal of the case. The defendants or other punishment can be inflicted are within its contemplation, and the punishment of hard labor cannot be imposed in addition to exclusion from office and suffrage. Eldridge v. Com. 87 Ky. 365.

So in Texas seduction is a felony, and one convicted of that crime cannot be hired out for the purpose of collecting the fine imposed upon him as a punishment therefor under Tex. Rev. Stat., art. 3603, providing that a person convicted of a misdemeanor or petty offense who shall be committed to jail in default of payment of the fine and costs adjudged against him may be hired out until the money received for his fine is sufficient to liquidate the same in full. Ward v. White, 86 Tex. 170.

And in California the power to provide for the working of prisoners is confined to such as are assigned to the county jail as a punishment and does not extend to cases in which the punishment inflicted is a fine and the punishment a means adopted for its collection. Re Fil Ki, 80 Cal. 201.

And a prisoner confined in a state prison who is held and imprisoned at hard labor solely for the purpose of collecting a fine imposed as part of his punishment after he has served the full term of imprisonment adjudged against him, will be discharged on habeas corpus, as he then ceases to be a convict and can be confined only without labor, and cannot be confined in an institution in which all prisoners are required to labor. Ex parte Arras, 78 Cal. 304.

So a contempt of court is not a misdemeanor within Cal. Stat. 1889, § 30, p. 239, authorizing the board of supervisors of a county to require a prisoner confined in a county jail for a misdemeanor to be put at work. Re Fil Ki, supra.

In State v. Henderson, 47 La. Ann. 642, a sentence of one year at hard labor for petty larceny was upheld under La. Rev. Stat., § 812, that section not having been repealed by Act No. 124 of 1874.

c. Place of performance.

What particular penitentiary or place the labor is required to be performed in under the statutes conferring the right to impose it is all that is intended to be treated under this head; as to place of performance where the labor of the convicts has been leased or hired out, see infra heading: Hiring out convicts.

The place of imprisonment or hard labor is determined under the Alabama statutes, not by the discretion of the jury, but by the period of time for which it is imposed. If the term is more than two years it must be in the penitentiary, and if two years or less and more than one it may in the discretion of the judge, be either imprisonment in the penitentiary or in the county jail or to hard labor for the county, and if twelve months or less whether by imprisonment or by hard labor it must be in the county jail or to hard labor for the county. Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 98.

Thus Ala. Code 1893, § 3733, fixing the sentence for manslaughter in the first degree at not less than one nor more than ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, is qualified by § 4492 thereof, subsequently enacted, providing that when the sentence is to hard labor for twelve months or less it must be to imprisonment in the county jail or to hard labor for the county, so that when the jury wishes to fix one year as the term there is no alternative but to prescribe imprisonment in the county jail or at hard labor for the county. Ex parte Brown (Ala.) May 15, 1894.

And Ala. Code 1893, § 4492, authorizing imprisonment in the penitentiary, includes hard labor for the state and is not confined to hard labor for the county, so that a conviction of manslaughter with thirty months' hard labor will authorize a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary. Gunter v. State, supra.

So a convict liable to punishment by solitary confinement and imprisonment at hard labor in the state prison may, under Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 143, § 19, be sentenced to the house of correction for a term not exceeding three years, but he is not liable to sentence for such term in the county jail for the same offense, the house of correction being a substitute for the state prison in such case but not for the county jail. Stevens v. Com. 4 Met. 380.

Alabama Code, section 3733, providing that a person convicted of manslaughter in the first degree must at the discretion of the jury be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than ten years is amended by section 4492 thereof, subsequently enacted, providing that when the sentence is for twelve months or less it must be to the county jail, or to hard labor for the county by limiting the discretion of the jury as to the place of punishment in such cases. Zaner v. State, 90 Ala. 651; Henderson v. State, 98 Ala. 35.

And Ala. Code, § 4296, providing that any person convicted of murder in the second degree must be imprisoned in the penitentiary or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not less than ten years at the discretion of the jury, is repealed by section 4450 thereof, subsequently enacted, providing that when the period of punishment or labor is more than two years the sentence must be to the penitentiary so far as the provision for hard labor for the county and for punishment for a longer period than two years is concerned. Steele v. State, 61 Ala. 213.

And imprisonment at hard labor in the county workhouse may be imposed as a punishment for a misdemeanor under Milliken & Vertrees' Code (Tenn.) § 6259, providing that where a person is by law liable to be imprisoned in the county jail for stated, in writing, pertinent and material questions of fact to be submitted to the jury. These were filed with the clerk and handed to the court, together with special instructions asked, at the conclusion of the testimony. This was certainly in good time. It appears that the attention of plaintiff's counsel was not called to the fact that special questions were asked until after the opening argument by the plaintiff and one argument on behalf of the defendants, when the defendants' counsel again called the attention of the court to the questions. The court then refused to submit them. The only excuse hinted at in the record is that plaintiff's counsel asked leave to discuss the propriety of the questions, to which the defendants objected, and that they were not submitted in time. In this the court erred. Bent v. Philbrick, 16 Kan. 190; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Plunkett, 25 Kan. 198; Wyandotte v. Gibson, Id. 236; Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Fehheimer, 36 Kan. 45. When counsel for the defendants presented these questions to the court, and requested their submission, they had done all the law required of them. It might have been well for the court or counsel to have called the attention of the opposing party to them, but we cannot hold that a failure to do so deprived the defendants of their right under the statute. We also think, where there was no court rule prescribing the time within which such questions might be presented, that the defendants were still in time when they called the attention of the court and opposing counsel to safe keeping or punishment, confinement in the workhouse, if one be provided, may in the discretion of the court or justice be substituted. Durham v. State, 80 Tenn. 723.

Under North Carolina Code, § 3448, the disposition of persons imprisoned for the nonpayment of costs rests in the discretion of the county commissioners and the court has no power in sentencing a defendant to a term of imprisonment to provide that he be confined in the workhouse of the county after his imprisonment has terminated until the costs are paid. State v. Norwood, 93 N. C. 578.

So in Helton v. Miller, 14 Ind. 577, it was said that if the legislature sees fit to authorize the working of convicts outside of the prison bounds no one but the convicts themselves can dispute the validity of the law and refuse to obey it while it remains upon the statute books.

But convicts in the state prison cannot be worked outside of the prison and adjoining state grounds under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat., § 50, p. 424, providing that persons sentenced to state prison shall be kept at hard labor therein, and Ind. Act of 1897, sections 10, 22, providing for letting of convict labor to the highest bidder and the continuance of existing contracts, but nowhere in terms authorizing such outside labor. 104d.

And a convict lawfully subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary of the states, who is confined in a branch prison in charge of a deputy warden by authority of the board of prison inspectors and worked in a coal mine by a lessee, is not illegally confined and entitled to release on habeas corpus under Tennessee Act 1890, chap. 204, authorizing branch prisons and permitting the lessees of the penitentiary in such a case to work the convicts at any place subject to the rules prescribed thereby. State v. Jack, 90 Tenn. 614.

A prisoner under conviction for a misdemeanor who refuses to pay the fine and costs adjudged against him may be required by the commissioners' court of the county, under Tex. Rev. Stat., arts. 3691-3697, to labor on any public improvement in process of construction though there is neither a workhouse nor a farm in the county. Ex parte Bogle, 20 Tex. App. 127.

A sentence for a period not exceeding one year for an offense against the United States punishable by hard labor may be executed in a state penitentiary under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 5541, providing for such execution when the sentence is for a longer period than one year, and § 5542 thereof, providing for such execution where the sentence is to imprisonment and confinement at hard labor, as the former section applies only to imprisonment without labor while the latter applies to imprisonment with labor. Ex parte Friday, 43 Fed. Rep. 918.

See also, as to imprisonment in state penitentiaries for crimes against federal laws, United States 27 L. R. A.

cases cited supra under the heading: Exception where labor is part of the prison discipline.

The custody of prisoners ordered to work upon public roads may be awarded to a responsible person as overseer and custodian, under Cal. Penal Code, §§ 1613, 1614, providing that certain prisoners may be required to labor on the public works or ways of the county, and Cal. Laws 1891, p. 309, sec. 25, subsec. 30, requiring such work to be done under the direction of some responsible person, notwithstanding Cal. Pol. Code, sec. 4176, subsec. 6, providing that the sheriff must take charge of and keep the county jail and the prisoners therein. Hicks v. Folks, 97 Cal. 241.

d. The term or duration.

The duration of the period of labor is usually measured by the length of the sentence or by some designated portion thereof.

Thus the term of a convict sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor for two years from the date of the sentence who is not transferred to the penitentiary until a later date because of an appeal taken by him, begins at and should date from the time he is actually transferred to it. Ex parte Duckett, 15 S. C. 210, 40 Am. Rep. 694.

And a prisoner sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor, who escapes and remains for a time at large, must serve at hard labor after his recapture for a period equal to that part of his sentence which had not expired at the time of the escape, as the terms of the judgment cannot be satisfied except by the service of the prisoner for the specified time at hard labor. Re Edwards, 43 N. J. L. 555, 39 Am. Rep. 610.

So a rule adopted by workhouse commissioners that when a prisoner is arrested he may at once go to work voluntarily in the workhouse and the time he so works will be credited upon his sentence is unauthorized and void and will not be allowed to shorten the term of service under a conviction under Tennessee Act 1875, section 1, providing that a person convicted of a misdemeanor who fails to pay or secure the fine and cost adjudged against him shall be confined in the county workhouse after the term of his imprisonment, if any, has expired until he works out such fine and costs, as the sentence can only date from its rendition. Vanvabry v. Staton, 88 Tenn. 337.

A prisoner cannot, under Massachusetts Revised Statutes, chap. 130, § 8, be sentenced to hard labor for the maximum term provided for by the statute designating the term of imprisonment without distributing it specifically into periods of solitary confinement and confinement at hard labor, and add thereto days of solitary confinement; the aggregate of both must be kept within the limit. Stevens v. Com., 4 Met. 380.

them before the noon adjournment, and before defendants' argument was concluded. The error committed in this particular compels a reversal as to all of the defendants. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider errors urged by the defendant Metaker alone.

Upon a new trial the court will be required to pass on the validity of the ordinance, and the legal process issued thereon. It seems, therefore, to be necessary for us to also consider these matters. The trial court held section 4 of Ordinance 428 void. We fail to perceive any good reason for so holding. It is a provision to enable the officers of the city to learn the names of persons subject to poll tax. The ordinance of which it is a part was framed to require the performance of labor on, or the payment of money for the improvement of, the city's streets. This is a necessary public purpose. All revenue laws have distasteful features. It is necessary, in their enforcement, that methods somewhat inquisitorial be pursued. All attempts of the public to gather statistics, either by taxing officers, census takers, or in any other manner, necessarily impose some burdens and inconveniences on the people. We see nothing unreasonable in requiring the keepers of boarding houses to make known to the officers of the law the names of their boarders. The conviction, therefore, under the complaint filed in this action was not void, nor was the warrant under which the first arrest was made. However this might be, there is no pretense that the second complaint did not charge an offense under

A judgment condemning a criminal to three years' imprisonment at hard labor, however, and to pay the costs of the prosecution or remain imprisoned one day longer, is not illegal where the three years and one day do not exceed the limit of punishment fixed by law. State v. Nolan, 8 Rob. (La.) 513.

So under Ohio Rev. Stat., § 1799, the court sentencing a person convicted of crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, is authorized and required to declare in the sentence for what period he shall be kept at hard labor and for what period, if any, he shall be kept in solitary confinement. Ex parte Clark, 50 Ohio St. 649.

But a sentence to seven years' penal servitude on each of two counts charging perjury which are not identical, the one to begin at the close of the other, was upheld though 2 Geo. II., chap. 25, § 2, as amended by subsequent acts, made seven years' penal servitude the maximum sentence for a single act of perjury, in Castro v. Queen, 6 App. Cas. 249, 14 Cox, Crim. Cas. 546, 60 L. J. Q. B. 507, 44 L. T. N. S. 367.

And one who has been sentenced to hard labor on a conviction for crime may on a second conviction before the expiration of the former term be again sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor to commence upon the day on which the former sentence will expire. Russell v. Com. 7 Serg. & R. 498.

So in Iowa one sentenced to pay a fine for the violation of a city ordinance in selling liquor without a license may be confined at hard labor, but under Iowa Code, § 4509, the term cannot exceed one day for every three and one third dollars, and he is entitled to a credit of one dollar and a half upon the judgment for each day's labor. Keokuk v. Dressell, 47 Iowa, 597.

And one sentenced to pay a fine on conviction for keeping a nuisance can only be imprisoned for a term of which the number of days shall be equal to one for every three and one third dollars of the fine, and if sentenced to confinement at hard labor he is entitled to a credit upon the judgment of one dollar and fifty cents for each day's labor. State v. Anwerda, 40 Iowa, 151.

But where a sentence is one of imprisonment and costs the credit of thirty cents a day under Florida act authorizing the employment of convicts at hard labor (Laws March 7, 1877, chap. 2090, §§ 1, 2) is applicable to costs alone and no credit given therein will operate to limit the power of the county commissioners to employ him during the period of his sentence. Holland v. State, 23 Fla. 123.

Alabama Revised Code, § 3760, providing that one convicted of an offense who does not pay or secure the fine and costs adjudged against him may be imprisoned therefor and the duration of his imprisonment is to be determined by the amount of the fine, is supplemented but not repealed by sec. 27 L. R. A.

tion 4081 thereof, subsequently enacted, under which the unpaid costs were also to be considered in determining the length of his sentence to imprisonment or hard labor. Williams v. State, 55 Ala. 166.

Where a county convict has worked on a county farm a sufficient number of days to discharge the fine and cost adjudged against him at the rate prescribed by law, he is entitled to be discharged from further confinement. Ex parte Dampier, 24 Tex. App. 561; Ex parte Price, 11 Tex. App. 538.

And this is the rule when the convict is hired out for their payment though the hirer and his sureties are insolvent and the judgment cannot be collected. Ex parte Price, supra. See also infra heading: Hiring out convicts.

But city authorities may but are not required to cause prisoners to work in the streets and public grounds of the city under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, chap. 19, § 63, and one who is confined for the non-payment of a fine and costs adjudged against him is not entitled to credit thereon for the time of his confinement nor to his discharge after the lapse of such a period as would if computed at the rate of allowance for work provided by law, amount to as much as the fine and costs. Re McCort, 53 Kan. 12.

VI. Imposition for nonpayment of costs.

Sentence to labor for nonpayment of the costs of prosecution may also under proper authority be imposed on persons convicted of crime.

Thus in Alabama under section 4731 of the Code when hard labor is imposed the court may properly require additional hard labor for the county for a term sufficient to cover all costs and officer's fees. Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1.

And whenever a person is sentenced to hard labor as a punishment for an offense of which he has been convicted, either in default of the payment of or of confession of judgment for the fine assessed as well as in execution of the original judgment, the court may impose additional hard labor under the provisions of Ala. Code, § 4504, for the payment of costs. Ex parte State, 87 Ala. 46.

And one who pays a fine adjudged against him but does not pay the costs or confess judgment therefor as required by the Alabama code may be sentenced to hard labor for the county in which the trial was had for a period necessary to pay the costs at the prescribed rate per day under Rev. Code, § 3752, providing for such sentence in case of nonpayment of costs and fine. Nelson v. State, 46 Ala. 184.

So where one has been convicted of an offense punishable by fine without imprisonment, and he pays the fine but refuses to pay the costs, payment thereof may be enforced by sentence to hard labor under Ala. Code, §§ 4503, 4504. Ex parte Joice & Smith, 88 Ala. 123.

a valid ordinance. There is no claim that a person who, in fact, resists an officer in the discharge of his duties may not be punished for so doing. The defendant had the privilege of showing, if he could, that he was not guilty of the offense, but if, on the trial, the court found him guilty and assessed a fine against him, a commitment clearly would not be void, even though he were in fact innocent of the offense charged.

The validity of Ordinance No. 91, authorizing the marshal to compel prisoners confined in the city prison to work at hard labor, is challenged, as being in conflict with section 6 of the Bill of Rights of this state, which reads as follows: "Sec. 6. There shall be no slavery in this state; and no involuntary servitude, except for the punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." The authority for the passage of the ordinance is contained in subdivision 87, section 11, chapter 18, of the General Statutes of 1889, by which the mayor and council are given power to enact ordinances "to regulate the police of the city, and to impose fines, forfeitures, and penalties for the breach of any ordinance, and to provide for the recovery and collection thereof, and in default of payment to provide for confinement in the city prison or to hard labor." The ordinance in question does not provide for a judgment sentencing the defendant to confinement at hard labor, but authorizes the marshal to require the prisoners in his custody to labor. The ordinances under which the convictions were had authorized punish-

But an additional term of hard labor for the payment of costs, under Ala. Rev. Code, § 4081, sufficient to pay all the costs and officer's fees in the case, should not be imposed upon each of two defendants jointly indicted who have failed to pay them, as this would coerce double payment, but a sentence sufficient to satisfy one half thereof should be imposed on each, though either might be made to pay the whole. Coleman v. State, 55 Ala. 173.

So in Tennessee a prisoner convicted of a felony whose punishment has been commuted to imprisonment in the county jail, may under Tenn. Code, § 6204, providing for the working out of costs in misdemeanor cases, and Tenn. Act of 1881, chap. 105, providing that persons who have been thus convicted and whose punishment is thus commuted may be compelled to work out the term of imprisonment, be required to work the costs adjudged against him after his term of imprisonment has expired. Eaton v. State, 15 Lea. 200.

And Tex. Rev. Stat., art. 3802, providing for the hiring out of convicts, the proceeds of hiring to be applied to the payment of the costs and fine, but that in no case shall the county be liable to officers for their costs, is not unconstitutional, but it applies only where convicts have been hired out to individuals or companies and does not prevent the sheriff from recovering his costs from the county when they have been worked out by the convicts on the public roads or county farms. Grayson County v. May (Tex.) May Term, 1882.

It is only costs incurred by the state or to which the state, if it were liable for costs, could be subjected, however, for the payment of which a convict may be compelled to labor. Bradley v. State, 40 Ala. 318.

A defendant in a criminal case made liable to imprisonment at hard labor for the payment of the cost adjudged against him cannot be required to work out his own costs although he is liable therefor. Knox v. State, 9 Baxt. 302.

The fees of the defendant's own witnesses are not a part of the costs for the payment of which additional hard labor may be imposed upon him. Hill v. State, 78 Ala. 1; Bradley v. State, supra.

And the same rule applies to fees of the officers of the court for services rendered him in making his defense. Bradley v. State, supra.

But compensation of the sheriff for feeding a prisoner confined in jail to answer an indictment is a part of the costs taxable against him on conviction and for the payment of which hard labor may be imposed. Ibid.

And the word "costs" when employed with reference to criminal prosecutions includes "officer's fees" and the omission of the words "officer's fees" in an amendment to a statute providing for sentence to hard labor for payment of costs does not change the character of the liability which a convict may be required to discharge by hard labor. Ibid.

See also supra heading, The term or duration, and infra heading, Necessity of strict compliance.

VII. Necessity of strict compliance.

Where the statute makes hard labor a part of the punishment it is imperative upon the court to include it in the sentence. Ex parte Karstendick, 98 U. S. 396, 23 L. ed. 889; Ex parte Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. ed. 107; United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 38 L. ed. 631.

While the above statement was mere dicta it has been adopted as authority in Harman v. United States, 50 Fed. Rep. 921, and Re Johnson, 46 Fed. Rep. 477, holding that a sentence to simple imprisonment of which hard labor is not made a part is void where the statute makes hard labor a part of the punishment.

And in such case the prisoner is entitled to release on habeas corpus. Re Johnson, supra.

So under Wis. Stat. (Act 1858, chap. 181, § 5) a direction for confinement at hard labor is an essential part of every sentence to imprisonment in the state prison, the omission of which will invalidate it. Peglow v. State, 12 Wis. 534; Benedict v. State, Id. 314.

And requires the remission of the record to the trial court for judgment upon the conviction according to law. Benedict v. State, supra.

But a judgment that the defendant be punished by confinement at hard labor in the state prison for the term of ten years and that ten days of each year thereof be passed in solitary imprisonment, though informal, is sufficient under the Wisconsin statute. Frans v. State, 12 Wis. 537.

And a sentence to separate or solitary confinement at hard labor is good under Pennsylvania Act of April 23, 1829, authorizing imprisonment at solitary labor. Drew v. Com. 1 Whart. 279.

But a sentence on conviction for perjury that the convict be confined, fed, clothed and treated as the law directs is erroneous, the prescribed punishment for perjury being fine and imprisonment at hard labor. Kroemer v. Com. 3 Binney, 577.

And the same rule applies to a sentence for an assault and battery with intent to kill for which a similar punishment is provided. Scott v. Com. 6 Serg. & R. 224.

So a sentence to imprisonment in a state prison must, under Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 139, § 8, be partly to solitary confinement and partly to confinement at hard labor, and one which directs no solitary confinement is erroneous and reversible on appeal by the convict. Stevens v. Com. 4 Met. 860.

This statute, however, does not apply to additional sentences awarded upon information against ment by fine. The police judge imposed a fine of $25 under the first complaint, and $75 under the second, and committed the defendant to the city prison until the fine and costs should be paid. In neither case was there any judgment imposing hard labor as a punishment for the violation of an ordinance. It was said by this court in Re McCort, 52 Kan. 18, in considering an ordinance of a city of the second class: "The law permits but does not require city authorities to cause city prisoners to work on the streets and public grounds of the city." In that case it was contended by the prisoner that it was incumbent on the city authorities to cause him to work, and that if they failed to do so he was entitled to the same credit per day on his fine that he would have had if kept at work.

The question as to the power of the city to compel the performance of hard labor was not raised. It was said in the opinion: "The punishment which the law authorizes is a fine and the costs. If the defendant pay the fine and costs, neither imprisonment nor compulsory labor can be imposed. For the purpose of enforcing the collection of the fine the law authorizes imprisonment, and for the same purpose it also authorizes the employment of prisoners on the streets." In order to uphold Ordinance 91, so far as it authorizes compulsory labor, it is necessary that it be imposed as a punishment for crime. If the prisoner is unwilling to work, clearly to compel him to do so would be to impose involuntary servitude. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 29 L. ed. 89. In this case, and persons who have been before convicted and sentenced. Bump v. Com. 8 Met. 533.

Nor can a prisoner who is sentenced by a court of competent jurisdiction to perform hard labor for the county during a specified term be punished by confinement in jail for that period but will be discharged therefrom on habeas corpus. Ex parte Pearson, 59 Ala. 664.

So, Ky. Gen. Stat., chap. 29, § 2, leaving it to the discretion of the jury fixing the amount of the fine to say in its verdict whether if the fine and costs are not immediately paid or replevied by the defendant he shall be put at hard labor in lieu of imprisonment for the nonpayment requires it to say in terms whether he shall be put at hard labor, and the mere use of the words in the verdict "the working statute applied" is not sufficient to sustain a judgment therefor. Eldridge v. Com. 37 Ky. 365.

And in Alabama a judgment and sentence in a criminal case in which the fine and costs are not presently paid nor a judgment confessed therefor should specify either the length of the additional term of hard labor for the costs or the rate per diem, under Ala. Act February 26, 1881, fixing the rate at not less than 30 cents per day and in cases of misdemeanors not less than eight months, and it will be reversed on appeal if it is only for such additional term as may be necessary to pay the court costs and officer's fees not to exceed eight months. Armstrong v. State, 33 Ala. 49.

So in imposing additional hard labor to cover costs and fees under the Alabama statute the court should determine before the adjournment of the term and specify in its judgment the exact number of days of the additional sentence. Coleman v. State, 55 Ala. 173.

And a sentence which in one part condemns the defendant to hard labor for the payment of the costs at the rate of forty cents per day the terms not to exceed eight months, and which in another part fixes the time at more than eight months and for a period more than sufficient to pay the costs, is inconsistent, uncertain, and erroneous, though the latter clause is in excess of the court's jurisdiction and therefore void. Bradley v. State, 69 Ala. 318.

In State v. Dick, 10 La. Ann. 461, however, it was held that an omission by a magistrate in imposing a sentence to insert the words "at hard labor" cannot be assigned by the convict as error even if it exonerates him from that part of the penalty.

A sentence of an accessory to six months in the chain gang with a money alternative of $200 after the principal had been sentenced to the chain gang for a life term with a money alternative of $20 does not violate Georgia Code, section 4488, providing that an accessory shall receive and suffer the same punishment as would be inflicted upon the principal it being within the limit of 27 L. R. A.

what might have been imposed on him. Anderson v. State, 63 Ga. 675.

And a judgment imposing hard labor for the county for the payment of costs at a specified rate until they are paid without specifying the amount or number of days will not be held erroneous under the Alabama statute, but the precise amount, the number of days to be served, and the time allowed each day's service should be specified therein. Walton v. State, 62 Ala. 197; Walker v. State, 58 Ala. 308; Hill v. State, 78 Ala. 1.

A sentence to hard labor on nonpayment of costs "for such a period not exceeding eight months at a rate of not less than thirty cents per day" as may be necessary to pay the costs is sufficiently definite and certain where it afterwards recites the amount of the costs and specifies the number of days for which hard labor is adjudged. Gady v. State, 33 Ala. 51.

And so is a judgment specifying the exact duration of the additional hard labor imposed for costs where the record does not show that the bill of costs includes any for the payment of which the defendant cannot be legally imprisoned. Croom v. State, 71 Ala. 14.

See also supra headings: The term or duration, and Imposition for nonpayment of costs.

VIII. Delegation of the power.

Authority to sentence to imprisonment at hard labor cannot be delegated by the court or judge upon which it is conferred.

Thus a judge cannot delegate to the county commissioners authority to change a sentence of imprisonment to the county jail for an assault with a deadly weapon under N. C. Code, § 987, to imprisonment in the workhouse of the county. State v. Norwood, 98 N. C. 578.

A resolution of a board of county commissioners authorizing two of its members to take such action as in their judgment is necessary to utilize the labor of county prisoners on public works, however, is not an illegal delegation by the board of its powers under the Florida statute relating to the employment of convicts (Laws March 7, 1877, p. 320) as it shows a determination by the board that the statute shall be enforced leaving the details to the two members whose action is not put beyond the supervision and control of the board. Holland v. State, 23 Fla. 123.

But power to provide for punishment by confinement at labor for violations of its by-laws and ordinances may be conferred upon municipal bodies.

Thus authority in the provincial legislature of the province of Ontario to impose punishment by imprisonment with or without hard labor includes the power to delegate such authority to municipal bodies created by it called the license commis-in the McCort Case, on payment of the fine the defendant would have been entitled to discharge, and could neither have been confined in prison nor required to labor. The provisions of the ordinances authorizing imprisonment and compulsory labor are mere means of collecting the fines. Neither is imposed as a punishment. It is wholly unnecessary to discuss the question as to whether section 5, which guarantees the right of trial by jury, has been violated. For authorities on that point, see State v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, 59 Am. Rep. 529; Re Rolfs, 80 Kan. 758; Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622; Neitel v. Concordia, 14 Kan. 446. The conclusion is inevitable that hard labor was not imposed on the plaintiff as a punishment for crime whereof he had been duly convicted, but that the attempt to cause him to labor was made in pursuance of the ordinance as a means of collecting the fines, and was therefore in violation of the bill of rights.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that, in making the arrest, in taking him to prison, and while in confinement, he was beaten and treated with harshness and cruelty. The policeman who made the arrest had the right to use such force as was reasonably necessary under the circumstances to overcome the plaintiff's resistance, and where resistance is made with deadly weapons, like a hatchet or hammer, the officer would not be held to that degree of nice and scrupulous care in sioners. Hodge v. Queen (Ontario) 5 Crim. L. Mag. 301.

And offenders against the penal by-laws and ordinances of a city may be imprisoned in the workhouse and confined at hard labor until the fine and costs adjudged against them are discharged at the rate per day provided by law where such imprisonment is authorized by the city charter. Berry v. Bristan, 86 Ky. 5.

But such authority, like that conferred directly upon the courts, must be express and like all other delegated power must be strictly construed and substantially if not literally pursued.

Thus a judgment consigning the accused to the city chain gang in case of his failure to pay a fine imposed on him for violation of an ordinance is void unless expressly authorized, and general power to prescribe, impose, and exact reasonable fines, penalties, and imprisonments does not include such authority. Carr v. Conyers, 84 Ga. 287.

And county supervisors have no authority to put a person imprisoned for the purpose of collecting a fine to hard labor under Cal. Const., art. 11, § 11, providing that any county, city, or town may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. Re Fil Kl, 80 Cal. 201.

And one who violates an ordinance of a town cannot be required to work out his fine under Ill. Act 1879, p. 117, providing for the working out of fines, as that act is limited to misdemeanors in violation of the criminal code, and does not apply to offenses under ordinances of a town unless the authorities thereof shall have so provided by ordinance. Kanouse v. Lexington, 12 Ill. App. 518.

Nor can a money fine and a sentence to labor be imposed in the same case under a municipal charter authorizing the mayor and city council to fine or imprison, or to sentence to labor on conviction for violation of an ordinance and in the event the fine and costs are not paid to require the offender to work them out, unless the labor is added only for the purpose of enforcing payment of the fine. Ex parte Anniston, 84 Ala. 21.

So a municipal ordinance providing for punishment by fine or imprisonment, or by fine and imprisonment, or by hard labor upon the streets or public works of the city for violation of a by-law or ordinance of the municipality does not authorize the imposition of a money fine and a sentence to hard labor for the same offense though hard labor may under another ordinance be imposed for non-payment of the fine. Ex parte Montgomery, 70 Ala. 275.

And an ordinance authorizing the mayor or president of a municipality to commit to the city prison or workhouse or place of correction for a period to be determined by him not to exceed sixty days any convict who fails to pay a fine penalty or forfeiture imposed under any city ordinance does not authorize a sentence to pay a fine of a designated sum or perform sixty days' work in the public streets of the city. Ex parte Martini, 23 Fla. 343.

This case distinguishes Ex parte Hunter, 16 Fla. 575, infra, set forth under heading, Remedy for improper imposition, on the ground that in that case there was improperly and inaccurately inserted in the judgment a consequence legally flowing from it under the statute whereas in the case at bar the ordinance is not enforceable unless there is a judgment in accordance with it.

IX. Hiring out convicts.

The hiring out of convicts to persons or corporations desiring their services in the execution of private enterprises or otherwise as contradistinguished from working them in the penal institutions or upon public works is practiced by a number of the states.

Convicts are none the less hired out by the county, however, within the meaning of Ala. Code 1886, § 4591, prescribing the duties of state inspectors with relation thereto, because hired out under contract to work certain public roads of the county. Jefferson County v. Truss, 86 Ala. 486.

a. Power to hire out.

The constitutionality and validity of the Kentucky Act (Stat. May 10, 1884) authorizing the hiring out of convicts by the state, is directly upheld in Mason & Ford Co. v. Main Jail, 100 Mo. 487.

And the power of the legislature to authorize contracts for the leasing out of the labor of convicts was also sustained, in State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429, and People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11,—the court by Field, J., in State v. McCauley, supra, saying that it had never been questioned.

California, however, has since forbidden the letting of convict labor by contract by constitutional provision and statutes conferring the power have generally hedged it with restrictions and limitations designed to avoid injurious effects and to prevent abuse.

Thus New York Act of May, 1885, with relation to state prisons was designed to prevent the employment of convicts in those trades in which the mechanics of the country were engaged, except so far as such convicts had already been instructed in such trades, and to regulate the making of contracts so as to produce a fair competition. Young v. Beardsley, 11 Paige, 93, 5 L. ed. 68.

And the intent of the Arkansas statute (Mansf. Dig. §§ 1226, 1245) authorizing the county court to contract for the safe keeping of persons committed to the county jail, is that the contractor shall keep his prisoners in the county where they were convicted, except only where the county court is unable to contract with any person in the county it might contract with the contractor of any other county. Re Burrow, 56 Ark. 275.

affecting the arrest that would be required in ordinary cases; but, having overcome such resistance and having the prisoner fully in his power, the officer is then liable for any unnecessary harm or indignity done to the prisoner. It is the duty of all keepers of jails and prisons to treat their prisoners humanely. Keepers of city prisoners have no warrant or authority in law to be harsh and brutal in the management of those in their custody. For all needless sufferings and indignities which they impose they are accountable in damages to the party injured, and all persons aiding or assisting in such wrongs are liable with them.

And under Ala. Sess. Act 1888, § 5, p. 184, and Ala. Code 1876, § 4468, the same requirement exists, unless the court of county commissioners shall be of the opinion that the interests of the county require them to be hired outside it. Ex parte Small, 51 Ala. 65; Ex parte Crews, 78 Ala. 457.

So in Trask v. State, 32 N. J. L. 478, it was said that no contract could legally be made for the labor of the prisoners without the limits of the state, as it would require the prisoners to go beyond its jurisdiction and control, nor could any contract be made for labor without the prison walls as that would conflict with the statute requiring the keeper to keep the prisoners within the prison, nor could they be employed at labor injurious to the health of the prisoners.

A convict whose service and safe keeping have been contracted for under Mansf. Ark. Dig., § 1245, providing that in case the county court is unable to make a contract with any person in the county it may contract with the contractor of any other county, however, is not entitled to relief on habeas corpus, on the ground that the person thus contracting was not the contractor of another county where the county court had determined though erroneously that he was such contractor, as such determination is not subject to collateral attack. Re Burrow, supra.

And an order of the court of commissioners in Alabama for the hiring of convicts outside of the county involves a finding that the interests of the county require such hiring and the record or order need not recite the fact. Ex parte White, 51 Ala. 60; Ex parte Small, Id. 85.

So the power when conferred is strictly confined within the limits prescribed by the statutes conferring it and cannot be extended by implication.

Thus orders passed by the court of county commissioners authorizing the probate judge to adopt such measures as to him may seem best as to the letting out of contracts for the hire of county convicts is not a compliance with Ala. Code 1876, section 4465, requiring the court itself to determine in what manner and on what particular works the labor shall be performed. Ex parte Crews, 78 Ala. 457.

And the probate judge has no power to make a contract for the hire of a convict under the Alabama statute in the absence of action on the part of the commissioner's court determining in what manner and on what particular works the labor of convicts shall be performed, as required by Ala. Code 1876, §§ 4465, 4468, and in such case the agreement to pay for the convict's services would be void as against public policy. State v. Metcalfe, 75 Ala. 42.

New York Act of May, 1835, section 9, providing that in branches of business in which the consumption of the country is chiefly supplied without foreign importation the number of convicts to be 27 L. R. A.

Horton, M. J., concurring specially:

I do not assent to all that is stated in the foregoing opinion. I supposed that the power of a city to require city prisoners, committed to the city jail, to work was no longer a subject of contention in this state, but it is questioned again in this case. Re Dassler, 85 Kan. 678; State v. Topeka, 86 Kan. 76; Re McCort, 52 Kan. 18. In the latter case, it was expressly held by this court that "the law permits, but does not require, city authorities to cause city prisoners to work on the streets and public grounds of the city." In the opinion prepared in the McCort Case by Allen, J., it was observed: "The punishment which the law authorizes is a fine and the costs. If the prisoner pays employed or let shall be limited by the number of convicts who had learned a trade before coming to prison limits the number to such as had learned the particular trade to which the contractor employment relates and not to the number who had learned any trade whatever. Young v. Beardaley, 11 Paige, 93, 5 L. ed. 68.

And a court imposing a sentence has no power at a subsequent term to make an order authorizing the county commissioners to farm out the services of the prisoners sentenced under N. C. Code, § 3444, providing that it shall not be lawful to farm out any such convicted person who may be imprisoned for the nonpayment of a fine or as a punishment for an offense unless the court before whom the trial is had shall in its judgment so authorize. State v. Pearson, 100 N. C. 414.

So the court has no power under N. C. Code, § 3484, to direct that a defendant under sentence of imprisonment shall be hired out by the county authorities. It can only authorize it to be done under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commissioners. State v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 363.

It may in its discretion fix the term of imprisonment and authorize the board of county commissioners to farm out the convict as provided in N. C. Code, § 3444, or employ him in the work-house as provided in § 778 thereof, but the imprisonment cannot extend beyond the time fixed. State v. Williams, 97 N. C. 414.

And in Lunenburg v. Smith, 24 N. S. 104, it was held that a contract by which a municipal council hires out persons sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor to work for private parties under an arrangement by which half of the wages is to go to the municipality and the remainder to the prisoners is illegal and no recovery can be had for such wages.

The duty rests with the sheriff under the Arkansas statute, upon the conviction of a defendant for a misdemeanor who is present at the trial to retain him in his custody and to hire him out as directed by the judgment if the fine and costs be not immediately paid, and voluntarily permitting him to go at large is a misdemeanor. Griffin v. State, 37 Ark. 437.

And one convicted of a misdemeanor may be hired for as much as can be got for him, not less than 75 cents per day under Arkansas Act of March 10, 1877, but the court cannot require a greater hire per day than the minimum fixed by statute, nor direct that the hiring be for a less number of days than one for every seventy-five cents of the fine and cost. State v. Barnea, 37 Ark. 448.

In Smith v. State, 76 Ala. 60, an indictment against the hirer of a county convict for a negligent escape was sustained and the bond given by him and recitals therein held admissible to prove the fact of hiring.

the fine and costs, neither imprisonment nor compulsory labor can be imposed. For the purpose of enforcing collection of the fine the law authorizes imprisonment, and for the same purpose it also authorizes the employment of prisoners on the streets. The statute gives the city council the power to fix the rate per day to be allowed a prisoner who is working out his fine, without any limitation. The city may or may not have work on which it would be profitable or desirable to employ city prisoners. If the city authorities see fit to put the prisoner at work, he must be credited on the fine and costs at the rate of one dollar per day for the time he is so employed; and, if they do not see fit to have him work, he will get no credit for the time he remains in jail, but can be discharged at any time on payment of the fine and costs. This court has already decided that fines and costs are not debts, within the meaning of the constitutional provision forbidding imprisonment for debt. Therefore, when it is stated that imprisonment and labor imposed under the provisions of a statute or the ordinances of a city are "solely the means of collecting a debt," such language is misleading, as the word "debt" is construed in the constitution. A fine is not the kind of a debt referred to in the organic law. Re Wheeler, 34 Kan. 96; Re Boyd, Id. 570. If, however, we re-examine the power of cities of this state to compel persons committed to city prisons to work,

Mississippi Code 1892, chap. 23, however, providing that one sentenced for a misdemeanor must remain in jail for the full term of his sentence and cannot be delivered to the county contractor or hired out is not applicable to contracts between a contractor or county board made before its enactment as section 814 thereof expressly provides that that chapter shall not apply to existing contracts. Ex parte Hill (Miss.) May 1, 1893.

And Minn. Stat., March 8, 1897, prohibiting the farming out of convict labor, does not prevent the relation of master and servant from existing between one who has contracted with the state for the erection of a state prison and a convict whose services were availed of by arrangement with the prison authorities who was injured while engaged in such work by the fall of a scaffold upon which he was standing, where the contractor knowingly received the benefit of his labor. Dalheim v. Lemon, 45 Fed. Rep. 225.

So an order of the court of commissioners for the hiring of convicts sentenced to hard labor need not determine in what manner and on what particular work the convicts shall be employed as required by Ala. Code 1876, section 4465, where it merely authorizes the hiring to a particular person and does not establish a system of hard labor for the county. Ex parte White, 81 Ala. 80.

And an order of such court declaring it best and necessary to hire convicts out of the county purporting to apply to convicts for the current year and the succeeding year cannot be objected to on the ground that it was valid for twelve months only by a convict sentenced the next year when at the expiration of the first year and before his conviction the court had made a similar order for the second year. Ex parte Small, 81 Ala. 85.

Nor is the validity of an order for the hiring of convicts sentenced to hard labor for the county impaired by a failure to transcribe it on the final records of the court as required by Ala. Code 1876, § 4468, where a written memoranda thereof is made at the time by the probate judge. Ex parte White, supra.

So the commissioners of a county have the power under N. C. Laws 1876-77, chap. 196, authorizing them to provide for the employment of convicts on public works or other labor for individuals or corporations to hire a man imprisoned for fornication and adultery to his wife upon her giving bond with surety for the price. State v. Shaft, 78 N. C. 464.

b. The contract.

The rule requiring strict conformity to statutory authority is particularly applicable to steps preliminary to the execution of the contract.

Thus a contract by which the agent of a prison hires a convict to another without giving notice in a newspaper for sealed proposals for letting convicts as required by Mich. Sess. Laws 1842, p. 180, is void as the mode of letting prescribed by the statute is a limitation upon the power to let and not merely directory as to method. Agent of State Prison v. Lathrop, 1 Mich. 438.

And a contract by the commissioners for the letting of the labor of convicts under the Illinois Penitentiary Act, § 25, 26, notwithstanding as a mere temporary arrangement, is not valid unless made upon sealed bids or proposals after such letting is advertised as required by law pursuant to section 26 thereof, and when not so made it will be treated as a temporary arrangement only. People v. Dulaney, 96 Ill. 508.

Nor are the commissioners authorized under Illinois Penitentiary Act, § 25, 26, to act upon a bid or proposal of one wishing to employ convicts who has authorized the submission thereof to them in due form and season unless it was so in fact submitted as a sealed bid or proposal. Ibid.

So an offer to give as much or more than any other who shall send in proposals for the hire of convict labor is not the offer of any price within the intent of New York Laws, May, 1835, requiring the publication of notice and sealed proposals therefor, as the necessary effect of such an offer would be to prevent fair competition for the contract. Jones v. Lynda, 7 Paige, 301, 4 L. ed. 165.

And directors of a prison having power under Ohio Act of April 23, 1854, section 14, to hire out convicts in such manner as in their judgment will best conserve the interests of the state, who give notice pursuant thereto that they will receive bids for a specified kind of work and that bids will be considered for other work and other kinds of business reserving the right to select such bids as would least conflict with the mechanical interests of the state cannot be compelled by mandamus to accept a bid for the work specified in the notice which was the highest bid. They are at liberty to reject such bid and accept another for a different kind of work. State v. Ohio Penitentiary, 5 Ohio St. 234.

A contract for the employment of from fifty to one hundred convicts for three years with the privilege to the contractor of extending the period to five years is valid, however, under N. Y. Laws 1847, chap. 460, § 77, concerning the labor of convicts in state prisons providing that the notice of the time and place of letting every contract for the labor of convicts shall specify the length of time for which their services are to be let not exceeding five years and the number of convicts to which the contract is limited. Horner v. Wood, 23 N. Y. 360, reversing 15 Barb. 371.

So a contract with the warden of a prison for the labor of prisoners need not be in writing under Mass. Stat. 1827, chap. 113, providing that all contracts on account of the state prison shall be made with the warden and when approved by the

I think the validity of Ordinance No. 91 of the city of Topeka, approved May 12, 1870, may be sustained upon two different lines of decisions, either of which is amply sufficient for its support. The ordinance authorizes persons committed to the city prison for the nonpayment of fines or penalties to be employed by the city marshal at labor, either on the streets or public work of the city, or in a public or private place, until the fine and costs are paid; a credit of $1 being allowed on the judgment for each day's work performed. This ordinance was passed in conformity to subdivision 27, section 11, chapter 18, Gen. Stat. 1889, conferring general powers upon the mayor and council of the cities of the first class. Paragraph 555,

Gen. Stat. 1889. A similar statute permits confidence men, vagrants, or strolling vagabonds to be set to work. Paragraph 571, Id. Another statute authorizes county commissioners, when they deem it advisable so to do, to put to work prisoners committed to the jails of their respective counties, for failing to pay fines and costs. Paragraphs 2510, 5425, Id. Similar statutes exist in almost every state of the Union.

Article 18 of the Amendments to the United States Constitution, prohibiting "involuntary servitude," is substantially the same as section 6 of the Bill of Rights of the State Constitution. Korstendick was convicted May 1, 1876, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana for contractors shall be binding in law and the approval may be by implication from acts as well as by express vote and need not appear on the inspector's records. Austin v. Foster, 9 Pick. 841.

And one transferring convicts to private individuals and leasing the labor of future convicts purporting to be between the state acting by the commissioners under California Act of March 1, 1855, of the one part and the lessee of the other, is not rendered invalid by the fact that it was signed by the commissioners in their individual names and not with the name of the state. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429.

And one for the hire of a convict reciting the county in the heading, by which the hirer agrees to keep the convict at hard labor "doing any kind of farm work in said county on his premises," sufficiently expresses the kind of labor and the place of performance as required by Ala. Code 1886, § 4597. Fuller v. State, 97 Ala. 27.

So the prohibition of the Alabama statutes against employing convicts upon railroads is an implied condition of a contract hiring them out and need not be expressed in it. Ex parte White, 51 Ala. 80.

Sentences for three separate misdemeanors imposed upon the same day and a contract letting the person convicted to hire for a period covering all the sentences are not rendered illegal by a failure to refer to Ala. Code 1886, § 4588, declaring the order in which the several sentences shall take effect and be operative, and that the labor under the second and third shall commence at the termination of the punishment under the previous conviction. Fuller v. State, supra.

And the omission of the stipulation provided for by Arkansas Act of March 2, 1881, as amended by Act of 1883, page 125, and Acts of 1893, page 206, requiring the contractor to pay the costs of prosecution is not a jurisdictional defect which will render a contract for the hire of prisoners void. Ex parte Adams (Ark.) Dec. 23, 1894.

But a petition for a mandamus to compel the performance of a contract with penitentiary commissioners praying that they be compelled to assign to the relator 200 convicts of the kind and quality called for and specified in the agreement is uncertain and indefinite, not showing the act sought to be coerced where the agreement contains inconsistent provisions with reference thereto. People v. Dulaney, 96 Ill. 593.

A contract for the employment of convict labor cannot be rendered illegal by a statute enacted subsequent to its execution if it was in substantial compliance with the law as it existed at the time it was made, and the legislature has no power to make the opinion of the attorney-general as to the validity of a contract for the employment of convict labor previously made, conclusive upon the contractor. Young v. Beardsley, 11 Paige, 93, 5 L. ed. 63.

c. Hiring by surety.

Some of the states, notably Alabama and Texas, have provided by statute for the hiring of a convict sentenced to pay a fine and costs to one who becomes his surety for their payment, to enable him to work them out imposing penalties for an escape or a breach thereof, or making it a misdemeanor.

Such a statute making it a misdemeanor for a convict to leave or escape from the service of his surety, with whom he has confessed judgment for the fines and costs adjudged against him in consideration of his agreement to serve him and subjecting him to fine and imprisonment therefor does not violate the constitutional prohibition against imprisonment for debt. Lee v. State, 75 Ala. 22.

And infancy is no defense to a prosecution against a convict for breach of contract of service with his surety for the fine and costs imposed upon him. Wynn v. State, 83 Ala. 55.

And a contract by which a convict is hired out for the payment of a fine and costs adjudged against him under which he has performed sufficient labor to discharge them cannot be varied by parol evidence by the hirer on habeas corpus for the release of the convict showing that the hiring was not for the full amount. Ex parte Price, 11 Tex. App. 583.

But a contract by a convict under Ala. Code, § 3882, authorizing one convicted of an offense to enter into a contract of service with his surety for the payment of the fine and costs imposed, and providing penalties for the violation thereof, is void where it includes an obligation for sums other than such fine and costs. Ex parte Davis, 95 Ala. 9.

And advances made to a convict by his surety, though included in the contract of service between them, are not within the purview of Ala. Sess. Acts 1882-83, p. 166, making it a misdemeanor for a convict to leave or escape from the service of his surety, and in such case he cannot be prosecuted criminally for a breach thereof. Smith v. State, 82 Ala. 40; Wynn v. State, supra.

So a contract between a convict and his surety by which they engage in farming on shares under the direction of the surety who furnishes the land and tools and is to apply the convict's share to the repayment of the costs and fines paid by him, and if that is insufficient he is to work with his surety either on reasonable wages or on shares until they are fully paid, does not create the relation of employer and employé between them and a breach thereof by the convict is not a criminal offense under Ala. Crim. Code 1886, § 3882, providing for conspiracy, and sentenced to pay a fine of $2,000, and to be confined for sixteen months in the penitentiary at Moundsville, W. Va. The statute under which he was convicted did not make hard labor a part of the punishment, and labor was not imposed by, or included in, the sentence. After his conviction, Korstendick was confined in the penitentiary at Moundsville, and was compelled by the authorities in charge to perform hard labor. He objected, and commenced his proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States to obtain his discharge by habeas corpus. His contention was that, "where the punishment provided for by the statute is imprisonment alone, a sentence to confinement at a place where hard labor is imposed as a consequence of the imprisonment is in excess of the power conferred." His writ was denied. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion in that case, stated that "as early as 1834 congress enacted that, whenever any criminal convicted of any offense against the United States shall be imprisoned in pursuance of such conviction, or of the sentence thereon, in the prison or penitentiary of any state or territory, such criminal shall, in all respects, be subject to the same discipline and treatment as convicts sentenced by the courts of the state or territory in which such prison or penitentiary is situated," and then observed: "Where the statute requires imprisonment alone, the several provisions which have just been retracts of service between a convict and his surety and imposing a penalty for the breach thereof. Winslow v. State, 59 Ala. 68.

d. Leasing prisons.

Some of the states have provided for the leasing of their prisons together with the labor of the convicts therein confined.

Such a contract is not affected by the subsequent repeal of the act under which it was made. People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11.

And a covenant in a lease of convicts with the prison shops and prison grounds to furnish such shop room and grounds as might be necessary for the use of the convicts leased, made by the inspectors and warden of the prison in excess of their authority, may be ratified by the legislature, but the intent to ratify must plainly appear. Dicta, Reed v. Seymour, 24 Minn. 273.

So an act appropriating money to defray the expenses of a prison, passed after a contract leasing it and the labor of the convicts therein had been transmitted to the senate which provided that no prison should receive any pay for supplies furnished under any contract with the directors of the prison until he surrender such contract and release the state from all liability for such supplies furnished after the leasing of the prison under a designated act, is a legislative recognition of the validity and existence of such contract. People v. Brooks, supra.

Mansf. Ark. Dig., § 1282, placing the management, control, and hiring of county convicts under the jurisdiction of the county courts and authorizing them to let the contract to keep and work them to some suitable person or persons, however, does not give such power to the county judge in vacation, and a contract thus made by the county judge is void. Greer v. Critz, 53 Ark. 247.

And Minn. Laws 1868, chap. 10, authorizing the inspectors and warden of the state prison to lease the prison shops and such vacant ground as the inspectors deem proper and to let to service all able-bodied convicts confined in the prison, empowers them to lease only such shops and grounds as the state possesses at the time of the execution of the lease or during its continuance, and does not authorize a covenant intended to bind the state to furnish all necessary shop room and grounds for the use of the convicts leased. Reed v. Seymour, supra.

But such a covenant in such a lease is void only as to the excess and does not invalidate the whole lease. Ibid.

Wrongs to the state from the mismanagement of a prison in disregard of a contract leasing the same with the labor of the convicts therein are to be redressed by proceeding upon the bond given by the lessee as required by law as security for the performance of the contract. People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11.

e. Assignability of contract.

A contract with the agent of a prison for the services of convicts under N. Y. Laws 1847, chap. 400, is assignable by the contractor, as his position is not quasi official or fiduciary in its character. Horner v. Wood, 23 N. Y. 850.

And a lease of convict labor made pursuant to California Act of March 21, 1856, which prescribes no specific form therefor and contains no restrictions as to the assignment thereof, which is assignable in form, is not forfeited by the assignment thereof and cannot be objected to on that ground when no objection to the form was taken at the time it was made and it had been adopted, approved, and acted upon by both parties, but the liability of the assignor personally and upon his bond is not affected by the assignment. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429.

But an assignee of a contract for the employment of convict labor takes it subject to all the equities that attached to it in the hands of his assignor and must do everything his assignor would have had to do if it had not been assigned to entitle him to a specific performance thereof unless the other party thereto has relinquished his rights as against him. Jones v. Lynde, 7 Paige, 301, 4 L. ed. 165.

So a hirer of convicts who sublets them may recover of his lessee for their services. Mason & Ford Co. v. Main Jellico Mountain Coal Co. 87 Ky. 457.

But Mansf. Ark. Dig., §§ 4861, 4864, 4860, providing for the leasing of the state penitentiary making it the duty of the lessee to feed, clothe, and provide for the convicts and maintain discipline among them, imposing a penalty for failure to perform any of the duties thereby imposed upon him and making no provision for the hiring of convicts to other persons, does not authorize such hiring and convicts held in restraint under an agreement for such hiring will be delivered upon habeas corpus to the custody of the lessee. State v. Neel, 48 Ark. 283.

The assignee of a contract for the labor of a designated number of convicts for a term of years in which it was stipulated that the contractor should have the privilege of a renewal for a further term of years provided he offered as favorable terms as any other responsible person, the assignment of which was assented to by the agent of the prison on condition that the assignee put in proposals under a notice then being published under the provisions of a statute passed subsequent to the execution of the original contract and pay the balance due the state from his assignor, is not entitled to a renewal thereof where his offer over and ferred to place it within the power of the court, at its discretion, to order execution of its sentence at a place where labor is exacted as part of the discipline and treatment of the institution, or not, as it pleases." Ex parte Karstendick, 93 U. S. 896, 23 L. ed. 889. In Ex parte Mills, Petitioner, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. ed. 107, Harlan, J., remarked that "there are offenses against the United States for which the statute, in terms, prescribes punishment by imprisonment at hard labor. There are others the punishment of which is 'imprisonment' simply. But, in cases of the latter class, the sentence of imprisonment, if the imprisonment be for a longer period than one year, may be executed in a state prison or penitentiary, the rules of which prescribe hard labor." Both of these cases fairly decide that persons sentenced to imprisonment only may be subject to hard labor, if the rules of the jail or prison exact of the inmates such discipline and treatment.

Therefore, if it be conceded that hard labor was not imposed in this case, as a punishment, yet, within the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the sentence of imprisonment may be executed in the city prison, the rules of which prescribe hard labor for discipline and treatment. Further, we have industrial and reform schools in the state, where incorrigible girls and boys who disregard the commands of their parents, or resort to immoral places or practices, may be confined. Labor, to a reasonable degree, is above what was due from his assignor was not as advantageous as that of another and the new law does not permit the agent of the prison to make a contract in the terms of that provided for by the renewal agreement. Jones v. Lynda, supra.

1. Custody and management of convicts.

The power of the board of prison directors under the California statute to enter into contract for the employment of prison labor is limited by the requirement of the act creating the board and prescribing its powers and duties and does not extend to any contract which would deprive it in any degree of full and exclusive control of the prisoners, prison labor, grounds, buildings and property. Porter v. Haight, 45 Cal. 631.

And N. Y. Laws 1847, chap. 610, providing for contracts for the employment of convict labor, clearly contemplates that the convicts while laboring under contracts as well as at all other times shall be under the charge of the keepers and the discipline is at all times under the general supervision of the warden, and the discipline of the prison cannot be subordinate to the convenience of the contractor. Horne v. Wood, 23 N. Y. 860.

So the North Carolina statutes authorizing the working of persons convicted of criminal offenses upon the public roads under the supervision of the county authorities do not contravene article 11, section 1, of that state authorizing such employment and the farming out of convict labor provided by the government and discipline of convicts so farmed out shall be under control of a state officer. State v. Weathers, 98 N. C. 685.

And Ala. Special Laws, Sess. Acts 1884-85, p. 709, 1886-87, p. 818, authorizing the county commissioners to hire out the convicts of Jefferson county to the contractor for the working of public roads requiring the employment of all male convicts sentenced to hard labor for the county and authorizing the appointment of a superintendent of public works who is required to inspect and supervise such convicts are not repugnant to and do not supersede the general statute (Code, § 4501) authorizing the state board of inspectors to visit convicts and examine into their treatment and condition and authorizing the governor to annul any contract of hiring on the report. Jefferson County v. Truss, 85 Ala. 486.

So contractors for the labor of prisoners under Mansf. Ark. Dig., § 1223, providing that the contractor may work the prisoners under the same rules and regulations as convicts are worked by the lessees of the state penitentiary, which rules and regulations are prescribed by the board of prison commissioners, cannot inflict corporal punishment by the lash upon them unless such board has prescribed the use of the lash for the discipline of prisoners in the penitentiary. Werner v. State, 44 Ark. 123.

And the manager of the lessee of county convicts cannot of his authority inflict corporal punishment upon a convict for a violation of orders and a refusal to work, notwithstanding Tennessee Act of 1875, chap. 85, authorizing convicts to be hired or leased out giving to the persons hiring them all the rights, powers, and privileges of the superintendent of the workhouse. Cornell v. State, 6 Lea, 624.

So where the court of county commissioners determine on letting to hire as the mode of inflicting punishment of hard labor for the county there must, under Ala. Sess. Acts' 1882-83, § 5, p. 135, 1884-85, § 85, pp. 187, 196, be independent letting of the two classes, persons convicted of offenses involving moral turpitude and those which do not, and the two classes cannot be worked together and should not be let to one hirer, and the one class can be put at labor much more onerous and hazardous than the other. Ex parte Crews, 78 Ala. 457.

One convicted of assault and battery and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor cannot be let to fine under rules adopted for persons convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude and required to work on railroads or in mines, or hired out of the county. Ibid.

But it is not necessary under Ala. Code 1886, § 4658, providing that convicts sentenced for felonies shall not be worked or confined with those who are sentenced for misdemeanors not involving moral turpitude that the order of court letting them to fine should so declare, but the statute operates upon the contract and the manner of its execution by the contractor. Ex parte Buckalew, 84 Ala. 460.

One order and one contract embracing the two classes of convicts is sufficient when the terms as to each class are specified and distinguished. Ex parte White, 81 Ala. 80.

g. Termination of contract.

Neither the warden nor the inspectors of the penitentiary nor both can make a contract for convict labor which will preclude the legislature from adopting a different system which will necessarily interfere therewith, as the right of the legislature to change its policy with reference to the penal system must be taken as implied in the contract. Hancock v. Ewing, 55 Mo. 101.

In entering into a contract for the employment of prison labor the contractor must be held to bargain in view of the rights of the directors acting in behalf of the state, to annul the contract whenever the paramount obligation to execute the powers conferred upon them by the legislation may require it." Porter v. Haight, 45 Cal. 631.

The right of a lessee of the labor of convicts is subordinate to the right of the governor to pardon and thereby discharge the convicts from custody, and to such modifications in the extent of punish-properly exacted from such girls and boys as a part of the discipline and treatment of these institutions. It is not imposed in all such cases as a punishment for crime; yet I do not believe it will be contended that the labor so exacted can be denominated "involuntary servitude," within the meaning of the Constitution. Pub. Doc. 1891-92, vol. 2, "Report of State Board of Charities," pp. 4, 55, 86, 124. Many of the inmates in the deaf and dumb institution are required to work at printing, cabinetmaking, shoemaking, and harnessmaking, and even in the asylum for imbecile youth children are compelled to perform physical labor. Pub. Doc. 1891-92, vol. 2, "Report of State Board of Charities," pp. 4, 5. If the trustees and superintendents of charitable institutions have no authority to compel any boy or girl confined therein to perform labor contrary to his or her will, such a ruling would forbid all reasonable rules for the discipline or good health of the inmates. It is a trite saying that "laziness begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains," and, therefore, it is not favored, either in our reformatory or penal institutions. Of course, all labor imposed as discipline, or as a measure of health, must be reasonable and suitable for the age, the sex, and the condition of the person from whom it is exacted. If not of this character, the courts may interfere and correct any abuse. In the McCort Case, ment as may be made by future legislation. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 426.

So an order of the governor based upon a report of the board of inspectors annulling a contract of hiring of the labor of convicts and directing their removal from the custody of the hirer under Ala. Code 1886, § 4591, is matter of discretion not requiring the judgment of any court, and not subject to review by any judicial tribunal. Jefferson County v. Truss, 85 Ala. 486.

And under the California statute the board of prison directors may terminate a contract for the employment of convict labor whenever in their judgment the proper exercise of the powers conferred upon them require it. Porter v. Haight, supra.

The board acts judicially, in determining whether the circumstances of a particular case require the annulment of such a contract made by them and when the members act without fraud or malice they incur no personal responsibility. Ibid.

So a contract for the labor of prisoners, made by a keeper of the state prison for a term which will continue beyond the term of his official existence, under Nix. New Jersey Dig., 815, § 7, providing that the keeper of the state prison may contract for the labor of the prisoners, is not binding either upon his successor or the state as the statute authorizes any keeper to contract. Trask v. State, 32 N. J. L. 478.

And the courts will not interfere by way of an injunction on behalf of one to whom the warden of the penitentiary leased convicts for a period lasting longer than his official term where the legislature declined to ratify it as to the period beyond his term but adopted a new system inconsistent therewith. Hancock v. Ewing, 55 Mo. 101.

Nor will a contract for the hire of convicts, made by the warden of the penitentiary in his official capacity, containing a stipulation against personal liability which is approved by the governor, be specifically enforced against his successor in office, as the action for that purpose would be essentially a suit against the state. Comer v. Bankhead, 70 Ala. 493.

The warden of the penitentiary is the agent of the state and a contract made by him in his official capacity for the hire of convicts as authorized by law which is approved by the governor is the contract of the state and not of the warden personally, especially when it expressly exempts him from all personal liability thereon. Ibid.

The state cannot have relief from a contract for the leasing of convict labor which has been properly assigned to another by the lessee, however, because some of the covenants of the lease do not bind the assignee; she is entitled to no greater exemption than an individual from the consequences of an unwise contract. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 426.

Nor can she rescind a contract for the leasing of 27 L. R. A.

convict labor for breaches of the covenant of the lease by the lessee and his assignee while she herself is in default in the performance thereof. Ibid.

Or where it has been in part performed and the parties cannot be restored to their original position. Ibid.

So in Bronk v. Riley, 50 Hun. 499, it was held that an injunction would lie to restrain the termination by the commissioners of a penitentiary of a contract by which they employed the plaintiff as manager to oversee and conduct a manufacture carried on therein and leased his machinery therefor at a specified rental for a fixed period where the termination thereof would work irreparable injury.

And in People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, it was held that a state entering into a contract leasing a prison and the labor of the convicts thereon can only resume possession of the prison and control of the convicts by making compensation as is required where private property is taken for public use.

b. Recovery of agreed compensation.

One who hires convicts and receives the benefit of their labor cannot contend that the kind and place of labor were not stated in the contract as required by law, or that he did not give bond, as such requirements were designed for the security of the county and the welfare of the convicts and not for his benefit. Trammell v. Lee County, 94 Ala. 194.

And neither the escape of a convict nor his release by pardon will relieve a person to whom he has been delivered for labor under contract with the county to pay his costs and fine under the Mississippi statute providing therefor, from liability for such costs and fine, as the only ground upon which he is relieved from liability is the death of the convict as provided in Mississippi Code, § 3160. State v. Banks, 66 Miss. 431.

Evidence that some of the convicts escaped is inadmissible in an action against a hirer of convicts for their hire where he has bound himself to pay for the full term of their sentences less the services lost to him by death, making no provision for abatement in case of escape. Trammell v. Lee County, supra.

Contractors for convict labor against whom judgment has been rendered cannot restrain a suit brought for the collection of such judgment on the ground that the contract was not in conformity with law when they have violated the contract by neglecting to pay for the services of the convicts the benefits from which have been received by them the amounts falling due from time to time subsequent to the rendition of the judgment. Young v. Beardsley, 11 Paige, 93, 5 L. ed. 68.

A contract leasing a prison and the labor of the convicts therein for an entire term of five years for the maintenance of which the state was to pay $10,000 per month in consideration of which large claims against the state were relinquished and supra, the prisoner complained because he was not permitted to work for the city, so that his fine might be discharged.

Again, the ordinance may be upheld along the line of those decisions which make imprisonment and hard labor a part of the punishment or penalty, or "the means of enforcing the collection of fines" imposed for the preservation of order and the welfare of society. The statute expressly provides that "it shall be part of the judgment that the defendant stand committed till the judgment be complied with." Paragraph 609, Gen. Stat. 1889; Re McCort, supra; Re Lewis, 81 Kan. 71; Ex parte Bedell, 20 Mo. App. 125; Berry v. Brislan, 86 Ky. 5; State v. Peterson, 88 Minn. 143; Huddleson v. Ruffin, 6

Ohio St. 604; Re Long, 87 Ala. 46; Gady v. State, 88 Ala. 51; Ex parte Sing Ah Tong, 84 Cal. 165; Preston v. Louisville, 84 Ky. 118; Slaughter House Cases, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 68, 21 L. ed. 406; Vanvabry v. Staton, 88 Tenn. 384. In the last case it was stated that "the fine and costs imposed in a misdemeanor case are imposed as punishment. If the prisoner cannot pay or secure them, then he must pay them by his labor in the workhouse, at the rate of twenty-five cents per day, in addition to his jail fees. This is the process of the law for the payment of such fines and costs."

In answer to the suggestion that the sentence of the police judge did not impose or include "confinement at hard labor," and, therefore that it cannot be exacted, the case buildings were erected and other improvements made in entire and incapable of apportionment, and the measure of damages for a breach thereof by the state is the full sum of $10,000 per month including a period during which the lessee and his assignee were forcibly and unlawfully kept out of possession. People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11.

A state may demand compensation from the federal government for entertaining federal convicts in its prisons, although it so employs them as to derive returns from their labor. Opinion U. S. Atty-Gen. Jan. 5, 1887, 8 Op. Atty-Gen. 239.

I. Disposition of proceeds.

Moneys arising from the hire of convicts sentenced to hard labor under the Alabama statute go into the fine and forfeiture fund and not into the general fund of the county. State v. Coleman, 78 Ala. 560.

And under the North Carolina code the proceeds of the labor of a convict must be applied to the payment of the fine and costs adjudged against him. State v. Williams, 97 N. C. 414.

A fund produced by hiring out convicts sentenced for misdemeanors as provided for in Georgia Code, § 4814, however, cannot be applied by the solicitor general to the payment of his insolvent costs without express statutory authority, whether the costs accrued in the particular cases in which the convictions were had or not. Black v. Fite, 88 Ga. 238.

And a solicitor general or attorney at law, who with the consent of the board of county commissioners voluntarily hired out certain misdemeanor convicts, is not entitled to payment out of the hire for his services, either in hiring or collecting the hire. Fite v. Black, 92 Ga. 363.

X. Effect of delay in execution of sentence.

Imprisonment in jail cannot be substituted in the place of a sentence to hard labor, and under such a sentence where the commissioner's court fails for unreasonable time to establish a system of hard labor the convict is entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus. Kirby v. State, 62 Ala. 51; Ex parte King, 82 Ala. 50; Ex parte Crews, 78 Ala. 457.

But a reasonable time depending upon the circumstances of the case must be allowed for the delivery of a person sentenced to hard labor for the county to the proper authority who is to carry out the sentence and the sheriff may confine him in the county jail during such time. Kirby v. State, supra.

What is a reasonable time depends upon the facts of each particular case. Ex parte King, supra.

Thus a convict sentenced to hard labor for the county under the Alabama statute, who is detained in the custody of the sheriff for twenty days because of a failure to provide for his reception, is entitled, where his sentence had not been suspended, to be discharged on habeas corpus though 97 L. R. A.

the time granted him to file his bill of exceptions for appeal had not expired. Ex parte Goucher (Ala.) May 17, 1894.

And a person convicted and sentenced to hard labor for the county who is ordered to be delivered to the commissioner of hard labor within five days after the adjournment of the court, is entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus where no such delivery is made after waiting twelve days after the expiration of the five days before making his application. Ex parte Crews, supra.

So a woman sentenced to hard labor who has a nursing infant and who is rejected on account thereof by a contractor who had hired all convicts capable of performing hard labor, and no steps had been taken for the disposition of persons incapable of performing hard labor, cannot be detained in jail by the sheriff to whom she had been turned over for delivery to the hirer, but is entitled to release on habeas corpus. Ex parte Stewart, 98 Ala. 66.

XI. Discharge because of inability to pay.

Some of the states have provided for the discharge of certain convicts under specified conditions in case of their inability to pay the fines and costs adjudged against them.

Thus where a county has provided no workhouse for the employment of misdemeanor convicts and cannot utilize their labor by any of the means provided for by law, a convict who is unable to pay the fines and costs adjudged against him may demand an opportunity to discharge them by labor as provided for by Tex. Code Crim. Proc., arts. 694, 842, and if no such opportunity is tendered he is entitled to his discharge without payment. Ex parte Stubblefield, 1 Tex. App. 757.

But he is entitled to discharge under Tex. Code Crim. Proc., art. 816, only where there is no workhouse or farm or public improvement upon which he can be put to work and the county authorities fail to hire him out. Ex parte Bogle, 20 Tex. App. 127.

So a misdemeanor convict who is also imprisoned on a charge of felony cannot obtain his discharge under Tex. Code Crim. Proc., art. 816, providing that a misdemeanor convict may work out the fine and costs adjudged against him and obtain his discharge after making the prescribed affidavit of insolvency. Ex parte Godfrey, 11 Tex. App. 34.

So in North Carolina a prisoner held for nonpayment of a fine and costs is not deprived of his right to obtain a discharge by showing that he is unable to pay, as provided in N. C. Code, § 2907, by the fact that a workhouse has been established by the county commissioners. State v. Williams, 97 N. C. 414.

Texas Act of August 21, 1876, providing for the employment and hiring of county convicts, does not repeal Tex. Code Crim. Proc., arts. 694, 842, proof Holland v. State, 23 Fla. 128, is directly in point. The syllabus of that case reads: "A statute authorizing the county commissioner to employ at hard labor upon public works all persons imprisoned in the jails of the several counties, under sentence upon conviction of crime or imprisonment for failure to pay fine and costs, is not rendered unconstitutional or made the exercise of a judicial function by the fact that it does not contemplate that its terms shall be pronounced as a part of, or incorporated in the record of, the sentence of the court, or by the fact that they are not so pronounced or incorporated." Mr. Justice Raney, in delivering the opinion, observed: "Whenever any express sentence of imprisonment in the county jail, or any sentence of fine and costs, for the nonpayment of which a prisoner will be confined in the county jail, is rendered, such prisoner becomes as much subject to the enforcement of the provisions of the act in question as if the provisions were set out in the sentence. The judgment of the law is, as a result and legal consequence of the sentence of imprisonment, that he is liable to the provisions stated, if the county commissioners see fit to so employ him, and, as a legal consequence of the sentence of fine and costs, that he will, if he does not pay them, be liable to the enforcement of such provisions upon being put in the county jail. That the legislature can provide that persons who may be so convicted of crime shall be sentenced and made to labor is not denied, and we know of no reason why the legislature cannot provide that a legal sentence shall have, as to offenses committed subsequently to its enactment, a certain legal effect, although the effect is not declared in the body of the sentence." See also Foster v. Territory, 1 Wash. 411; People v. Degnen, 54 Barb. 105, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 87.

In this case the police judge sentenced the defendant to the city prison for the nonpayment of the fines assessed against him. Ordinance No. 91, authorizing prisoners committed to the city prison for nonpayment of fines or penalties to work, was then in force, and a part of the city by-laws. The provisions of this ordinance ought, in my opinion, to be construed in connection with the sentence imposed. The sentence rendered carried with it all the effect which the ordinances of the city then in force gave to it, and the sentence, by its legal effect, made the provisions of the ordinance requiring labor to be performed a part thereof. Both the police judge and the defendant understood, within the provisions of the statute and the ordinances, that the sentence had this effect. In this connection I refer to the following language of Lurton, J., in Durham v. State, 39 Tenn. 723: "The imposition of labor as a means of discipline and a measure of health is neither cruel nor unusual. It viding for the discharge of pauper convicts. Ex parte Stubblefield, supra.

And Fla. Act March 7, 1877 (McClell. Dig. §§ 1, 2), authorizing county commissioners to employ persons imprisoned in jail under sentence upon conviction for crime, or for failure to pay fine and costs imposed upon such conviction at labor as therein provided, is not repealed by Fla. Act of May 25, 1898, providing that no person sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding $300 or such fine and costs shall be confined longer than sixty days for the nonpayment thereof, where he is unable to pay. Ex parte Pella, 28 Fla. 67.

XII. Remedy for improper imposition.

Habeas corpus is the proper remedy when a void sentence to imprisonment or hard labor has been imposed. Ex parte McKivett, 55 Ala. 236; Ex parte Pearson, 59 Ala. 654; Ex parte State, 87 Ala. 46; Re Johnson, 46 Fed. Rep. 477.

Thus a sentence to hard labor for a term in excess of that authorized by statute is not merely irregular but void authorizing the discharge of the defendant on habeas corpus. Ex parte State, supra.

And a sentence to confinement at hard labor in the state prison for a period of years is invalid and a ground for the reversal of the judgment of conviction where no period of solitary confinement whatever is fixed as required by Wis. Rev. Stat., chap. 150, § 5. And it is immaterial that the sentence pronounced is milder than that prescribed by law. Fitzgerald v. State, 4 Wis. 395.

So a prisoner sentenced to hard labor in the state prison who upon writ of error obtains a new trial while performing such labor and the contractor or the state retains him in custody after the issue of the mandate ordering the new trial, will, on habeas corpus, either be remanded to the jailor of the county where his cause was tried, or released on bail if the case is bailable. Ex parte Davis, 23 Fla. 56.

And a fine with imprisonment in case of nonpayment, coupled with an unauthorized direction that the prisoner be required to perform labor on the streets or other public works, is a unit and cannot be rescinded on habeas corpus as to the unauthorized portion leaving the remainder to be carried into execution. Ex parte Kelly, 65 Cal. 154.

But see State v. Dick, 10 La. Ann. 461, cited supra, under heading: Necessity of strict compliance, holding that the convict himself cannot take advantage of the improper omission to impose labor.

And in Reddill's Case, 1 Whart. 445, it was held that a person confined in a prison at hard labor who was transferred upon the sale thereof to another prison where he was kept in solitary confinement was not entitled to release on habeas corpus though under the statutes he should have been removed to another prison there to be kept at hard labor, but should be remanded to the latter prison.

And a person imprisoned under sentence to hard labor who upon the sale of the prison is removed to another and there kept without being put to hard labor pending the completion of another prison where he could be punished according to law and his sentence, is not entitled to discharge on habeas corpus, but should be removed to the new penitentiary as soon as it is ready for the reception of convicts. Pember's Case, 1 Whart. 430.

So a sentence, on conviction for burglary, to hard labor for the county for a period in excess of two years, though irregular under Ala. Code, § 4450, providing that a sentence in excess of two years must be to imprisonment in the penitentiary, is not a nullity and does not entitle the prisoner to discharge on habeas corpus. Ex parte Simmons, 62 Ala. 416.

Nor is a failure to incorporate a stipulation binding the contractors to pay the costs in a contract for the employment of persons committed to jail as provided for in the Arkansas statute an irregularity which can be reviewed on habeas corpus. Ex parte Adams (Ark.) Dec. 22, 1894.

And a prisoner who is unlawfully put at hard operates, when rightly regulated, as a mitigation rather than an aggravation of the punishment involved in imprisonment. The prisoner may be disgraced and degraded by his punishment, but he cannot ascribe his degradation to his labor. To a certain degree it compels crime to support itself, and in many ways the power to require convicts to labor is a valuable addition to the forces of law and order." This case is not within the decision of Jaramillo v. Romero, 1 N. M. 190, where compulsory service exacted from a "peon" or a servant for the payment of an ordinary debt to his master is denounced and forbidden. About all decided in Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 29 L. ed. 89, is that a crime punishable by imprisonment under the Constitution and laws of the United States for a term of years at hard labor is an infamous one, and that no person can be lawfully convicted therefor except upon the presentment or indictment of a grand jury.

In conclusion, it is perhaps unnecessary for me to say, in view of what is stated in the principal opinion, that the constitution of the state forbids cruel or unusual punishments, and the courts have ample power to prevent such punishments from being inflicted. In making arrests and in the treatment of prisoners, in or out of city prisons, no police or other officer is justified in using unnecessary harshness or excessive violence. If any policeman, to magnify his office, or to exaggerate his importance, or for any other insufficient reason, transcends his power in this respect, he may be mulcted in damages and also criminally punished, but a person who has been lawfully arrested is bound to submit himself peaceably and go quietly with the officer.

Johnston, J.: I concur in the views expressed by the Chief Justice, and also in all said by Justice Allen, except that part of the opinion which holds that the ordinance authorizing the employment at labor of prisoners committed to the city prison for non-payment of fines to be invalid.

Rehearing denied.

labor and discharged from such unlawful imprisonment on habeas corpus is not thereby discharged from the custody of the sheriff or from lawful imprisonment to which he was sentenced. Re Fil Ki, 80 Cal. 201.

And a sentence to hard labor for the county for a period sufficient to pay all the costs and officers' fees not exceeding a designated rate per day will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of objection in the court below. Hall v. State, 53 Ala. 463; Molntosh v. State, 52 Ala. 355.

Nor will such a sentence to the county jail under Iowa Laws 1870, chap. 69, be set aside on appeal on the ground that that act authorizes imprisonment at hard labor only in case of an able-bodied male over the age of sixteen and under the age of fifty years unless the appellant affirmatively shows that such facts were not made to appear on the trial in the court below. State v. Winstrand, 37 Iowa, 110.

So a sentence to hard labor for the payment of costs for a period longer than that authorized by law may be corrected on appeal from the judgment, and the judgment as corrected may be affirmed where the record shows no other error. Bradley v. State, 69 Ala. 318; Vaughan v. State, 83 Ala. 55.

And in Ex parte Hunter, 16 Fla. 575, it was held that a commitment upon the imposition of a fine directing that the defendant be employed at labor at the county jail not exceeding ninety days under a statute limiting the term of imprisonment to sixty days is not thereby rendered illegal so as to entitle the defendant to a discharge, but so much thereof as authorizes imprisonment for ninety days will be treated as surplusage.

See also Benedict v. State, 12 Wis. 314, set forth supra, under heading: Necessity of strict compliance.

And in Ex parte Adams (Ark.) Dec. 22, 1894, it was held that habeas corpus will not lie to release a 27 L. R. A.

prisoner hired out to the contractor under Ark. Act of March 22, 1881, and amendments thereto on the ground that the hiring was for only ten cents per day, where it does not appear that a more advantageous contract could have been made and he could not, be held under any contract to exceed one day for every fifty cents of fine and costs, although a contract for a greater rate would lessen his term.

In Herrington v. State, 37 Ala. 1, however, it was held that the statutes lodge the power to pass sentence with the trial court and not with the appellate court and on reversal in a criminal case it must be remanded to the trial court for that purpose.

One who is convicted and sent to the penitentiary without authority and there required to perform hard labor by the warden for the benefit of the lessee of the penitentiary, may waive the tort and maintain an action against him for such services as upon an implied assumpsit, but such an action could not be maintained against the warden as he was a party to the confinement and received no benefit from the labor. Patterson v. Prior, 18 Ind. 440, 81 Am. Dec. 367.

And a convict whose services have been farmed out without authority may recover of the hirer the value thereof. Greer v. Critz, 58 Ark. 247.

An assignment of an account for labor performed by a person convicted of an offense over which the court had no jurisdiction under which he was confined in the penitentiary at hard labor is good, and the assignee can recover in an action in his own name against the lessee of the penitentiary as upon an implied contract for work and labor done with his knowledge and at his request, though his assignor was then a prisoner under the control of the warden of the prison. Patterson v. Crawford, 13 Ind. 241.

1. Sole owners of the capital stock of a corporation have not the sole and unconditional ownership of the corporate property within the meaning of an insurance policy, which is void unless they have such ownership.
2. Neither inquiry nor statements before the issue of policies is necessary to the validity of a provision making sole and unconditional ownership essential.
3. One who makes sworn proofs of loss stating that he owned the property in fee simple cannot claim that the insurer is estopped from denying it by continuing to act for a short time on the assumption that the oath was true, after hearing a rumor to the contrary.
4. A mortgage clause declaring that the mortgagee's interest shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor, nor by any change in title or possession without the mortgagee's notice, make a new contract between the insurer and mortgagee which is unaffected by the false statements of the mortgagor as to his title or ownership of the property of which the mortgagee is ignorant, whereby the insurance never became valid as to the mortgagor.

WRITS of error by defendants to review judgments of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska in favor of plaintiffs in actions brought to recover the amounts alleged to be due on policies of fire insurance, in which the National Life Insurance Company claimed an interest as mortgagee of the destroyed property. Reversed as to the property owners.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Mr. A. S. Churchill for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. B. G. Burbank for the property owners.

Messrs. Charles Offutt and James B. Meikle, for the mortgagee:

The policies sued upon were written without any inquiry being made of, or information given by, the Bohns as to the condition of the title to the land on which the insured building stood.

They demanded and accepted the premiums, retained them two years and until after the property was destroyed, delivered the policies without asking any questions or calling attention to the invalidating clauses. By so doing the plaintiffs in error waived all clauses in their policies which provided for their avoidance for any then existing conditions.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Are the sole owners of the capital stock of a corporation, who have procured policies of insurance against fire, running to themselves, in their individual names, upon a building, the title to which was in the corporation, debarred from any recovery on the policies by the provisions therein to the effect that the policies shall be void if the interest of the assured is not the sole and unconditional ownership of the property described, or if that interest is not truly stated to the companies, or in the policies or in the indorsements thereon? If so, is a mortgagee whose interest is insured by the "union mortgage clause" attached to such policies also debarred from any recovery by these provisions of the policies? These are the principal questions presented in these cases. They were raised by separate exceptions to the refusal of the court below to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of either of the plaintiffs in error in any of these cases at the close of the trial, when the evidence established the following undisputed facts:

In 1888 the defendants in error William G. Bohn and Conrad Bohn were the owners in fee simple of the building destroyed, and the lot on which it stood. Mr. Doud, the agent of the plaintiff in error the Syndicate Insurance Company, solicited their insurance, and William G. Bohn, one of the defendants in error, told him that he and Conrad Bohn were the owners of the building, and directed him to insure it in the companies he represented, in their names. Thereupon he issued to them a policy of the Syndicate Insurance Company, for the sum of $5,000, for the term of one year, covering this building, and delivered it to the Bohns. In October, 1888, they mortgaged the insured property to the defendant in error the National Life Insurance Company, for $25,000, and covenanted in the mortgage to keep it insured for that amount for the benefit of the mortgagee. Thereupon the policy of the Syndicate Insurance Company was presented to its agent, and, at the request of the Bohns and the mortgagee, he attached to this policy the union mortgage clause, and delivered it to the mortgagee. That mortgage clause reads as follows:

"It is hereby agreed that any loss or damage that may be ascertained and proved to be due under this policy to the assured shall be held payable for the account of said assured to the National Life Insurance Co., mortgagee or beneficiaries, or its assigns, subject to the following stipulations: (1) It is agreed that this insurance, as to the interests of the above-named mortgagee or beneficiary, or its assigns, only, shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor or owner of the property insured, nor by the occupancy of the premises for purposes more hazardous than are permitted by the terms of this policy, nor by any change in title or possession, whether by legal process, voluntary transfer, or conveyance of the premises, or for nonoccupation of the premises: provided, that the mortgagee or beneficiary shall notify this company of any change of ownership or increase of hazard which shall come to the knowledge of said mortgagee or beneficiary, and shall have permission for such change of ownership or such increased hazard, as shall come to his notice, duly indorsed on this policy: and provided, further, that every increase of hazard not permitted to the mortgagor or owner shall be paid by the mortgagee or beneficiary, on reasonable demand, and after demand made by this company upon and refusal by the mortgagor or owner to pay, according to the established scale of rate; the company reserving the right to cancel the policy at any time on the terms in said policy provided, on giving to the mortgagee ten (10) days' notice of their intention so to do, and after such ten (10) days the policy and this agreement shall be void. The foregoing stipulations, however, shall not be held, under any circumstances, to modify the terms of contribution provided in the printed conditions of this policy, in case of other insurance on the same property; it being expressly understood that this insurance is upon the interest of said mortgagor or owner, or assigns, and that other insurance on the interest of said mortgagor or owner, or assigns, is to contribute according to said conditions. (2) It is also agreed that whenever this company shall pay to the mortgagee or beneficiary any sum for loss under this policy, and shall claim that, as to the mortgagor or owner, no liability therefor existed, it shall at once, and to the extent of such payment, be legally subrogated to all the rights of the party to whom such payment shall be made, under any and all securities held by such party on the property in question, for the payment of said debt. But such subrogation shall be in subordination to the claim of said party for the balance of the debt so secured, or this company may, at its option, pay to said mortgagee or beneficiary the whole of the debt so secured, including such sums as said mortgagee or beneficiary may then have paid for taxes or fire insurance upon the property described in such mortgage or trust deed, pursuant to the terms thereof, with all interest that may have accrued thereon to the date of such payment, and shall thereupon receive from the party to whom such payments shall be made an assignment and transfer of said debt, with all the securities held by said party on the property in question for the payment thereof. If the above-named mortgagee should assign this mortgage, the above agreement shall be binding between said insurance company and the assigns without notice to said insurance company of said assignment."

The original policy of the Syndicate Insurance Company, and the policy here in suit, insured the Bohns against loss or damage by fire to "their four-story brick warehouse . . . situated on tax lot 12, Omaha, Neb., . . . not exceeding the sum insured, nor the interest of the assured therein," and contained the following provisions:

"The assured, by the acceptance of this policy, hereby covenants and agrees (1) that any application, plan, survey, or description referred to in this policy is true, and shall be and form a part of this policy; that no fact material to the risk, or relating to its condition, situation, or ownership, has been concealed; and that the interest of the assured therein has been truly stated to this company. If the interest of the assured be other than the unconditional and sole ownership of the property, or if the building insured stands on leased ground, it must be so expressed in the policy." "This policy shall become void and of no effect (1) by the failure or neglect of the assured to comply with its terms, conditions, and covenants; (2) by the sale or transfer, or any change in the title or possession of the property insured (except in case of succession by reason of death of the assured), whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance."

In May, 1889, the Bohns conveyed the building insured, and the lot on which it stood, by warranty deed, subject to the $25,000 mortgage, to the Bohn Sash & Door Company, a manufacturing corporation, the capital stock of which they owned; but this fact was unknown to all the other parties to these actions until after the fire. About the 1st of September, 1889, Mr. Doud, the agent of the Syndicate Company, inquired of the Bohns whether he should renew the policies he had issued on this building, and they directed him to do so; and thereupon he issued a new policy of the Syndicate Company for the term of one year, and delivered it to the mortgagees. He told the Bohns that he had lost the agency of one of the companies that had issued a policy to them the year before, and that he was not the agent of the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company, but that he proposed to place $2,500 with that company, and they authorized him to do so. He then told the agents of that company that the Bohns owned the building, and directed them to issue in their name a policy of that company, for $2,500, for one year, and to attach the union mortgage clause to it. They did so, and the policy was delivered to the mortgagees. About the 1st of September, 1890, Mr. Doud again inquired of the Bohns if he should renew the policies. They authorized him to do so, and he issued the policy of the Syndicate Company, and procured the issue of the policy of the New Hampshire Company, here in suit. The policy of the plaintiff in error the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company declares that that company insures William G. and Conrad Bohn against loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding $2,500, "on their four-story brick warehouse, situate on tax lot 12, Omaha, Neb.," and provides that, "this entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance, or the subject thereof, or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein." "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple."

The building insured was destroyed by fire May 12, 1891. It was then worth $34,000. The amount of insurance upon it under these and similar policies, payable to the mortgagees under the mortgage clause we have set forth above, was $25,000, but payments had been made upon the mortgage debt until there was only about $21,000 owing upon it. The two policies here in suit contained the usual contribution clause. The mortgagee, the National Life Insurance Company, and the Bohns, brought separate actions upon each of these policies. These actions were consolidated by order of the court, and tried to the same jury. The mortgagee recovered a judgment against each of the plaintiffs in error for such a proportion of the amount owing on the mortgage debt as the amount of its policy bore to the $25,000 insurance, and the Bohns recovered a judgment against each of them for the remainder of the amount of the face of their policies respectively. These are the four judgments before us for review. Can they be sustained? Let us first look at the judgments in favor of the Bohns.

By the provisions of these policies which we have quoted, the Bohns made plain contracts with the insurers that they had truly stated their interest in the property insured, and that if that interest was not the sole and unconditional ownership of that property the policies should be void. At the time these policies were issued, and at the time of the fire, they were neither the sole and unconditional owners of this property, nor had they any legal title to it, or any equitable title that they could convert into a legal title. The legal title was in a corporation, and they were mere stockholders in that corporation. They could not convey or incur the title to this property by their deed or mortgage, nor could the title to it be passed or affected by any sale of their interest in it under judgment and execution against them. Stockholders of a corporation are entitled to a distributive share of its profits while it continues in operation, and, at its dissolution, to a just proportion of the proceeds of the corporate assets remaining, if any, after all the corporate debts are paid, but they are far from being the unconditional owners of the property of the corporation. The title and ownership of such property is vested in the corporation itself,—in an entity as distinct and separate from its stockholders as is any individual trustee from his cestui que trust. The corporation itself can sell, convey, mortgage, and deal with the corporate property as its own, subject only to the restrictions of its charter, while its stockholders can do none of these things. These stockholders were not, therefore, the sole or unconditional owners of the property described in these policies. Riggs v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. 125 N. Y. 7, 10 L. R. A. 684; Plimpton v. Bigelow, 93 N. Y. 593; Van Allen v. The Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 578, 18 L. ed. 229; McCormick v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 66 Cal. 361; Philips v. Knox County Mut. Ins. Co. 20 Ohio, 174, 184.

It is not unworthy of notice here that one of the errors assigned in this record is that the court below excluded evidence of the insolvency of the Bohn Sash & Door Company at the time of the fire. This would have been a fatal error, if it could be conceded that the interest of the Bohns, as stockholders, was insured by these policies. The insurance companies were not liable, in any event, to pay to the Bohns any more than the loss that resulted to their interest from this fire. The extent of that loss was much less if the corporation was insolvent, if the amount of its debts was greater than the value of its assets, and if its stock was consequently worthless, than if the value of its assets exceeded its debts by the par value of its stock, as the court seems to have conclusively presumed.

But we are unable to conclude that the interest of the Bohns, as stockholders of this corporation, was insured by these policies.

These are not cases in which the assured has fully stated the condition of his title at the time the policies issued, and an inadequate or incorrect description of that interest has been made, through some fault or neglect of the agent of the insurance companies. When the policy of the Syndicate Company was issued, in 1888, one of the Bohns informed the agent of the company that they were the owners of the building, and directed him to issue the policies in their names. The policies were so issued and delivered to them. The Syndicate policy then issued contained the same provisions found in that now in suit, and the Bohns must be conclusively presumed to have read and to have assented to the contracts these provisions contained. The order that they gave in 1889 to renew their policies, and to procure a new policy from the New Hampshire Company, without giving any notice of the conveyance of the property they had made, or of any change in their interest or title, was an order to procure the new policy, and to issue the renewals on the faith of the original representation they had made, and on the same terms upon which the original policies were issued. The subsequent order for renewals in 1890 was of like character. These orders were in effect reiterations in 1889 and 1890 of the original statement that they were the owners of the property, and as they gave no notice of their conveyance of it, or of any change in their interest, the agent and the companies were clearly entitled to rely upon that statement.

These contracts are neither novel nor peculiar. Contracts practically identical in legal effect are, and have been for many years, common to nearly all policies upon buildings. Their terms are so familiar to insurers and insured that a policy upon a building, that did not contain some of them would be nearly as unique as a decree of an English court in Norman French in this decade. Nor are they unjust, unreasonable, or unfair contracts. They rest upon a sound policy of the business of insurance,—a policy founded in reason, and in accord with an enlightened public policy; the policy of reducing the moral hazard to which the underwriter is exposed. "Moral hazard," in insurance, is but another name for a pecuniary interest in the insured to permit the property to burn. Statistics, experience, and observation all teach that the moral hazard is least when the pecuniary interest of the insured in the protection of the property against fire is greatest, and that the moral hazard is greatest when the insured may gain most by the burning of the property. Take the case at bar. The property described in these policies that was destroyed by fire was worth $34,000. It was insured for $25,000, payable to a mortgagee whose interest was but $21,000. If the Bohns had been the owners of this property, and had recovered the entire $25,000 insurance, they would have lost $9,000 by the fire. But suppose that the corporation that owned the property was insolvent, as the plaintiffs in error offered to prove, and that the stock of the Bohns was worthless. In that event, if they could recover on all of these policies, they would make a clear profit of $4,000 by the burning of this building, after their mortgage debt was paid. It goes without saying that the moral hazard—the danger that the property would burn—was vastly greater in the latter than in the former case, and the fact that the Bohns were not the owners of the property insured, but were mere stockholders of a corporation that did own it, was very material to this risk. If there could be any doubt of this fact, the evidence in this record is full and undisputed that the risk was greater, and the rate of insurance higher, for the insurance of stockholders against the destruction of corporate property than it was for the insurance of the owners of that property.

It is contended that the contracts in these policies, which exclude the Bohns from insurance under them upon any interest but that of unconditional ownership, are without binding force, because no inquiry respecting their title was made by the companies, and no statement concerning it was made by the Bohns, when these policies were issued. But neither inquiry nor statement before the issue of the policies was requisite to the validity of these contracts. The policies themselves, containing, as they did, the contracts that they should be void if the interest of the assured had not been truly stated to the company, or if it was not truly stated in the policy, or if it was not the sole and unconditional ownership, and a description of it was not indorsed on the policy, were pointed inquiries of the assured whether their interest was the sole and unconditional ownership of the property described, and their silence and acceptance of the policies was the answer. The policies themselves were notice to the Bohns that the companies deemed their interest that of unconditional ownership, that they insured them against loss to that interest only, and that they expressly excluded every other interest from the insurance unless the Bohns immediately notified them that they held a different interest, and caused a true description of it to be written into or indorsed upon the policies. The silent acceptance of the policies by the Bohns closed these contracts, and bound them to the agreement tendered by the policies, that every interest of theirs but that of unconditional ownership was excluded from the promised indemnity. Columbian Ins. Co. of Alexandria v. Lawrence, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 25, 49, 7 L. ed. 335, 344; Waller v. Northern Assur. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 232; Coltins v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 44 Minn. 440; Lasher v. St. Joseph Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 86 N. Y. 423, 427; Weed v. London & L. P. Ins. Co. 116 N. Y. 106, 113; Diffenbaugh v. Union F. Ins. Co. 150 Pa. 270; Fuller v. Phenix Ins. Co. 61 Iowa, 350; Waller v. Northern Assur. Co. 61 Iowa, 101; Mers v. Franklin Ins. Co. 68 Mo. 127, 132; McPettridge v. Phenix Ins. Co. of Brooklyn 84 Wis. 200; Henning v. Western Assur. Co. 77 Iowa, 319; Liberty Ins. Co. of New York v. Boulden, 96 Ala. 508; Pelican Ins. Co. v. Smith, 92 Ala. 428.

Finally it is said that the plaintiffs in error are estopped from enforcing, and have waived, these provisions of the policies, because, after they had heard a rumor that the Bohns had conveyed the property, and after the latter had furnished proofs of loss under the policies, the insurance companies demanded that they should submit to an examination under oath, as provided by the policies, and that they should produce papers, vouchers, and plans and specifications for the building destroyed, and pursuant to these demands the Bohns incurred the expense of employing an attorney to attend such an examination, that was never had. This position is untenable, for two reasons: First, because there is no evidence in this record that would warrant a finding by a jury that when the companies made these demands they knew that the Bohns were not the unconditional owners of the property at the time of the fire, and no estoppel or waiver could arise from any action of theirs in ignorance of that fact; and, second, because in proofs of loss, which were required by the terms of the policies to be verified by the oath of the assured, and which were sworn to April 8, 1891, and were furnished to the companies under the provisions of the policies, the Bohns falsely stated "that the property insured was owned in fee simple by the said William G. Bohn and Conrad Bohn." After such a statement under oath, it does not lie in the mouths of these men to say that the companies are estopped from enforcing these contracts, or that they waived them, because they hesitated for a time to believe that this oath was false, or were induced by it to proceed for a time as though it was true. There was no estoppel or waiver here.

The contracts contained in the provisions of these policies we have been considering were, then, such as it was customary to make in cases like those before us. The Bohns themselves had made such contracts twice, before the policy in suit was issued, with one of the plaintiffs in error, and once with the other. The object of these contracts was one fit to be attained. It was the reduction of the moral hazard in fire insurance, and the consequent reduction of the unnecessary destruction of property. The contracts were fair, plain, and unequivocal. By their very terms, they excluded the Bohns from all insurance under these policies unless they were the sole and unconditional owners of the property they described. They were not the owners of it at all. They had neither the legal title, nor any equitable title that they could convert into a legal title. It is not the province of the court to abrogate, to modify, or to refine away these contracts, nor to make new contracts for the parties; and these contracts, as they stand, form an impregnable defense to the actions against these insurance companies brought by the Bohns. The court should so have instructed the jury.

Our conclusion is that provisions in policies of insurance to the effect that the policies shall be void if the interest of the insured is not the sole and unconditional ownership of the property described in the policies, or if that interest is not truly stated to the companies, or in the policies, or in the indorsements thereon, constitute a complete defense to actions by the sole stockholders of a corporation upon policies issued to themselves, as owners, upon property owned by the corporation.

Let us now turn to the judgments in favor of the mortgagee. Are these provisions of the policies alike fatal to any recovery in its behalf? The plaintiffs in error insist that they are. They say that the only interest insured here is that of the mortgagors; that the mortgage clause simply makes the proceeds of that insurance payable to the mortgagee to the extent of the mortgage debt; that the facts that the balance of the proceeds belong to, and all of these proceeds, if the debt is paid by the mortgagors, revert to, the mortgagors, and the very terms of the first sentence of the mortgage clause, viz., "It is agreed that any loss or damage that may be ascertained and proved to be due under this policy to the assured shall be held payable for the account of the assured to the National Life Insurance Company, mortgagee, or beneficiaries, or its assigns, subject to the following stipulations," limit the mortgagee's right to recover to such amounts as became due or payable to the assured, the Bohns, for damage to their interest in the property; and that inasmuch as they had no interest insured, and no amount ever became due or payable to them, nothing ever became due to the mortgagee. It is not difficult to dispose of this argument. It proves too much. If it were sound, the mortgagee could not recover if, after a valid policy, with the mortgage clause attached, had been delivered to the mortgagee, the mortgagors had conveyed or burned the property or violated any of the material provisions of the policy as to the occupancy or use of the premises. But one of the "following stipulations," to which the first sentence of this mortgage clause is "subject," is that this insurance, as to the interest of the mortgagee only, "shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor or owner of the property insured;" and it is too clear and too well settled to admit of discussion that no act or neglect of the mortgagors, done or permitted after the policies and mortgage clauses were delivered to the mortgagee, although fatal to the mortgagor's recovery, could deprive the uninformed mortgagee of its indemnity. City Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. 123 Mass. 165; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Floyd, 19 Hun, 287; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Olcott, 97 Ill. 439, 455. But the plaintiffs in error say that, although the indemnity of the blameless mortgagee is protected by this contract against any act or neglect of the mortgagors subsequent to the issue of the mortgage clause, yet any prior act or neglect of theirs, which excludes their interest from insurance under the policies, precludes the mortgagee from obtaining any indemnity under this mortgage clause. Before we assent to a construction of this contract so narrow and subtle, it will not be uninstructional to notice the history and purpose of this clause, and the situation of these parties when they made it their contract. We all know that twenty years ago a contract between a mortgagee and an insurance company, like that before us, was novel and rare. At that time the customary method of indemnifying the mortgagee against loss by fire was to indorse upon the policy the words, "Loss, if any, payable to ———, mortgagee, as his interest may appear," or words of similar import. To-day such an indorsement is rare, and a contract similar to the mortgage clause before us is in general use. Why this change? The reason is not far to seek. The old indorsement made the mortgagee a simple appointee of the mortgagor, and put his indemnity at the risk of every act or neglect of the mortgagor that would avoid the original policy in his hands. Baldwin v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 164; Martin v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 38 N. J. L. 140, 20 Am. Rep. 372; State Ins. Co. v. Maackens, Id. 564. Indemnity so precarious, so liable to be destroyed by the ignorance, carelessness, or fraud of the mortgagors, was not satisfactory to the mortgagees; and they proceeded to make contracts with the insurance companies similar to that before us, for the purpose of securing indemnity to their interests that should not be affected by any act or negligence of the mortgagors.

In 1878 one of these contracts came before the court of appeals of the state of New York in Hastings v. Westchester F. Ins. Co., 78 N. Y. 141, 150, 154, for judicial interpretation. It was a mortgage clause attached to an original policy running to the mortgagor, and, so far as the question we are now considering is concerned, the terms of that clause were identical with those contained in the contract before us. It provided that "this insurance, as to the interest of the mortgagee only, shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor or owner of the property insured." The original policy contained a contribution clause to the effect that, if there was any other insurance on the property, whether prior or subsequent to the issue of the policy, the assured should be entitled to no greater proportion of the loss sustained than the sum thereby insured bore to the whole amount of insurance on the property. The mortgage clause contained no such provision. Before either the policy or the mortgage clause was issued, the mortgagor had procured $4,000 insurance on the same property in another company, but neither the insurance company nor the mortgagee was aware of this fact until after the loss. The question presented was whether or not the mortgagee's insurance was reduced, under the contribution clause of the original policy, by the prior insurance obtained by the mortgagor. The court held that it was not; that the mortgage clause constituted a new and independent contract between the mortgagee and the insurance company, and effected a separate insurance of his interest, unaffected by any act or neglect of the mortgagor, of which he was ignorant, whether that act or neglect was prior or subsequent to the issue of the mortgage clause. In 1882, in Meriden Sav. Bank v. Home Mut. F. Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 396, the question arose whether or not a mortgagee, who had made a collateral agreement with the insurance company, similar in terms to the mortgage clause before us, as to all the insurance policies of that company which the mortgagee held, could maintain an action on that agreement, and a policy referred to therein, without joining the mortgagor; and the supreme court of Connecticut held that it could, cited Hastings v. Westchester F. Ins. Co., supra, with approval, and declared that, while they would not then hold that the collateral agreement was a distinct and independent contract of insurance, it was "an agreement relating to an existing policy, by which certain conditions are dispensed with, and certain privileges are secured to the insurers which they would not otherwise have, and the plaintiffs are made a party to the contract of insurance." In 1883, in Davis v. German American Ins. Co., 135 Mass. 251, a case arose in which a mortgagor, whose policies provided that they should become void if the property was sold or transferred, had sold and conveyed the property insured during the term of his policies, and the mortgagees had subsequently entered and taken possession of it for default in the payment of the mortgage debt. The mortgagees knew that the mortgagor had conveyed away the property, and without stating this fact to the insurance company, and upon a statement of their entry for default and possession only, and without paying any additional premiums, they procured indorsements on the policies substantially identical with the mortgage clause in question, with this exception, viz. these indorsements commence with this recital: "Davis, Taylor, and Demmon, the parties to whom this policy is payable in case of loss, being mortgagees, have entered for breach of the conditions of their said mortgage." The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts held that this recital indicated that it was not the intention of the parties to these indorsements to insure the interest of the mortgagees, as such, but to insure to the mortgagees, as owners, the interest the mortgagor originally had, on the supposition that the entry and possession had transferred that interest to the mortgagees in the same way that a sale of the premises by the mortgagor while he owned them, and the assignment of the policies, would have done, and that inasmuch as the mortgagor had no interest in the property, and no insurance upon it, at the time the mortgagees entered and took the possession, the mortgagees obtained none. That court further held that, if the indorsements could be construed as an insurance of the interest of the mortgagees, they were without consideration, and did not bind the insurance company.

We have reviewed the two cases last adverted to at some length, because they are the only cases which treat of this mortgage clause that have been called to our attention by the counsel for the insurance companies in support of his contention, or that are claimed by him to be in conflict with the decision of the New York court of appeals in Hastings v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. supra. As we have seen, these two cases are not in conflict with that decision. The courts that rendered these decisions neither considered nor decided the question presented in the New York case.

On the other hand, the decision in that case has been uniformly cited with approval in every case in which any question concerning the construction of this mortgage clause has arisen, from 1878 to the present time. City Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. 122 Mass. 165; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Floyd, 19 Hun, 287; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Olcott, 97 Ill. 439, 455. And it has lately been followed upon the precise question here at issue by the supreme court of South Dakota in Ormsby v. Phenix Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, 58 N. W. Rep. 301, 302. What, now, was the situation and relation of the parties to this contract in the case at hand when this mortgage clause was issued? During the ten years which followed the announcement of the decision in Hastings v. Westchester F. Ins. Co., supra, the old form of indorsement, "Loss, if any, payable to —, mortgagee, as his interest may appear," gradually disappeared from the face of insurance policies, and this mortgage clause, or a similar contract, took its place. That decision had settled that in New York, at least, such a clause protected the mortgagee against any act or neglect of the mortgagor, whether prior or subsequent to its issue. That decision had been repeatedly approved by courts of high rank, and never disapproved. Under these circumstances, the Bohns, in 1888, mortgaged the building insured, and the lot on which it stood, to the defendant in error the National Life Insurance Company, for $25,000, and, in part consideration for the loan thus procured, covenanted to keep the building insured, for the benefit of the mortgagee, in such companies, and by such a mortgage indemnity clause, as the mortgagee should select. Pursuant to that covenant, the mortgagors did procure and deliver to the mortgagee in October, 1888, policies of insurance, in their own names, to the amount of $25,000, with this union mortgage clause attached, for the benefit of the mortgagees. One of these policies, together with this mortgage clause, was issued by the plaintiff in error the Syndicate Fire Insurance Company. This insurance was valid in its inception. It ceased, however, to insure the mortgagors in May, 1889, because they then conveyed the property insured to the corporation; but, as to the mortgagee, it remained in force until the fall of 1889, when these contracts of indemnity expired by limitation. The mortgagors then procured a renewal policy from the Syndicate Company, and a new policy from the plaintiff in error the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company, for the term of one year, with this mortgage clause attached to each, and delivered them to the mortgagee, and at the end of that year they procured and delivered to the mortgagee the policies and mortgage clauses here in suit. It is true that the Bohns paid the premiums for this insurance, but a promise to pay or indemnify is no less binding when the consideration is paid by a third party than when it comes directly from the payee or the insured. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Olcott, 97 Ill. 439, 454, and cases there cited. The agreement evidenced by this mortgage clause was therefore a valid contract between the mortgagee and the insurance companies, made upon sufficient consideration, for the evident purpose of protecting the indemnity guaranteed to the mortgagee by these companies against destruction by any act or neglect of the mortgagors. Was it that contract that the indemnity of the mortgagee should not be protected against any prior act or negligence of the mortgagors? There is no such restriction in the contract. It provides that the mortgagee's interest shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagors, by any occupancy or vacancy, or by any change of title or possession of the premises, provided that the mortgagee shall notify the insurance company of any change of ownership or increase of hazard that may come to its knowledge, shall have permission therefor indorsed on the policy, and shall pay for it. It provides that when the insurance company pays to the mortgagee any loss under the policy, for which it claims that no liability to the mortgagors existed, it shall be legally subrogated to all the rights of the mortgagee, in subordination to the mortgagee's claim for the balance of its debt, or that it may, at its option, pay the entire debt of the mortgagee, and take an assignment to itself of all the securities. And it finally provides that, if the mortgagee assigns the mortgage, the agreement contained in the mortgage clause shall be binding between the insurance company and the assigns, without notice to the insurance company of the assignment. What after terms could be chosen to effect a separate insurance on the interest of the mortgagee, to free that insurance from any possible influence of any act or neglect of the mortgagor, and to make it dependent solely on the course of action of the mortgagee and the insurance company? None occur to us. And these terms are found in a contract between the mortgagee and the insurance company. They secure to the insurance company certain rights in the contemplated contingency that the mortgagee's contract of insurance may be valid when that of the mortgagor is void, and they expressly provide that this contract shall run with the mortgage. When this mortgage clause was attached to the policies in suit, it had been introduced and generally adopted by insurance companies and mortgagees to secure indemnity to the latter. The purpose of its introduction and adoption had been to protect that indemnity against every act and neglect of the mortgagors, whether prior or subsequent to the issue of the mortgage indemnity clause. Ten years before, the highest judicial tribunal of the state of New York had declared that a mortgage clause which contained these provisions accomplished that purpose, and every court whose attention had been called to the question had approved that decision. Under these circumstances, the mortgagee and the insurance companies in these cases selected a mortgage clause that contained these identical provisions, and made it their contract. The inference is irresistible that they intended to, and that they did thereby, agree that no act or neglect of the mortgagor, unknown to the mortgagee, whether prior or subsequent to the date of this contract, should avoid it. Moreover, these insurance companies cannot now be heard to say that these contracts were void in their inception, as to the interest of the mortgagee. They tendered to this mortgagee their own policies running to third parties, and their contracts with the mortgagee that these policies should not be invalidated by any act or neglect of those parties. The policies had been issued by themselves, and any third party had the right to rely upon their statement as to the validity of their own policies. The policies certainly could not be invalidated unless they were then valid, and the tender of them to this mortgagee as contracts of insurance of its interest as mortgagee, with promises that they should not be invalidated, was a clear representation to the latter that those policies were then valid. The mortgagee undoubtedly relied upon this representation, and on the faith of it accepted the policies and the mortgage clauses as binding agreements of indemnity. If the insurance companies had notified this mortgagee at any time before the loss that the original policies were or might have been invalid at the inception of the contracts between them, the latter would undoubtedly have surrendered the contracts, and sought insurance elsewhere. They waited until the loss had occurred, and it is now too late for them to retract their representations. They are estopped to deny the truth of their statement, to the manifest injury of the mortgagee.

Our conclusion is that the effect of the union mortgage clause, when attached to a policy of insurance running to the mortgagor, is to make a new and separate contract between the mortgagee and the insurance company, and to effect a separate insurance of the interest of the mortgagee, dependent for its validity solely upon the course of action of the insurance company and the mortgagee, and unaffected by any act or neglect of the mortgagor, of which the mortgagee is ignorant, whether such act or neglect was done or permitted prior or subsequent to the issue of the mortgage clause.

In view of this conclusion, a careful examination of the records discloses no prejudicial error in the trial of the cases between the mortgagees and the insurance companies, and the judgments in those cases must be affirmed.

The two judgments in favor of William G. Bohn and Conrad Bohn against the plaintiffs in error, respectively, must be reversed, and the cases remanded, with directions to award a new trial, and it is so ordered.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,
Plf. in Err.,

CALL PUBLISHING CO.

(.....Feb.....)

1. A telegraph company is a public carrier of intelligence, with rights and duties analogous to those of a public carrier of goods or passengers.
2. Section 7, article 11, of our Constitution limits the legislature in the regulation of telegraph companies to the correction of abuses and prevention of unjust discrimination.
3. Not all discrimination in rates is unjust. In order to constitute an unjust discrimination, there must be a difference in rates under substantially similar conditions as to service.
4. Chapter 89a, Comp. Stat., regulating telegraph companies, prohibits—First, all partiality or discrimination between patrons in the handling of business; second, all partiality or discrimination in rates for similar services; third, partiality or discrimination as to terms of payment or delivery; and, fourth, all discrimination in favor of persons transmitting dispatches to the greater distance.
5. In so far as the act referred to forbids unjust discrimination, and disregarding the penalties imposed by the act, it merely declares principles recognized by the common law.
6. Either under the common law or the statute, a telegraph company must charge for its services no more than a reasonable rate; under like conditions it must render its service to all patrons on equal terms; and it must not so discriminate in its rates to different patrons as to give one an undue preference over another.
7. It is not an undue preference to make to one patron a less rate than to another, where there exist differences in conditions affecting the expense or difficulty of performing the service which fairly justify a difference in rates.
8. Where it is shown that a difference in rates exists, but that there is also a substantial difference in conditions affecting the difficulty or expense of performing the service, no cause of action arises without evidence to show that the difference in rates is disproportionate to the difference in conditions. A jury cannot be permitted to find such disproportion without evidence.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back charges paid by plaintiff to defendant for the transmission of telegraph messages, which were alleged to have been an illegal discrimination against it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. D. Estabrook and John H. Ames, for plaintiff in error:

An individual cannot make a discrimination in rates a foundation for an action in damages, unless he can show that in some way it has been made at his own expense, or, in other words, tends to create a monopoly in the favored party or parties.

Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 192, 43 Fed. Rep. 87; Nicholson v. Railway Co. Nev. & McN. 47; Hosier v. Railway Co. Id. 80; Bayles v. Kansas Pac. R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 480, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 643, 18 Colo. 181; McNees v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 22 Mo. App. 224; Hays v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 309; Seo-field v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Pensacola & P. R. Co. 16 Fla. 623, 26 Am. Rep. 731.

By the act of congress the regulation of the rates of compensation and tolls for the transmission of dispatches over the lines of the plaintiff in error is withdrawn from state jurisdiction, and as this action is an attempt at such regulation, it should for that reason be dismissed.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:

The Call Publishing Company is a corporation publishing a daily newspaper in the city of Lincoln. It brought this suit against the Western Union Telegraph Company, alleging that since July 1, 1888, it had been receiving from the telegraph company the dispatches of the Associated Press collected by that organization at Chicago and transmitted daily from Chicago to Lincoln, as well as to other cities; that there existed between the Associated Press and the telegraph company a contract which prevented the Call Company from procuring its news otherwise than over the lines of the telegraph company; that during said period the telegraph company had charged and collected from the Call Company $75 per month for transmitting such dispatches, nor exceeding 1,500 words each day; that the State Journal Company published in the city of Lincoln a daily newspaper, which had been during the whole of such period, and prior thereto, receiving the same dispatches; that during the whole of said period the telegraph company unjustly discriminated in favor of the State Journal Company, and against the Call Company, and gave to the State Journal Company an undue advantage, in that it charged the State Journal Company for the same, like, and contemporaneous services as were rendered to the Call Company only the sum of $1.50 per 100 words daily per month; that the amount charged and collected by the telegraph company from the Call Company was excessive and unjust to the amount of the excess of the charge to it over that to the State Journal Company; that, immediately upon discovering such discrimination, the Call Company demanded repayment of such excess, which was refused. Damages were alleged on this account in the sum of $1,962, for which judgment was prayed. The telegraph company admitted the charges made to the Call Company, and admitted that it charged the State Journal Company for its dispatches $125 per month, but denied that it had given the State Journal Company any undue advantage, or that it had unjustly discriminated in favor of the State Journal Company. It further alleged that the Call Company published an evening paper, and received over the telegraph company's lines dispatches not exceeding 1,500 words per day, all transmitted and delivered in the daytime, and that this charge was fair and reasonable, and was no greater than was charged other persons for similar services. It further alleged that it had accepted the provisions of the act of congress of 1888 in regard to telegraph companies, and pleaded that the subject-matter of the action was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts; and it further pleaded that it at all times had been ready to transmit all dispatches with impartiality in the order in which they were received, and had ever been willing to offer the same and equal facilities to the plaintiff and all publishers of newspapers, and to furnish dispatches for publication to all newspapers on the same conditions as to payment and delivery. The reply was a general denial. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $975, upon which judgment was rendered, and the telegraph company prosecutes error. The errors assigned relate to the instructions given and refused, and to the sufficiency of the evidence. The assignments of error in regard to the instructions group themselves in the same manner as in the case of Hiatt v. Kinkaid, 40 Neb. 178. One assignment is directed against the instructions given by the court en masse. Another is directed against those asked by the telegraph company and refused. Some of those given by the court were manifestly correct, and at least one asked by the telegraph company was substantially covered by the court's charge. These assignments must therefore be overruled, and we are remitted, in an examination of the case, to a consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence.

The evidence shows, without substantial conflict, that prior to July, 1888, a newspaper had been published in the city of Lincoln known as the "State Democrat." This paper had acquired what is styled a "franchise" in the Northwestern Associated Press, and had been receiving the dispatches of that organization, paying to the Associated Press $20, per month therefor, and paying to the telegraph company for transmitting and delivering the dispatches $75 per month for a maximum of 1,400 words per day. The manner in which this contract was brought about was that Mr. Calhoun, the proprietor of the State Democrat, negotiated with the manager of the press association for procuring its news, and was by the manager informed that he should first make terms with the telegraph company for transmitting the messages. Negotiations were entered into between Mr. Calhoun and the telegraph company, resulting in an offer by the telegraph company to transmit 1,400 words per day for $75 per month, and this offer was accepted by Mr. Calhoun. About July 1, 1888, Mr. Calhoun sold his paper to the Call Company, and assigned to that company the franchise which he had acquired in the Northwestern Associated Press. No new contract is disclosed between the Call Company and the telegraph company, but the telegraph company continued to deliver and the Call to receive the dispatches in the same manner as they had been transmitted and received to and by the Democrat before sale, and the Call Company paid the rate of $75 per month. The paper published by the Call Company was an evening paper, published between 8 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The State Journal Company published a morning paper. It was also a member of the Associated Press, and received over the wires of the telegraph company dispatches not to exceed 5,600 words a day, for which it paid, during this period, the sum of $125 per month. It also was a member of the United Press, another association for the collection of news, and received through that association, over the wires of the Postal Telegraph Company, from 7,500 to 8,000 words per day, for which it paid to the Postal Company $200. The Associated Press transmits its news in two groups, called "reports." The day report is transmitted between 11 A. M. and about 2:30 P. M., and is for the especial benefit of evening papers. It is this report which the Call Company received. The night report is usually transmitted at night, and generally between 7 P. M. and 8 A. M., and is for the especial benefit of morning papers. The Journal Company's contract strictly included only the night report, but for many years it has in fact received both day and night reports. Prior to the acquisition by the Democrat of its franchise in the Associated Press, the day report to the Journal was relayed at Omaha, whence it was usually transmitted to Lincoln by wire, but sometimes by mail. The Journal Company sent to the office of the telegraph company for this report, and usually obtained it, about 4 P. M. After the Democrat's acquisition of the franchise, the day report was transmitted from Chicago directly, except when the weather or other influences required a relay at Omaha. It was sent in time for use by the afternoon paper, was committed to writing on manifold paper, one copy delivered to the Democrat, and, after its sale, to the Call, and the other to the Journal. The Journal was not permitted to use this report until after it had been published in the Call. It was also shown that in order to be of any service to the Call the day report must be delivered to it not later than 8 o'clock in the afternoon, while the night report to the Journal might be transmitted at any time prior to about 8 o'clock in the morning. Prior to the contract between the Democrat and the telegraph company for the day report, the telegraph company used but one wire between Omaha and Lincoln. In order to promptly transmit the day report to the Democrat, the telegraph company was required to erect another wire, and employ an additional operator at Lincoln. Neither this wire nor this operator was employed exclusively for transmitting the report. Other business between the two cities demanded additional facilities, and this wire and this operator, when not engaged in transmitting the press report, were used for commercial business. But the necessity of transmitting this report was one of the elements, and evidently a large one, in requiring the telegraph company to so increase its facilities. During the hours within which the day report must be transmitted, the facilities of the telegraph company are taxed with a great burden of commercial business, and during those hours certain wires are leased to individuals to accommodate their business. After 4 o'clock in the afternoon these leased wires are free, and can be used by the telegraph company for other purposes. During the night, when the night report is transmitted, not only are these leased wires free for use by the telegraph company, but there is not the same pressure of commercial business generally, and it is the established usage of telegraph companies, on account of these circumstances, to transmit messages during the night at less rates than in the daytime. There is also evidence tending to show that there were more morning papers to divide the aggregate cost of transmitting the night report than there were evening papers to divide the aggregate cost of transmitting the day report. There was some question made as to whether or not the Call and the Journal were in any sense competitors in such a way that either could be affected by the relative rates charged. On this point we have no doubt that a state of competition was shown. One was a morning paper, the other an evening paper, and the same persons frequently buy or subscribe to both. It was shown that the advertising rates of a newspaper depend chiefly upon its circulation, and that its circulation depends largely upon its ability to supply the news to its patrons; that a paper with good facilities for obtaining and publishing the news will, other things being equal, exceed in circulation a paper with poorer facilities, and that these influences operate, as between newspapers having the same field of circulation, although one be published in the morning and the other in the evening. Indeed, it would hardly require evidence to establish such patent fact.

From the foregoing statement of the evidence it will be seen that the following propositions were established: First. That the actual rate charged to the Call was much greater than the actual rate charged to the Journal. Second. That the two papers were in such sense competitors that if one, for a given sum, could not obtain the same news facilities as the other for the same sum, the difference would operate to the disadvantage of the former. Third. That from the requirements of the two papers, based upon their respective hours of publication, there was a marked and substantial difference in conditions affecting the convenience and expense of the telegraph company in transmitting to each its dispatches. Fourth. That there was no evidence of any character showing to what extent this difference in conditions affected the telegraph company; there was no evidence tending to show that the charge to the Call Company was in itself unreasonably high, that the charge to the Journal Company was unreasonably low, or that the charge to either was greater or less than the ordinary or reasonable charge to others for similar services. It follows, therefore, that the verdict was sustained by the evidence if, as a matter of law, it was sufficient to show either that another person was obtaining dispatches for a less sum than the plaintiff, without regard to differences in conditions, or if it was sufficient to show a difference in rate accompanied by a difference in conditions, leaving to the jury, without other evidence, the duty of comparing the difference in rates with the difference in conditions, and determining without other aid whether or not the difference in rates was disproportionate to the difference in conditions. But the verdict was not sustained by the evidence if a mere difference in rates, without regard to conditions, was insufficient to ground a right of action, or a difference both in rates and conditions being shown, it was also necessary to establish by evidence that these differences were disproportionate.

The action was evidently begun under section 8, chap. 89a, Comp. Stat., providing that: "It shall be unlawful for any telegraph company, association or organization, engaged in the business of forwarding dispatches by telegraph, to demand, collect, or receive from any publisher or proprietor of a newspaper any greater sum for a given service than it demands, charges or collects from the publisher or proprietor of any other newspaper for a like service, . . . and . . . such telegraph company or association shall be liable for all damages sustained by the person or parties in consequence of such discrimination." Our constitution contains an express grant of authority to legislate upon this subject. Article 11, section 7, of the Constitution is as follows: "The legislature shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in all charges of express, telegraph, and railroad companies in this state, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises." In the absence of such a provision in a state constitution, there could be little doubt of the power of the legislature in the premises. But "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," and, the constitution containing this express grant of power, the provision quoted must be taken as establishing the limits of legislative authority upon this subject. We refer to the constitutional provision because it simply grants the right to prevent by legislation "unjust discrimination." This phrase has been frequently used by the courts and legislatures, and has obtained a well-settled construction. It is not every discrimination which is unjust. So many cases illustrate this principle that it would be difficult to collate them. But the general nature of the decisions may be readily seen from an examination of the note to Root v. Long Island R. Co., 11 Am. St. Rep. 643, 114 N. Y. 800, 4 L. R. A. 331, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 576. In construing our statute it is necessary to bear in mind the constitutional limitation quoted, and the statute bears a just and reasonable construction within that limitation. It provides in its fifth section that all telegraph companies shall transmit all dispatches with impartiality in the order in which they are received, and use due diligence in their delivery, without discrimination as to any person or party to whom they may be directed. This section evidently refers to the duty of the telegraph company as to the mode of conducting its business, and not to the charges therefor, and forbids partiality or discrimination in the transmission of messages. Section 7 is very similar in its terms to what is known as "the long and short haul clause" of the interstate commerce act, and forbids the charging of a greater sum for the transmission of a message over a given distance than it charges for a similar message over a greater distance, but adds this significant proviso: "That dispatches transmitted during the night and dispatches for publication in newspapers may be forwarded and delivered at reduced rates; such rates must, however, be uniform to all patrons for the same service." Section 8 we have already quoted, so far as it is material. Section 9 provides that: "Every telegraph company and every press association engaged in the transmission, collection, distribution or publication of dispatches shall afford the same and equal facilities to all publishers of newspapers, and furnish the dispatches, collected by them for publication in any given locality, to all newspapers there published, on the same conditions as to payment and delivery." An analysis of these provisions discloses that the legislature sought, by the act referred to, to prohibit—first, all partiality or discrimination between patrons in the handling of business; second, all partiality or discrimination in regard to rates for similar services; third, all such partiality or discrimination as to terms of payment or delivery; and, fourth, all discrimination in favor of persons transmitting dispatches to the greater distance. Without violence to the language of the act, and without giving it an interpretation beyond the constitutional grant of power, it cannot be construed so as to require a telegraph company to transmit messages to two patrons under different conditions at the same rate. So interpreted, we do not think that the act, in so far as it affects civil actions, and disregarding the penalties it imposes, is anything more than declaratory of the common law. In the present state of civilization it would be idle to assert that a telegraph company is not charged with a public function. The telegraph company in this case does not so assert. It is now the established law that a telegraph company is a public carrier of intelligence, with rights and duties analogous to those of a public carrier of goods or passengers. The law regulating the duties of railroads and other carriers is, therefore, largely applicable to telegraph companies. The act of congress known as the "Interstate Commerce Act" contains few new features, and was chiefly designed to carry into statutes of the United States (the United States, as such, not having any common law) the principles of the common law already enforced by the states in their domestic affairs. England and many of the states have adopted similar statutes, not so much to ingraft new principles upon the law as to make certain and more readily enforce principles already established.

It is argued by the telegraph company that no cause of action can be predicated upon the mere fact that another patron obtained services for a lesser rate, unless it be shown that the rate charged the complainant is in itself unreasonable and excessive. There are cases to this effect, but we cannot lend our assent either to their reasoning or to their conclusion. On the contrary, we believe the true rule to be that rates must not only be reasonable in themselves, but must be relatively reasonable; that is, that a person or corporation engaged in public business, and obligated to render its services to all persons having occasion to avail themselves thereof, is bound in fixing its rates to observe two rules: First, its rates must be reasonable; and, second, it must not, without a just and reasonable ground for discrimination, render to one patron services at a less rate than it renders to another, where such discrimination operates to the disadvantage of that other. Boards of Trade Union v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 1 I. C. R. 215, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 608; Hays v. Pennsylvania Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 809; Scotfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 43 Ohio St. 571, 54 Am. Rep. 846; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 67 Ill. 11, 16 Am. Rep. 599; Indianapolis, D. & S. R. Co. v. Ervin, 118 Ill. 250; Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 86 N. J. L. 407, 13 Am. Rep. 457; State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 55, 57 Am. Rep. 543; McDuffee v. Portland & R. Railroad, 52 N. H. 480, 13 Am. Rep. 72; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Rust, 58 Tex. 98; Ragan v. Aiken, 9 Lea, 609, 42 Am. Rep. 684. But it is not unjust discrimination—it is not contrary to the common law, and it is not contrary to our statute—to make a difference in rates where the expense or difficulty of performing the services renders such discrimination fair and reasonable. Many of the cases already cited illustrate this principle. In addition thereto there may be cited Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 87, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 192; Bayles v. Kansas Pac. R. Co. 13 Colo. 181, 5 L. R. A. 480, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 648; Root v. Long Island R. Co. supra; Savitz v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 49 Ill. App. 815; Id. 150 Ill. 208. With the general rule announced in the latter cases we concur, but we do not wish to commit ourselves to its application in all of them. Some cases justify a discrimination merely on account of the quantity of business transacted. In the language of Hays v. Pennsylvania Co. and Scofield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., supra, such a discrimination in favor of the patron having the larger business tends to create monopoly, destroy competition, and is contrary to public policy. The same objection can be urged to the giving of privileged rates for the purpose of obtaining the business of a particular patron, and a discrimination on this ground is, we think, very justly condemned by the house of lords in the case of London & N. W. R. Co. v. Evershed, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1029. Many of the cases cited construe statutes, but they were statutes declaring what we think to be common-law rules, so that, whether this case be viewed as one under our statute relating to telegraph companies or one based upon the common law, we think the principles governing it are the same. These are that the telegraph company was bound—First, to charge for services no more than what was reasonable; second, that under like conditions it must render services to all patrons on equal terms; third, that it must not so discriminate in its rates to different patrons as to give one an undue preference over another; but, fourth, it is not an undue preference to make to one patron a less rate than to another when there exist differences in conditions, as to the expense or difficulty of the services rendered, which fairly justify such a difference in rates. As we have already stated, a considerable difference in the absolute rates charged the Call Company and the Journal Company was shown, but there were also shown differences in conditions affecting the expense and difficulty of rendering the services, which, at common law, would justify some difference in rates, and this difference was one which the proviso quoted from the seventh section of our statute expressly recognizes as justifying a discrimination in this state. There was no evidence to show that the rate charged the Call Company was unreasonably high, there was no evidence to show that the rate charged the Journal Company was unreasonably low, there was no evidence to show what difference in rates was demanded or justified by the exigencies of the differences in conditions of service. We do not think that the enforcement of contracts deliberately entered into should be put to the hazard of a mere conjecture by a jury, without evidence upon which to base their verdict. How can it be said that a jury acts upon the evidence, and reaches a verdict solely upon a consideration thereof, when, having established a difference in rates and a difference in conditions, without anything to show how one difference affects the other, or to what extent it is permitted to measure one against the other, and to say that to the extent of $1 or to the extent of $1,000 the difference in rates was disproportionate to the difference in conditions? It may be said that it would be difficult to produce evidence to show to what extent such differences in conditions reasonably affect rates. This may be true, but the answer is that, whatever may be the difficulties of the proof, a verdict must be based upon the proof; and a verdict must be founded upon evidence, and not upon the conjecture of the jury, or its general judgment as to what is fair, without evidence whereon to found such judgment.

The chief justice takes a different view, and thinks there is found in the evidence a basis for the verdict. This conclusion is arrived at by considering the service performed for the Journal, so far as the day report is concerned, as similar in its conditions to that performed for the Call. We agree with him that it is the fair inference for the evidence of the witness Hathaway that the sum of $125 per month paid by the Journal is intended to include compensation for both day and night reports, but we do not think that any basis of comparison is thus formed. The chief justice argued that because the day report is now taken from the wires on manifold paper, and one copy given to the Call and the other to the Journal, the conditions of service as to this report are the same. In this we think there is overlooked the fact that it is only on account of the Call's contract that the telegraph company is required to deliver the report to either paper at the time or in the manner in which it is now delivered. At the risk of some repetition, we shall point out what are conceived to be the differences in the conditions affecting the two papers. Before the Call, or, rather, its predecessor, the Democrat, began to take the report, the day report was delivered to the Journal at the convenience of the telegraph company. The Journal had no contract requiring the delivery of this report at any particular time. This is shown by the testimony both of Mr. Calhoun and of Mr. Horton. The Journal makes use of this day report only to assist it in editing the night report, and did not then have, nor has it now, any use for the day report until evening. Indeed, now that there is an evening paper in Lincoln, for the purposes of the Journal it might wait until the Call appeared, and use the dispatches published in that paper, without depending upon the telegraph company at all. Under the former conditions, therefore, commercial business was given the right of way on the wires, and the day report was transmitted during lulls in the commercial business, without any requirement that it should go to Lincoln before evening. In taking advantage of this right to give commercial business the preference, there was then a delay of several hours at Omaha. According to the testimony on behalf of both parties, the day report is of no use to the Call unless it is all received by 3 o'clock, or within a few minutes thereafter, and this report now has the right of way during the hours of its transmission, as against commercial business.

In order to accommodate this business, the telegraph company was compelled to increase its facilities between Omaha and Lincoln. The evidence is undisputed upon this. Mr. Horton says, in answer to a question as to what the telegraph company did to enable it to make this day report: "I put up an additional wire between Omaha and Lincoln, over the Missouri Pacific Railway. We had to employ an additional operator at Lincoln to take the afternoon reports. A portion of his time, of course, was utilized in other business. Q. What portion of the time was devoted to this exclusively? A. From 11 o'clock to 8:30. Q. How much was his salary per month? A. $60." On cross-examination the same witness was asked whether it was not the growth of commercial business that made it necessary to put in a new wire for this report. His answer was: "That was partly it. Certainly we would not have built a wire on purpose to accommodate one newspaper at $75 a month." From this we think it appears, not that the wire was erected chiefly on account of the commercial business, but that it was the necessity of supplying the day report to the Call which was the immediate cause of erecting the wire. Under the old conditions the Journal paid the same rate which it does now for its report. Those conditions were then, and are now, sufficient for the purposes of the Journal. The fact that it gets the day report on manifold paper as early as the Call is a matter of no consequence to the Journal, as it is not allowed to use the report until after the Call is published. Both Mr. Cox and Mr. Calhoun testify to this. To hold that the conditions are now similar, and that the Journal and Call must have the same rate, would require either that the telegraph company make its rate for the increased service as low as it was for the former service, or else that it increase the rate charged the Journal, although the Journal is in no wise interested in the increase of service. We think, therefore, that the conditions of service which the Call requires and which the Journal requires are so different as to leave no basis for a comparison.

Novval, Ch. J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the conclusion reached by Commissioner Irvine, that there is no evidence in the bill of exceptions to sustain the verdict and judgment. The record shows without controversy that for nearly three years prior to the bringing of this action the Call Company paid the telegraph company the sum of $75 per month for transmitting in the daytime the dispatches or reports of the Associated Press, containing not exceeding 1,500 words each day, and during this period manifold copies of the dispatches were likewise delivered by the telegraph company to the State Journal Company, and the last-named company also, in addition to said day reports, received each night from the Associated Press, over the wires of the telegraph company, dispatches not exceeding 6,600 words; that the State Journal Company paid for transmitting the dispatches received by it during said time the sum of $125 per month, and no more. Whether the last-named sum was paid for both the day and night reports or messages, or for night reports alone, the evidence is conflicting. Mr. C. B. Horton, the assistant superintendent of the telegraph company, in his testimony says no compensation was received for transmitting the day messages, but the sum of $125 was paid for the night dispatches alone; that no charge was made for the day reports, but the same were furnished the State Journal Company without compensation, as a mere gratuity. Mr. J. D. Calhoun testified that the State Journal Company paid $125 for the transmission of both the day and night reports received by it. Mr. H. D. Hathaway, the manager of the State Journal Company, being interrogated, while upon the witness stand, whether anything was paid for the day reports, answered: "No, sir, except, as we paid, it might be included in the whole arrangement." The fair inference to be drawn from the testimony of the last-named witness is that no specified amount was collected for the day reports alone, but that the sum collected—$125 per month—was for both reports. The record discloses that the usual rate charged for night reports or messages is four times less than that paid for sending the day reports of the same number of words. This being true, it is not reasonable to suppose that the State Journal Company would pay $125 per month for the night dispatches merely, when the Call Company was paying $75 per month for the day reports received by it. According to the customary difference between the day and night rates, the State Journal Company, if we adopt as a basis the sum the Call Company was charged for its dispatches, should have paid but $75 per month, had the night reports contained 6,000 words each, instead of paying $125 per month for the transmission of dispatches of 6,500 words each, as is claimed by the telegraph company.

In my views, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for some amount, whether the State Journal Company paid $125 for both the day and night dispatches, or for the night reports alone. If, as contended by the telegraph company, nothing was charged the State Journal Company for the day reports, and the evidence before the jury was sufficient to authorize them in so finding, then it is patent that the plaintiff in error did not render the services to the Call Company on the same terms it did to another patron, but unjustly and unlawfully discriminated in its rates against the defendant in error. The evidence shows that the State Journal Company had been receiving the day reports of the Associated Press for a long time prior to the date the Call Company commenced taking them, and no additional trouble, costs, and expense were incurred by the telegraph company in furnishing the reports to the defendant in error, inasmuch as the day reports were taken off the wires on manifold paper, and one copy thereof was delivered to the State Journal Company and the other copy to the defendant in error. It is true that after the Call Company began taking the dispatches the plaintiff in error put up another wire between Lincoln and Omaha, but the evidence shows that this was done chiefly to provide additional facilities for taking care of the rapid increase of its commercial business. Prior to the time the Democrat, the predecessor of the Call, commenced taking the dispatches, the day reports were usually delivered to the Journal Company about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, which was no later than they are now received. These reports were sometimes forwarded to the Journal Company by mail, but the common practice, as well as the most convenient mode for the telegraph company, was to send them over the wire. Now there is no relay at Omaha, but the day reports are received at Lincoln at the same time as in Omaha; but, so far as the proofs show, the trouble and expense to the telegraph company were not increased by the change, but lessened. That formerly it was under no contract to deliver the day reports at a particular hour is unimportant, inasmuch as the fact remains that there has been no substantial change in the time of delivery since the contract with the publishers of the Democrat was made. Nor is it material that the Call is an evening paper, and the Journal is published in the morning, and that the latter has no use for the day report until late in the afternoon or night. There is a total lack of evidence to show that these facts, or any of them, in the least affected the expense or difficulty of performing the service. It also appears by the testimony of Mr. Cox, one of the proprietors of the Call, and Mr. Calhoun, formerly managing editor of the Journal, that the day dispatches appear regularly and in full in the last-named paper. It is said, however, that the Journal Company, without any extra cost to it, might have taken the dispatches from the Call, instead of depending upon the telegraph company. This could have been done only to the extent the Call uses them. Mr. Cox testifies, and it is undisputed, that the Call did not always contain the full report, or even half of it. Sometimes it is received too late for use in the evening paper. We have not overlooked the fact that the Call contract contains a clause to the effect that the telegraph company should not deliver the day report to any other paper in Lincoln until after the Call goes to press. This provision is of no validity. A telegraph company is a common carrier, and must treat all persons alike. It cannot discriminate against its patrons, or give one paper a monopoly of the Associated Press dispatches. It could no more do that than a railroad company could contract with A. to carry his stock from Lincoln to South Omaha, and provide therein that the stock of B., consigned to the same place of destination, and carried on the same train, shall not be delivered until A's stock has been delivered and sold. Again, the stipulation in the Call contract did not affect the Journal Company, for the reason that the latter had no use for the day report until in the evening. We are convinced that the services rendered the defendant in error, the State Journal Company, as to the day dispatches, were under like conditions as to costs and expense; therefore, upon the testimony of Mr. Horton alone, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The rule is, where a telegraph company charges one person a higher rate than it exacts from another for the transmission of dispatches under like conditions, the difference between the charges is the measure of damages the one who has been discriminated against is entitled to recover. Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 551, 9 L. R. A. 764, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 383; Scotfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 48 Ohio St. 571, 54 Am. Rep. 846; Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Wilson, 183 Ind. 517, 18 L. R. A. 105; Hays v. Pennsylvania Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 809; Samuels v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 57, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 420. The plaintiff below was entitled to a verdict, even though the State Journal Company paid $125 per month for both the day and night reports.

It will be observed that the Call Company was required to pay for the transmission of its dispatches at the rate of $5 per month for each 100 words, while the State Journal was charged for the messages received by it a little over $1.76 per month per 100 words. There is no room for doubt that this difference in rates would constitute an unjust discrimination against the Call Company, for which it would be entitled to recover the difference between the amount paid by it and the more favorable rates granted the State Journal Company, were it not for the fact that all the messages to the two companies were not transmitted by the plaintiff in error under like conditions as to service. What were the differences in conditions which affected the costs or expense of the transmission of the messages? The day reports, as we have already seen, were sent to each of the two patrons under practically similar conditions, and at the same time. As to the day reports, as we have seen, there could be no difference in the costs or expense of the service. The night and day messages or reports were transmitted under conditions materially different. It was shown that such difference in conditions necessarily made the tolls charged for the night reports less than the rates received for the service rendered in transmitting the day messages of the same number of words. I do not agree with my associates that there was no evidence of any character showing to what extent the difference in conditions affected the telegraph company. On the contrary, I am fully persuaded that there is such evidence in the record, and that it shows the difference in the rates charged was not proportionate to the difference in the conditions which affected the expense of performing the service. Mr. C. B. Horton, the witness already mentioned, testified upon this branch of the case as follows: "Q. What, if any, difference is there in the cost of operating or handling news at night and during the day,—what difference in cost and in the convenience? State wherein it is. A. In the daytime, as everybody knows, our wires are loaded with important business,—board of trade grain messages,—and we have wires leased during those hours, and they are filled and occupied. At night we have idle wires, and we utilize them. A lower rate has always been made in the night service. On press reports, it is about one to four,—one of day to four at night? Q. One word at day to four at night? A. Yes, sir. I believe that is the rule in all of our contracts. Q. Whether it is by the word or by the job? A. Yes, sir." The foregoing evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury in finding the difference in rates between the day and night reports. The Call Company should not have been charged more than four times the rates charged for the night messages. The difference between the rates paid and the tolls which should have been charged for service rendered the defendant in error was fully established by the evidence. It paid $5 for each 100 words daily per month, when the rate should have been not exceeding $4.

There was therefore an unjust discrimination of $1 per 100 words per month, which amounted to $15 per month. This sum was overpaid each month for 84 months, making an aggregate of $510, to which should be added interest at 7 per cent on each payment, from the date thereof until the rendition of the judgment in the court below, amounting to $83.80. So, under this view of the case, the Call Company was entitled to a verdict for at least the sum of $593.80, while if, as the telegraph company contends, and there is some evidence in the report tending to show, the Journal Company paid nothing for the day reports, the verdict is none too large. The judgment should be affirmed, or at least it should be allowed to stand upon the defendant in error entering a remittitur for the amount the verdict is in excess of $593.80.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE CO. of Hartford, Conn., Plff. in Err., Samuel M. MELICK, Admr., etc., of Leonard H. Robbins, Deceased.

(65 Fed. Rep. 173.)

1. The cause of death is a question for the jury where one witness testifies that it was a cutting, another that it was tetanus, and the third that it was both.
2. A pistol wound causing tetanus, with great bodily pain and delirium or fever, may be found to be the proximate cause of death where a person insured against accidents, excluding suicide, sane or insane, and intentional injuries, cuts his throat in a period of delirium or state of frenzy which is uncontrollable.
3. Statements made as to the cause of death in proofs of loss are not conclusive, although they have the probative force of solemn admissions under oath against interest.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Charles Offutt, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in not rendering judgment for the insurance company on the "special verdict."

On this policy there could be no judgment for the beneficiary unless the facts found established that the insured did in fact die from an accidental injury.

It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show, from all the evidence, that the death of the insured was the result, not only of external and violent, but of accidental means.

The finding that the "pistol-shot wound was the proximate cause" of death should have been entirely disregarded on the hearing of the motion for judgment.

The finding was a conclusion of law.

The facts otherwise found by the jury clearly show that the pistol-shot wound was not the proximate cause of death.

The evidence shows that the insured committed suicide. The finding that the pistol-shot wound was the "proximate cause" of death was contrary to the evidence.

The test of the duty to direct a verdict is whether the court would be bound to set a verdict aside as against the evidence if rendered against the party in whose favor it was directed.

Messrs. Allen W. Field and Edward P. Holmes for defendant in error.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question in this case is whether or not the court below should have instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in error. The Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford Conn., the plaintiff in error, insured, by its written policy, Dr. Leonard H. Robbins, a physician of Lincoln, Neb., for a term of one year, against death that should result from "bodily injuries effected during the term of this insurance, through external, violent, and accidental means alone, . . . independently of all other causes." The policy provided that: "This insurance does not cover disappearances; nor suicide, sane or insane; . . . nor accident, nor death, . . . resulting wholly or partly . . . from . . . disease or bodily infirmity, hernia, fits, vertigo, sleepwalking, . . . intentional injuries (inflicted by the insured or any other person)."

Samuel M. Melick, the defendant in error, as administrator of the doctor's estate, brought this action on the policy, and recovered a judgment in the court below. In his petition the administrator alleged that the doctor died June 18, 1890, and that his death was caused by an accidental shot wound in his foot, which he inflicted upon himself June 1, 1890. The answer denied this allegation, and alleged that his death was caused by his cutting his own throat with a scalpel, and that it resulted from intentional self-inflicted injury. The reply denied these allegations of the answer.

There was evidence that the doctor accidentally sent a bullet through the fleshy portion of his foot, June 1, 1890; that the wound thus caused became very painful, confined him to his bed, caused a fever, and gradually reduced his strength, until he died, June 18, 1890; that this gunshot wound was just such an injury as would naturally produce tetanus or lockjaw; that the doctor and his physicians feared that disease from the first, and that they used chloral and chloroform to relieve the pain and ward off this disease; that in the early morning of June 18, 1890, while the deceased was alone in his room, he was seized with tetanus; that this disease causes the most excruciating pains that human beings ever suffer; that it is fatal in a vast majority of cases; that it produces spasms or convulsions, and sometimes causes death by a spasm of the larynx, which prevents the passage of air through the trachea to or from the lungs; that the doctor was found dead in his bed, June 18, 1890, with a scalpel in his right hand, and his trachea and both his jugular veins cut; that the tetanus was sufficient to produce the death, and the throat-cutting was sufficient to produce it. The administrator, who was not a physician, stated in his proofs of loss that the insured "took a knife and cut his throat; all evidence shows that the conditions of his mind and his physical condition that prompted the suicide was caused by the shot wound;" and he testified that he thought the loss of blood from the cut produced the death, but he could not say positively. On the other hand, Dr. Shoemaker, who was the attending physician, testified that tetanus was the only cause that he should attribute the death to in this case; and Dr. Hatch, another physician, in answer to an inquiry for his opinion, said: "Well, there was conclusive evidence that the man was in the embrace of tetanic spasms. It is impossible for mortal to tell, and no one but the recording angel will be able to tell. He was in the embrace of tetanic spasms. I think both. I think tetanic spasms and the cut,—the two were present when breath left the body."

Under this state of the evidence, it is assigned as error that the court below refused to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the insurance company; and it is contended that the question whether the shot wound which caused the tetanus, or the throat cutting, was the proximate cause of the death, was a question of law for the court.

In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 474, 476, 24 L. ed. 256, 255, 359. Mr. Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The true rule is that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or of legal knowledge. . . . In the nature of things, there is in every transaction a succession of events, more or less dependent upon those preceding; and it is the province of a jury to look at this succession of events or facts, and ascertain whether they are naturally and probably connected with each other by a continuous sequence, or are dis severed by new and independent agencies, and this must be determined in view of the circumstances existing at the time."

This opinion of the supreme court is a complete answer to the contention of the plaintiff in error here. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 6 C. C. A. 205, 208, 56 Fed. Rep. 988.

It is urged that this question was for the court, and that the court was bound to declare that the cutting was the proximate efficient cause of the death in this case, because the evidence was uncontradicted that the cutting was later in time than the shot wound, and was sufficient to cause the death. This position might be maintained if the cutting was not itself produced by the shot wound, and if the evidence was uncontradicted that the death would not have occurred as soon from the tetanus in the absence of the cutting. But the argument begs the primary question in the case,—whether the cutting was a cause of the death at all. If it neither caused nor hastened the death of the insured, then it was in no sense a cause of it; and, however new or sufficient it may have been to have caused it, it could not relieve the insurance company from a death whose sole cause was the accidental injury. This question was peculiarly one of fact. The insurance company had agreed to pay the promised indemnity for any death that resulted from the accidental shot wound alone. The question was, what did in fact cause the death,—the shot wound, the cutting, or both? Nor would this case be withdrawn from the effect of this rule if the evidence upon this question was undisputed, for the question is always for the jury where a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may fairly differ upon it. It is only when all reasonable men, fairly exercising their judgments, must draw the same conclusion from an admitted state of facts, that it becomes the duty of the court to withdraw a question of fact from the jury. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 417, 36 L. ed. 485, 489; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Jarvi, 10 U. S. App. 439, 450, 451, 3 C. C. A. 433, 437, 438, and 53 Fed. Rep. 65; Northwestern Fuel Co. v. Danielson, 12 U. S. App. 688, 6 C. C. A. 636, 57 Fed. Rep. 915; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Kelley, 10 U. S. App. 537, 644, 3 C. C. A. 539, 593, 53 Fed. Rep. 459; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 10 U. S. App. 640, 644, 4 C. C. A. 454, 456, 54 Fed. Rep. 481.

But the evidence in this case was not undisputed. One witness testified that he thought the cutting was the cause of the death, another that tetanus was, and a third that it was both. It was at least doubtful what answer ought to be given to the question upon the evidence. It was by no means clear that no reasonable man could fairly draw the conclusion that the shot wound, and not the cutting, was the cause of the death; and the request to withdraw the case from the jury was properly denied.

A special verdict was rendered by the jury, and it is assigned as error that the court below rendered judgment thereon for the defendant in error. Before entering upon the discussion of this assignment, let us consider what findings were necessary to sustain the claims of the respective parties to this litigation. The administrator had alleged that the shot wound was the cause of the death, and the burden of proof was upon him to establish that fact. The insurance company had denied this averment, and had alleged that the death was caused by the suicidal throat cutting; and the administrator had denied this allegation. That the death was caused by suicide, or self-inflicted injuries, or resulted from any of the excepted causes named in the policy, was matter of defense, and the burden of proof was upon the insurance company to establish it. Again, where it is doubtful from the facts of a case whether a death was caused by accidental injuries or by the suicidal act of the deceased, a presumption of law arises that the accident, and not the suicidal act, was the cause. Mallory v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 47 N. Y. 52, 7 Am. Rep. 410; Cronkhite v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 75 Wis. 116; Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 667, 32 L. ed. 306, 811.

The only finding, then, requisite to sustain the administrator's case here was that the shot wound caused the death. It was not incumbent upon him to obtain a finding that the cut pleaded by the insurance company did not cause it; that was the necessary legal effect of a finding that the shot wound did cause it, in the absence of any further finding as to the cause of the death. On the other hand, it was necessary to the defenses of the insurance company that it should either prevent a finding that the shot wound was the cause of the death, or procure an affirmative finding that it was caused wholly or partly by a suicidal act or intentional self-inflicted injury. In this state of the case, the court submitted to the jury three findings upon this question, and instructed them to return those which stated the facts as they found them. The three proposed findings were:

"(10) We find that the pistol-shot wound received by the said Leonard H. Robbins, on the 1st day of June, 1890, was an accident, and one insured against in said policy of insurance; and that said pistol-shot wound was the proximate cause of the said Leonard H. Robbins' death, on or about the 18th day of June, 1890."

"(8) We find that on or about the 18th day of June, 1890, after being confined to his bed from the effects of said wound, tetanus or lockjaw had set in, superinduced and caused by said pistol-shot wound; and that the said Leonard H. Robbins, while in a state of frenzy and delirium, and in the agonies of tetanic convulsions, caused by said wound, seized a scalpel, and cut his throat; and that death followed from the two causes combined; but whether or not the said Leonard H. Robbins died from loss of blood resulting from said cut in the throat, or from tetanic convulsions or lockjaw, we, the jury, are unable to determine."

"(18) We find that the wound inflicted by the said deceased with a scalpel was a mortal wound, and that the same caused the death of said Robbins."

It will be seen that the tenth finding was that the shot wound was the cause of the death, the eighth was that the shot wound and the throat cutting together caused the death, and the eighteenth was that the throat cutting alone caused it. The jury returned the tenth finding, and rejected the eighth and eighteenth. In effect they thus found that the pistol-shot wound caused the death, and that the cutting neither caused or assisted to cause it. This was certainly as conclusive of this question as a general verdict for the administrator, and fully authorized the judgment in his favor.

The jury also made the following findings with reference to the cutting of the throat:

"(8) We find that the wound inflicted on the throat of the insured was sufficient to produce death, independent of any and all other causes; and we further find that tetanus, suffered by the insured, superinduced by the pistol-shot wound, was sufficient to produce death, independent of all and any other causes."

"(9) We find that the insured, Leonard H. Robbins, cut his own throat with a scalpel, to end great and excruciating pains which he, the said Robbins, was then suffering from the effects of the pistol-shot wound in his foot."

"(11) We find that the cutting of his throat by Leonard H. Robbins was an act caused by physical pain and suffering, which he was unable to resist or control, resulting from the wound in the foot; whether voluntary or involuntary, we, the jury, are unable to decide."

It is said that the ninth finding—that the insured cut his own throat with a scalpel, to end great and excruciating pains—is a finding of intentional self-destruction, and is a bar to any judgment for the administrator under the clause of the policy which excepts death by suicide. It is a conclusive answer to this proposition that the jury refused to find that the cutting either caused or contributed to the death, and did find that the shot wound caused it; hence whether the cutting was intentional or unintentional becomes immaterial, since it had no part, according to this verdict, in producing the death.

The exception to the action of the court in rendering judgment upon the findings of the jury cannot be sustained.

The objection that the findings of the jury are contrary to the weight of the evidence cannot be considered by this court. In an action at law, this is a court for the correction of the errors of law of the court below only. There was, as we have already held, sufficient evidence to warrant the submission of the question of proximate cause to the jury in this case. The court below submitted no error in weighing this evidence; that duty was performed by the jury, and not by the court; and hence there is no ruling of the court in that regard for us to review, and it is not our province to review and correct the findings of the jury on questions of fact properly submitted to them. Gulf. C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 4 C. C. A. 454, 456, 10 U. S. App. 640, 54 Fed. Rep. 481; Lincoln v. Sun Vapor Street-Light Co. 8 C. C. A. 253, 257, 258, 59 Fed. Rep. 756.

The conclusions we have thus reached upon the evidence and the findings of the jury render it unnecessary to consider in this case the vexed question, exhaustively discussed in the briefs of counsel, whether the throat cutting was suicidal or accidental, with the intent of self-destruction or with the intent to cure or mitigate a mortal malady.

It is assigned as error that the court charged the jury, in effect, that if they found that the pistol-shot wound was an accident, that the wound caused tetanus, great bodily pain, and delirium or fever, and that, while in that state of fever and delirium, the insured cut his own throat, being impelled thereto by the intense agony caused by said wound, which the deceased was unable to resist or overcome, then the shot wound might be considered a proximate cause of this injury; and that if, in a period of delirium or a state of frenzy, uncontrollable because of the great pain and bodily suffering caused by the lockjaw that was produced by the shot wound, he cut his own throat with a scalpel, from the direct effects of which he died, they might, notwithstanding, find that the proximate cause of the death was the pistol-shot wound accidentally received in the foot. If this charge was erroneous, it is difficult to see how the plaintiff in error could have been prejudiced by it, in view of the refusal of the jury to sustain by their findings its defense that the cutting either caused or contributed to cause the death. As, however, the claim is strenuously urged that it must have influenced the jury, we proceed to consider it. The criticism made of this charge was that the pistol-shot wound was too remote from the cutting and the death to be considered as the moving cause of either, and that the court should have told the jury that it must appear from the evidence that the cutting of the deceased's throat was the natural and probable consequence of the shot in the foot, and ought to have been foreseen in the light of attending circumstances, and that it must appear that the death naturally followed from the shot wound, without the intervention of some act of the deceased not reasonably to be expected, before they could find that the shot wound was the proximate cause of the death. The question whether or not the court ought to have given to the jury the general rules of law on the subject of proximate cause embodied in this criticism is not before this court, because the plaintiff in error did not request the court below to give them; they were merely urged arguendo in the exceptions to the charge. The only question here is whether, in the state of the case set forth in this instruction, the pistol-shot wound was so remote from the injury inflicted by the cutting and the death that it could not be found to be their efficient or moving cause. The proximate cause has been so lately defined and the rules for its discovery so fully stated by this court that it is only necessary to refer to Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Elliott, 5 C. C. A. 847, 55 Fed. Rep. 949, 20 L. R. A. 583; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 6 C. C. A. 205, 56 Fed. Rep. 988; and Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Moseley, 6 C. C. A. 641, 57 Fed. Rep. 921, for our views of the law upon this subject. In the last case we said that: "The proximate cause is not always, nor generally, the act or omission nearest in time or place to the effect it produces. In the sequence of events there are often many remote or incidental causes nearer in point of time and place to the effect than the efficient moving cause, and yet subordinate to it, and often themselves influenced, if not produced, by it." Page 925, 57 Fed. Rep. and page 641, 6 C. C. A.

And in Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Elliott, supra, we said: "Obviously, the relations of causes to their effects differ so widely, and are so various, that no fixed line can be drawn, that will in each case divide the proximate from the remote cause. The best that can be done is to carefully apply the rule of law to the circumstances of each case, as it arises." Page 952, 55 Fed. Rep. and page 847, 5 C. C. A. and 20 L. R. A. 585.

The question presented by this instruction is, like most questions involving this doctrine of proximate cause, perplexing and difficult; but after as careful a consideration as we are able to give to the supposed case stated in this instruction, in the light of the authorities and the exhaustive arguments presented by counsel, we are unwilling to say that the wound in the foot might not have been the efficient cause of the death under the facts and circumstances there set forth. It must be borne in mind that the doctrine of proximate cause has a different relation to an action for negligence from that which it bears to a contract to indemnify for the result of a given cause. In the former it measures the liability, while in the latter the contract fixes the extent of the liability. In an action for negligence the liability extends only to the natural and probable consequences of the negligent act. In the case in hand the contract is to indemnify the insured against death that shall result within ninety days from accidental bodily injuries alone. The company was undoubtedly liable under this contract for the death of the insured if that death did in fact result from the accidental shot wound alone. The crucial question was whether or not it did in fact so result, and the doctrine of proximate cause was applicable to this case only to aid in finding a just answer to this question, and not to measure the liability which the contract had fixed.

The authority chiefly relied on to sustain the exception to his instruction is Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070. That was an action for negligence. The plaintiff was injured in a railroad wreck. The complaint alleged that the injury caused phantasms, illusions, and forebodings, which eventually prostrated the reasoning powers of the assured, and caused him to take his own life eight months after the injury. The supreme court declared that the original injury was too remote to be deemed the proximate cause of the death, and that the act of self-destruction was a new intervening cause which must be held responsible for it. But it is far from following from this decision that if the railroad company had contracted to indemnify Mr. Scheffer against a death that resulted from that wreck, and the injury there received had confined him to his bed, had worn and exhausted him with pain, and then caused an agony of delirium and fever that irresistibly impelled him to take his own life only eighteen days after the injury, that court or any court would have declared the injury too remote to be deemed the efficient cause of the death. So, in Streeter v. Western Union Mut. Life & Acc. Soc. of United States, 65 Mich. 199, cited by counsel, where the insured received an injury at the base of his brain from a fall on the sidewalk, complained of pains in his head, changed his demeanor, and after six weeks shot himself at a time when some of the witnesses testified that he was unable to control his physical actions, the court held that the fall was too remote and unconnected with the act of self-destruction to stand as its moving cause. But it is unprofitable to review the cases. In these and other cases cited for plaintiff in error the original negligence or accident is so much further removed, so much more disconnected, from the fatal effect than the shot wound in this case is from the cutting, that they form no criterion for its determination.

In the case in hand the original cause is near in time,—only eighteen days from the fatal effect; while in the Scheffer Case it was eight months, and in the Streeter Case six weeks, from it. In this case the sequence of events is neither unnatural nor improbable, and the chain of causation seems to us unbroken. It was not unnatural nor improbable that the shot wound in the foot should produce great pain and fever. It was not unnatural nor improbable that it should produce tetanus, and that tetanus should produce uncontrollable pain, fever, and delirium. It was neither unnatural nor improbable that a man in the torture of uncontrollable agony and in a delirium or fever should be irresistibly impelled to do himself an injury in an attempt to abate his suffering, or that, if he was a physician, and familiar with the use of a scalpel, near at hand, he should seize and use that to relieve his pain. The universal practice of providing such sufferers with constant attendants, in order to prevent just such accidents, is convincing proof that this was neither an unnatural nor an improbable consequence of the excruciating torture of the lockjaw that the shot wound produced. We are forced to the conclusion that, if the jury found the facts as stated in this instruction, they might well find that the shot wound was the efficient cause which set in motion the train of events that in their natural sequence produced the cutting and the death,—the causa causans without which neither would have been. But it is said that this view is erroneous, because the cutting was a new and sufficient cause of the death, which intervened between the shot wound and the fatal result, and thus became itself its proximate cause. This position is untenable, because in the state of facts set forth in this instruction the cutting was not a new cause, nor a cause independent of the original efficient cause,—the shot wound. It was only an effect of that cause,—an incidental means produced and used by the original moving cause to produce its fatal effect. In the absence of the shot wound the cutting would never have been. That was dependent entirely for its existence and for its effect upon the original accident, and was a mere link in the chain of causation between that and the death. The intervening cause that will prevent a recovery for a death which results from an accidental bodily injury indemnified against by contract must be a new and independent cause, which interrupts the natural sequence of events, turns aside their course, prevents the natural and probable result of the original accidental injury, and produces a different result, that could not reasonably be anticipated. It may not be a mere effect of that injury, produced by it, and dependent upon it for both its existence and its effect. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 6 C. C. A. 205, 56 Fed. Rep. 988, 994; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 475, 24 L. ed. 256, 259. If the jury found that the facts were as they were stated in this instruction, the cutting was neither a new cause nor a cause independent of the shot wound, but a mere effect of it. Therefore, it could not have been the proximate or moving cause of the death.

For the reasons already given in the affirmance of the instruction we have been considering, there was no error in the refusal of the court to give the counter instruction requested by counsel for the plaintiff in error, to the effect that the jury could not find that the wound inflicted by the scalpel was caused by the shot wound, and that, if they found the wound inflicted with the scalpel was a mortal wound, they could not find that the shot wound was a cause of the death.

Complaint is made that the court below refused to give four elaborate instructions upon the burden of proof, requested by counsel for plaintiff in error. But in its charge the court told the jury that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it was necessary for them to find from the evidence that the death of the assured was proximately caused by such an accident as was covered by the terms of the policy; that it was the duty of the defendant in error to establish, by a preponderance of proof, the truth of every affirmative proposition which it was necessary for him to show, in order to justify a recovery; and that they could not base any of their findings upon conjecture. In view of the fact that the court submitted the crucial questions in the case—whether or not the shot wound was the proximate cause of the death, and whether or not the cutting of the throat either caused or contributed to the death—to the jury by special proposed findings on these questions, in accordance with the respective claims of the parties in their pleadings, we are persuaded that there was no error in the refusal of the court to charge more at length upon the burden of proof. The rule of law was fairly stated, and, where this is done in the general charge, there is no error in a refusal to give instructions upon the same subject requested by counsel. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Jarvi, 10 U. S. App. 439, 453, 3 C. C. A. 433, 439, and 58 Fed. Rep. 65; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Washington, 4 U. S. App. 121, 1 C. C. A. 286, and 49 Fed. Rep. 347.

It is assigned as error that the court instructed the jury with reference to the statements in the proof of loss that "the deceased, Leonard H. Robbins, took a knife, and cut his throat. All evidence shows that the condition of his mind and his physical condition, that prompted the suicide, was caused by the shot wound,"—that they were at liberty, in determining the cause of death, to consider this statement of the defendant in error, but that it was not in any manner conclusive upon him; that they should only give to it such weight as they thought it might be entitled to receive; that, whatever cause of death might have been alleged in the proof of death, he was at liberty, on the trial, to show that the death resulted from some other or different cause; and that, in determining the cause of death, they should be governed by all the evidence that had been introduced upon that question. The better rule upon this subject is that statements of this nature in proofs of loss are binding and conclusive upon the party who makes them until, by pleading or otherwise, he gives the insurance company reasonable notice that he was mistaken in his statement, and that he will endeavor to show that the death was the result of a different cause from that stated in his proofs. After the insurance company has received due notice of this fact, the proofs have the probative force of solemn admissions under oath against interest, but they are not conclusive. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 83, 23 L. ed. 793; Keels v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 29 Fed. Rep. 193, 201; McMaster v. Insurance Co. of North America, 55 N. Y. 232, 238, 233, 14 Am. Rep. 339; Parmelee v. Hoffman F. Ins. Co. 54 N. Y. 193. There was nothing in the charge of the court in conflict with this rule. Ample notice of the claim of the defendant in error that the death was not caused by suicide was given in the pleadings, and the proof itself disclosed the claim that the cutting was an effect of the accidental shot wound. The court, it is true, declared that this statement was not in any manner conclusive; but, if it was conclusive, it was conclusive in every manner. The court told the jury that they should only give it such weight as they thought it was entitled to receive; but there was no error in this, for the presumption is that they thought it was entitled to receive its lawful probative force. The fact is that there is no positive error in the charge the court gave here. The real complaint of counsel is that the court did not also charge the jury that the weight which they should give to the statement was that of a solemn admission under oath against interest. Undoubtedly, the court would have so charged if its attention had been called to it, and it had been requested so to do. It was not. The question was not presented to it, and was not ruled upon, and cannot now be successfully urged upon our consideration.

Finally, it is insisted that the court erred in directing the jury to find the special verdict. Upon an examination of the record, however, we discover that no objection to this course of proceeding was made at the trial. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff in error requested the court to submit four special questions to the jury, and his only exceptions relative to this subject were to the refusal of the court to submit his questions, and to the statement of facts in certain of the proposed findings it did submit. The court below, therefore, was not called upon to rule upon this question, and there is no ruling here for us to review.

The judgment below must be affirmed, with costs; and it is so ordered.

rule that where the drawee of a bill of exchange, or the banker upon whom a check has been drawn, pays a check or bill upon which the drawer's signature has been forged, he cannot recover back the amount if the party to whom he paid it was a bona fide holder.

(February 1, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Municipal Court for the City of Min-

NOTE.—Drawee's duty to know signature of drawer.

I. Duty of bank.

a. In general.

b. Negligence or fault of party obtaining payment.

II. Duty of other parties.

1. Duty of bank.

a. In general.

The above case of GERMANIA BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS V. BOUTELL is in accord with the general doctrine though the vigorous dissenting opinion is not without some support. As between the bank and its depositors it is clearly established that a bank paying checks purporting to be drawn by him must know the signature and takes the risk of its forgery and must bear the loss if his subsequent negligence does not shift it upon him. As to this, see note to First Nat. Bank of Birmingham v. Allen (Ala.) ante, 428.

In Bank of St. Albans v. Farmers & Mechanics Bank (1898) 10 Vt. 141, 38 Am. Dec. 188, it was held that a drawee bank which paid a forged check to another bank could not on discovering the forgery about two months afterwards recover back the money. This decision, however, seems to be based on the effect of the delay in discovering the forgery rather than upon the general rule which requires the drawee to know the drawer's signature. The fact that the bank obtaining payment had bought the check of a stranger appeared in the case and although not discussed may have had some weight in preventing the court from basing the decision on the rule that a drawee having paid a forged check cannot recover back the money.

The general rule requiring the drawee to know the drawer's signature is as old as the case of Price v. Neale (1762) 3 Burr. 1264, 1 W. Bl. 390, in which a bona fide holder who took a draft on the faith of an acceptance and obtained payment thereof was held entitled to retain the money. But the doctrine has not been confined to the protection of bona fide holders who have been misled by the drawee or induced by him to purchase the forged instrument.

Thus in the case of Levy v. Bank of the United States (1808) 1 Binn. 27, 4 Dall. 284, it was held that a bank receiving a forged check upon itself and crediting it as a deposit of cash was bound thereby and could be compelled to recognize the depositor's right to the credit although the forgery was discovered the same day. It was further held that a mere promise of the depositor under misconception of his rights when urged to give his check to the bank for the amount on the ground that the check deposited was forged, that if it was forged he would consider it no deposit, was not binding upon him when he did not comply with the demand to refund.

The general doctrine is also asserted in Commercial & Farmers' Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank of Baltimore (1898) 30 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554, where it is held that a drawee which pays a forged check through the clearing house must bear the loss so far as the collecting bank has innocently paid out the proceeds. But its right to the balance of the proceeds remaining in the collecting bank was conceded.

The same doctrine that a drawee bank is bound to know the signature of the drawer of a check and cannot recover from a bank to which it was paid is also decided in First Nat. Bank of Carthage v. Yost (1890) 34 N. Y. S. R. 180, in which the bank obtaining payment had previously bought the checks.

Likewise in Salt Springs Bank v. Syracuse Sav. Inst. (1893) 62 Barb. 101, the drawee's payment of a forged check with a forged acceptance by its cashier was held to throw the loss on the bank, and that it could not recover the money from the payee bank which had cashed it.

neapolis in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount which had been paid by plaintiff upon a forged check brought against it and indorsed by the defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. C. G. Laybourn, for appellant:

The modern doctrine undoubtedly is that where the payee, holder, or presenter of the forged paper has himself been in default, or if he has himself been guilty of negligence prior to that of the drawee bank, or if by any act of his own he has at all contributed to induce the bank's negligence, then he may lose the right to cast his loss upon the bank.

Morse, Banks & Banking, § 466.

If both parties are innocent equally, or both negligent equally, or the holder chiefly negligent, the bank may recover.

2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 466, pp. 744, 776; Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610.

Unless the drawee's mistake as to the signature of the drawer has caused the holder some loss, or the paper has been taken by a bona fide holder subsequently to acceptance by the drawee, the latter should not be held absolutely to a knowledge of his correspondent's signature.

McKleroy v. Southern Bank of Kentucky, 14 La. Ann. 462, 74 Am. Dec. 438.

If the loss can be traced to the fault or negligence of either party, it shall be fixed on him. Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 42.

He through whose means a loss happened, should sustain it, although innocent, rather than he who is not wholly innocent but wholly without the imputation of negligence.

First Nat. Bank of Leavenworth v. Tappan, 6 Kan. 466, 7 Am. Rep. 568.

Where no negligence is imputable to the drawee in failing to detect the forgery, want of notice within the time which ordinarily charges previous parties on negotiable paper is excused provided notice is given to the holder as soon as the forgery is discovered.

City Bank of Houston v. First Nat. Bank of Houston, 45 Tex. 203; Third Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Allen, 59 Mo. 810; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287; National Bank of Commerce v. National Mechanics Bkg. Assn. 55 N. Y. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 282; Lawrence v. American Nat. Bank, 54 N. Y. 433; Turnbull v. Bowyer, 40 N. Y. 456, 100 Am. Dec. 523; Goddard v. Merchants Bank, 4 N. Y. 147.

Where by a settled course of business between the parties, or by a general custom in the place and applicable to the business in which both parties are engaged, the holder takes upon himself the duty to exercise some material precaution to prevent the fraud, and by his negligent failure to perform it has contributed to induce the payee to act upon the paper as genuine, and to advance the money upon it, the drawee shall not be held responsible.

Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 466, p. 477; State Nat. Bank at Keokuk, Iowa v. Freedmen's Sav. & T. Co. 2 Dill. 11.

Money paid by one party to another through a mutual mistake of facts may be recovered

And where a bank had in good faith advanced money on forged checks and collected them of the drawee it was held that the latter must bear the loss, especially where the depositor lived near by and the checks continued to be presented and paid for several months before the forgery was discovered. Deposit Bank of Georgetown v. Fayette Nat. Bank (1890) 7 L. R. A. 849, 90 Ky. 10.

This doctrine is recognized in a peculiar way in First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Northwestern Nat. Bank of Chicago (1894) (Ill.) 26 L. R. A. 289, in which a collecting bank called on by the drawee bank to refund payments made on checks with forged indorsements was estopped to claim that the loss must fall on the drawee because the signature of the drawer also was forged, since the drawee was estopped to set up the forgery of the drawer's signature, and as the estoppel must be mutual the indorser also was precluded from asserting that fact against the drawee.

On payment of a check through a clearing house the rule is modified by reason of the fact that the payment is made without seeing the check and with an understanding that checks not good may be returned within a limited time. In such a case where the drawee bank failed to return a check within the time limited by clearing-house rules but returned it on a subsequent day to the collecting bank, which received it and charged it to another bank not a member of the clearing house for which the collection was made, it was held that the latter could not object if the collecting bank waived the benefit of the clearing-house rule in respect to the time of return and that the ordinary rule as to the effect of payment of checks by the drawee did not apply. Stuyvesant Bank v. National Mechanics Bkg. Assn. (1872) 7 Lans. 197, 37 L. R. A.

But several months after forged checks are paid through the clearing house a drawee cannot get back the money paid by credit at the clearing house; and the other party if forced by the clearing house to allow credit therefor may maintain an action for the amount against the drawee. National Bank of the Commonwealth v. Grocers Nat. Bank (1867) 85 How. Pr. 412, 2 Daly, 289.

A check or bank draft with a forged signature, although it was re-written after erasing a genuine signature and raising the amount, was held altogether a forgery and not a raised or altered instrument within the rule as to payment by the drawee. National Park Bank v. Ninth Nat. Bank (1871) 46 N. Y. 77, reversing 55 Barb. 87, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 120.

The payment by a bank on a forged indorsement of a depositor's name on its cashier's check upon itself, was held binding on the bank and it was denied the right to recover against any indorser, while an indorser voluntarily repaying the money was denied the right to recover of the prior indorser who innocently made a blank indorsement and identified the holder who bore the same name as the payee. People's Nat. Bank v. Westfall (1894) (Colo.) 27 Chicago Legal News, 141.

In Pennsylvania the rule is changed by the Statute of 1849 so that a drawee can recover back money paid on a forgery of the drawer's name. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh (1870) 66 Pa. 426; Corn Exch. Nat. Bank v. National Bank of the Republic (1875) 78 Pa. 233. The above cases are both instances of payment through a clearing house, but the statute was held to permit recovery after the time allowed by clearing-house rules for adjusting errors.

Quite similar to the cases on this subject of the drawee's duty to recognize the drawer's signature is the case which holds that a bank receiving for-back, and that, too, though the payer may have been negligent, unless his negligence has caused a loss to an innocent party.

Lawrence v. American Nat. Bank, 54 N. Y. 435; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 464, p. 768; Hortsmann v. Henshaw, 52 U. S. 11 How. 177, 18 L. ed. 658.

Even the ostensible maker of a note paying innocently upon his own forged signature (having failed to discover the forgery), may sue and recover from the person to whom payment was made.

Carpenter v. Northborough Nat. Bank, 123 Mass. 69; Welch v. Goodwin, 123 Mass. 71, 25 Am. Rep. 24; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 464.

After a party (a drawee bank if you please) has paid out money on a forged paper, it will not be able to recover of the supposed drawer even though he should have pronounced it (after payment), his genuine paper. The supposed drawer is not estopped to deny his assertion, unless the other party has thereby been led to do some act or thing to his injury.

Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 781; Hall v. Huss, 10 Mass. 40.

The transfer of a negotiable check, whether by delivery or indorsement, warrants his title and that it is what it purports to be.

State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick. 533, 28 Am. Dec. 265; National Bank of North America of Boston v. Bangs, 106 Mass. 445, 8 Am. Rep. 849; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 477.

The indorsement of a third party on a check must be absolutely meaningless if it does not signify a guaranty of the genuineness of all prior signatures.

series of its own notes as cash is bound thereby. Bank of United States v. Bank of the State of Georgia (1826) 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 333, 6 L. ed. 384.

And where bank notes were stolen after the cashier had signed them and were then completed by forging the signature of the president, they were held not binding on the bank, although the burden of disproving the president's signature rested on the bank as against a bona fide holder. But mere hesitation in respect to declaring the forgeries which was to obtain knowledge although the forgery was suspected was held not to amount to an adoption. Salem Bank v. Gloucester Bank (1820) 17 Mass. 1, 9 Am. Dec. 111.

Where a sealed package of forged bank notes was received by the cashier away from the bank and outside of banking hours under representations that they were good, it was held that he should have reasonable time to count and examine them. But a delay for fifteen days after counting and placing in the vault before taking any further notice of them, and then merely proposing to examine them without any express disavowal of them, was held fatal, although there was no proof that the other bank could have saved itself from loss if notified earlier. It was held to be not a question for the jury but an unreasonable delay as a matter of law. Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank (1820) 17 Mass. 33.

A bank which pays a draft drawn on its depositor and made payable to the bank when his acceptance has been forged thereon cannot recover back the money. Smith v. Mercer (1815) 6 Taunt. 76, 1 Marsh. 453.

So the payment by a bank of an accepted draft on an insurance company which was one of its depositors, with forged indorsements on the draft, was held invalid as against the insurance company 27 L. R. A.

b. Negligence or fault of party obtaining payment.

The general rule established by the cases in the preceding division has been modified in a few cases in which fault or negligence on the part of the bank obtaining payment, which is held to have contributed to the deception of the drawee, is held ground for compelling repayment of the money to the latter. Thus in People's Bank of Springfield v. Franklin Bank of Clarksville (1899) 6 L. R. A. 724, 86 Tenn. 299, which is an important case on this branch of the subject, it is held that a bank which accepts and cashes a check drawn on a bank in another county to which the signatures of the drawer and payee have both been forged without requiring identification of the person to whom payment is made, or taking any steps to preserve any evidence of his identity, must refund to the drawee bank the money paid on the check when the drawee discovers the forgery.

So it has been said that only when the party receiving the money has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud or to the mistake of fact under which payment is made does the presumption that the drawee knows the maker's signature prevail. National Bank of North America of Boston v. Bangs (1871) 106 Mass. 441, 8 Am. Rep. 849;

A bank "is even more bound" to know such depositor's handwriting, than a drawee is bound to know a drawer's.

Mr. A. Ueland, for Washington Bank, respondent:

The drawee's right to recover is based upon some negligent act or omission of the person to whom the money has been paid, or some breach of duty on his part towards the drawee, which has misled the latter.

Commercial & Farmers Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank of Baltimore, 30 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554.

First Nat. Bank of Danvers v. First Nat. Bank of Salem (1890) 151 Mass. 280.

In National Bank of North America of Boston v. Bangs, supra, a payee who takes a forged check from a person other than the apparent maker of it is held sufficiently put upon inquiry to make him liable to refund money paid by the drawee.

In First Nat. Bank of Danvers v. First Nat. Bank of Salem, supra, a bank cashing a check on another for a stranger without the identification required by custom was held liable to refund to the drawee which paid it. The negligence of the drawee bank in discovering the forgery of the check after payment was held not to prevent recovering back the money from the other bank if the latter had not been prejudiced by the delay.

The earliest case to present this doctrine was Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. (1855) 4 Ohio St. 623, 64 Am. Dec. 610, which held that a drawee bank which paid forged checks without examination when presented by another bank in the same town according to a custom which authorized the examination and return on the same day if not good, but did not discover the forgery for ten days, was held entitled to recover if the other bank contributed to the mistake in payment by negligently taking the check without making the inquiry required by custom as to the validity of the indorsement, and the drawee bank acted in reliance on the presumption that such caution had been exercised.

A bank cashing for a stranger a forged check on another bank relying merely on comparison of the signature with a genuine signature of the supposed maker without any proof of the identity of the payee or any inquiries about him was held liable to refund money received by it from the drawee bank as the drawee had the right to assume that the instrument with the indorsement of the bank which cashed it was genuine. The court said: "After careful examination of the authorities we have no

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover money paid on a forged check. To the complaint the defendants separately demurred, on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. This appeal is from an order sustaining these demurrers. The complaint is very prolix, but the substance of its allegations is as follows: Osborne & Clark, lumber dealers in Minneapolis, were customers of the plaintiff bank, with which they kept a large deposit. They had in their employ a man named Seymour, at a salary of $7 per week, "a man of limited means and small personal resources," which facts were known to Boutell Bros. Boutell Bros. had sold Seymour some goods on credit on the installment plan, upon which there was due an installment of $10. During business hours of April 11th, Seymour went to Boutell Bros.' place of business in Minneapolis, with a check for $457.90, payable to his own order, purporting to be drawn by his employers, Osborne & Clark on plaintiff bank; whereupon Seymour and Boutell Bros. both indorsed the check for the purpose of giving it credit and putting it in circulation, and to enable Seymour to pay the $10, and then went over to the defendant bank, and presented the check thus indorsed (Boutell Bros. identifying Seymour), and requested the bank to cash it, which it did, paying the money to Seymour and Boutell Bros. Al-doubt that a party who pays a forged check does so at his peril, and if by means of his indorsement and use of the same he thereby obtains money from another he is liable for the amount thus received." First Nat. Bank of Orleans v. State Bank of Alma (1888) 22 Neb. 769. This case seems to ignore the rule as to the obligation of the drawee to know the drawer's signature and rests the decision on the effect of the indorsement as a warranty of genuineness. In this respect the case is exceptional. But perhaps the language above quoted should be restricted to the facts of the particular case which the court regarded as showing a fault in thus cashing the check of a stranger.

But on the other hand the receiving of a check on deposit from a stranger, even if contrary to the custom of the bank, and sending it through the clearing house without communicating that fact, is held in Commercial & Farmers Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank of Baltimore (1888) 30 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554, not to relieve the drawee from the risk of paying it if the maker's signature is forged.

So in Salt Springs Bank v. Syracuse Sav. Inst. (1863) 62 Barb. 101, the fact that a check on another bank was cashed for a stranger although the pretended drawer was not a customer of the bank which cashed it, was held not to relieve the drawee from the loss if the check was forged.

But an exception to the rule that a bank is bound to know the signature of the depositor is also recognized in Rouvant v. San Antonio Nat. Bank (1885) 63 Tex. 610, where the party receiving the payment is in fault. It is held that the payee of a check who is a responsible merchant known to the bank who indorses and collects the check without disclosing grounds for suspicion thereby aids to mislead the bank, as the bank might well assume that there was no question of the identity of the person who drew and signed it. The court says: "Here the check had not gone into circulation; it was drawn in favor of R—— and was indorsed though the places of business of both Osborne & Clark and of plaintiff were within a few blocks, and of ready access, Boutell Bros. made no inquiry to ascertain the genuineness of the check, and the defendant bank took no means to assure itself of the fact, except the identification of Seymour by Boutell Bros. and the indorsement of the check by the latter. The next day the defendant bank presented the check to the plaintiff, which, after examining the signature and believing it to be genuine, induced thereto by its apparent genuineness (it not being possible by ordinary care to detect the forgery), and by the financial standing and integrity of the defendant bank, which presented it, and of Boutell Bros., who had indorsed it, "in the exercise of due care and caution," paid the check. It is also alleged that it was the custom and practice among all the banks in Minneapolis, well known to the defendants, for the bank upon which any check purports to be drawn to pay it when presented by any other bank (provided the drawer has sufficient funds), relying upon the genuineness of the check and of all prior indorsements; also not to pay a check "of any considerable size" purporting to be drawn by one of its depositors unless the party presenting it is identified, "save when indorsements of responsible parties known to the drawee bank are indorsed thereon." On April 24 plaintiff discovered that the signature of Osborne & Clark was a forgery, and immediately notified the defendants of the fact, tendered back the check, and demanded payment of the amount, which was refused. The signature of Osborne & Clark had been forged by Seymour, who absconded April 12, the same day on which plaintiff paid the check, but whether before or after is not alleged. His whereabouts is still unknown.

These facts present the question, upon which so much has of late years been said and written, whether the drawer of a bill of exchange, or the banker upon whom a check has been drawn, who has paid a bill or check upon which the drawer's signature has been forged, can, upon discovery of the forgery, recover back the amount from the holder, and, if so, under what circumstances he may thus recover. It is a well-settled rule of law that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered back, however negligent the party paying may have been in making the mistake, unless the payment has caused such a change in the position of the other party that it would be unjust to require him to refund. And the tendency of the modern authorities is to extend rather than to curtail the operation of this rule. One generally received exception to the rule is that where the drawee of a bill of exchange, or the banker upon whom a check has been drawn, pays a bill or check upon which the drawer's signature has been forged, he must stand the loss, and cannot recover back the amount, if the party to whom he paid it was a bona fide holder. This doctrine was established in England in 1762, in the leading case of Price and collected by him. At that time he was a responsible merchant in the city of San Antonio and was known to the bank as such. When the check was presented payable to and indorsed by him the bank might well assume that there were no suspicious circumstances attending its execution, and no question as to the identity of the person who drew and signed it. At least his receiving and indorsing the check would have a tendency to mislead and throw the officers of the bank off their guard and cause them to accept and pay the check without subjecting it to the same scrutiny as if it had been indorsed and presented by a stranger." In this case the payee of the check took it with knowledge of the suspicious circumstance that it was executed by a person who had previously given him a check in a different name.

Likewise it was held in First Nat. Bank of Quincy v. Ricker (1874) 71 Ill. 439, 22 Am. Rep. 104, that one who obtains money on a forged check, which he suspects to be forged, by indorsing it as a condition of its payment by the drawee bank which doubts the signature but consents to pay it if he will indorse it, must refund to the drawee bank on its proving a forgery and demanding back the money within a few hours. It is declared in First Nat. Bank of Quincy v. Ricker, supra, that the rule requiring the drawee to know the drawer's signature presupposes good faith of the other party to the transaction as a bona fide holder.

The forgery of a bank check or draft on another bank was held not to make a bank liable because of its lack of care in keeping its blanks and by selling a similar genuine draft to a stranger and inclosing his signature at his request to the drawee bank although the cashier became somewhat suspicious because of the premium paid by the stranger and did not communicate his suspicions to the drawee bank. Leavitt v. Stanton (1844) Hill & D. Supp. 413.

II. Duty of other parties.

The first declaration of the doctrine that a drawee must know the signature of his drawer seems to be that made in Price v. Neale (1762) 3 Burr. 1354, 1 W. Bl. 390, in which a drawee after payment of forged bills to a bona fide holder who took one of them after acceptance by the drawee, was denied the right to recover back his money on the ground that if there was any negligence it was that of the drawee and that it was incumbent on him to be satisfied that the signature "was the drawer's hand" before acceptance or payment.

A drawee of forged drafts purporting to be drawn to the drawer's own order and to have his indorsement, who pays them to a bank which has cashed them for an unknown party without requiring his indorsement and thus left the drawee to presume that they were discounted for the drawer himself, was held in Howard v. Mississippi Valley Bank of Vicksburg (1876) 28 La. Ann. 727, 26 Am. Rep. 105, to be without remedy against the bank although he paid them acting on such presumption. The court seems to have decided the case chiefly on the doctrine that the drawee must know his drawer's hand, although it recited that continuous acts of accepting and paying drafts were calculated to induce the bank to suppose that he knew them to be genuine.

The doctrine has a strong application in Bernheimer v. Marshall (1858) 2 Minn. 78, 72 Am. Dec. 79, in which a drawee who paid a draft by check sent by his bookkeeper without examining the instrument although he had opportunity to do so, was held bound by the payment and was denied the right to recover on finding that the draft was forged. The mere statement of the party presenting the forged draft that he had a draft of the drawer was held not to constitute a guaranty of the genuineness of the signature.

The right of a drawee to recover after payment.

v. Neale, 8 Burr. 1855, in which Lord Mansfield stopped defendant's counsel, saying the case was one that could not be made plainer by argument; that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff (the drawee) to be satisfied that the bill drawn upon him was in the drawer's hand before he accepted or paid it. The same doctrine was firmly established in the commercial law of this country in Bank of United States v. Bank of the State of Georgia, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 333, 6 L. ed. 334, in which Mr. Justice Story, referring to Price v. Neale, said: "After some research, we have not been able to find a single case in which the general doctrine thus asserted has been shaken or even doubted." And, so far as we have been able to discover, this general doctrine is recognized as the law by the courts of every state in the Union except Pennsylvania, where the rule has been changed by statute. The doctrine was announced and applied by this court as early as Bernheimer v. Marshall, 2 Minn. 78 (Gil. 61), 72 Am. Dec. 79. That was a case of a forged draft, but the doctrine is equally applicable to a forged check. Indeed, if there is any difference in the cases, the reasons upon which the doctrine rests apply with more force to the latter than the former, for not only do checks pass from hand to hand as money more frequently and rapidly than do drafts or ordinary bills of exchange, but a banker is "even more bound" to know a customer's handwriting than a drawee of a bill of exchange is bound to know the drawers. Many modern text-writers, some of them of learning and of a forged draft was denied in Vogel v. Ball (1888) 69 Tex. 604, where the claim was asserted against a collecting bank which had paid over the money and which did not indorse the draft but merely gave a receipt therefor. The right of action against any other party was not decided.

Where the payee's indorsement as well as the drawer's signature was forged the drawee who paid the bill without fault on his part was allowed to recover back the money from an indorser whose position was not changed after the payment was made, on the ground that the indorsement was a representation if not a warranty of the genuineness of the preceding indorsement by the payee which gave a right of action to the drawee even if he was estopped to deny the drawer's signature. McCall v. Corning (1848) 3 La. Ann. 409, 48 Am. Dec. 454.

An exception to the rule which denies the right of a drawee to recover back money paid on a forged draft is made where the payment was innocently made to a holder who had bought the draft and thus incurred his loss before acceptance and without any act of the drawee to mislead him. McKleroy v. Southern Bank of Kentucky (1850) 14 La. Ann. 482, 74 Am. Dec. 438.

Where a check was sent to a bank which was a member of a clearing house in accordance with a continuing arrangement to send a check daily for the balance of paper taken up through the clearing house for the maker of the check, and the balance for which the check was given included the payment of a forged certificate of deposit which was not taken up through the clearing house and was not shown to the maker, he was held entitled to recover back the amount of the forged certificate on discovering the forgery after banking hours on the same day. Allen v. Fourth Nat. Bank (1874) 69 N. Y. 12.

One who intervenes for the honor of a supposed drawer of a draft on which payment has been refused for lack of funds and pays it without seeing the draft may recover, but if he saw the draft he would be within the same rule that applies to drawees and could not recover. Goddard v. Merchants Bank (1850) 4 N. Y. 147, affirming 2 Sandf. 247.

The agent of a steamboat, who voluntarily called at a bank as requested by a forged letter to take up a forged draft purporting to be drawn by the clerk of the steamboat on the captain and paid it, was denied the right to recover back his money from the bank after it had paid over the money in good faith. Stephenson v. Mount (1867) 19 La. Ann. 205.

But one who is called on to pay bills for the honor of an apparent indorser whose name was in fact forged was held entitled to recover back the money on discovering the forgery, at least when 37 L. R. A.

the remedy of the other party was still open, because the presentment for payment for the honor of the drawer was held to be a representation of the genuineness of the indorsement. Wilkinson v. Johnston (1824) 3 Barn. & C. 423, 5 Dowl. & R. 403.

An acceptor after protest for the honor of the drawer on request of the drawee of a forged bill who had refused to accept it only because of financial embarrassment was held bound to pay to a bona fide holder who discounted the bill on the faith of the acceptance, although the payee's name was fictitious. Phillips v. Imthurn (1866) L. R. 1 C. P. 463, 35 L. J. C. P. 220, 14 L. T. N. S. 400, 14 Week. Rep. 633.

The general doctrine that an acceptance is an acknowledgment of the drawer's signature is declared in Wilkinson v. Lutwidge (1726) 1 Strange, 648, where it is said that the drawee is supposed to know the hand of his own correspondent, but that this is not conclusive.

So in Jenys v. Fowler (1733) 2 Strange, 946, the court was strongly inclined to think that even actual proof of forgery would not excuse a drawee against his own acceptance which had given credit to an indorsement.

The acceptance of a bill payable to the drawer's order although an admission of his signature does not admit that an indorsement thereon and apparently in the same handwriting purporting to be his is genuine. Williams v. Drexel (1859) 14 Md. 566.

The receipt and payment of forged United States treasury notes by the assistant treasurer at New York is not binding on the government because that officer had no authority to settle, adjust, or determine the validity of claims against the government. Cooke v. United States (1875) 91 U. S. 339, 23 L. ed. 237.

A bank at which a township order was made payable was held entitled to recover on discovering that it was forged against an indorser who obtained payment, unless the delay in discovering the forgery of the instrument was such as to put the indorser in a worse position than if payment had been refused. Indiana Nat. Bank of La Fayette v. First Nat. Bank of Crawfordville (Ind.) Feb. 2, 1894.

Similar to the cases about a drawee's duty to know the drawer's signature are the cases as to the obligation of the maker of a note to recognize his own signature.

In Welch v. Goodwin (1877) 123 Mass. 71, 25 Am. Rep. 24, it was held that one who paid a note to which his name was forged could recover back the money if he had not been guilty of laches.

In Wilson v. Alexander (1842) 4 Ill. 392, an administrator who paid a forged note apparently signed by his intestate was allowed to recover back the money. The court distinguished this case from that of payment by the supposed maker.

ability, have assailed the correctness of this doctrine, contending that the general rule as to money paid under mistake of fact should apply, and that the law ought to be that the bank, although at fault in not discovering the forgery of its customer's signature, can recover even from an innocent holder, if he will then be in no worse condition than if the bank had refused to pay the draft or check. See 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 80; Morse, Banks & Banking, chap. 38; Dan. Neg. Inst. chap. 43; also, Am. L. Rev. April, 1875, p. 411, and note to People's Bank of Springfield v. Franklin Bank of Clarksville (Tenn.) 17 Am. St. Rep. 889, 88 Tenn. 299, 6 L. R. A. 724. We shall not enter upon a consideration of the soundness of the argument against the doctrine, or as to which rule we would adopt if the question was res integra, because we do not feel at liberty to overrule or disregard a doctrine so well established and so firmly rooted in the commercial law of the country. If the rule is incorrect or works badly in practice, its change must be left to the legislature. We may say, however, that the opponents of the doctrine seem to have found no followers among the courts. We may also suggest that perhaps the courts themselves have given the opponents of the doctrine an unnecessary vantage ground, by frequently placing it exclusively on the narrow ground of actual negligence on part of the drawee in not discovering the forgery, because he was bound to know the signature of his own customer or correspondent. It is undoubtedly true that he is in better position than a stranger to know his customer's signature, and that men have a right to deal with checks and drafts on that assumption; but it does not seem to us that the doctrine rests entirely on this narrow basis of actual negligence on part of the drawee. The money of the commercial world is no longer coin. The exchanges of commerce are now made almost entirely by means of drafts and checks. It was largely in deference to this fact that the recovery of money paid on paper of this kind, to which the drawer's signature was forged, was made an exception to the general rule as to the recovery of money paid under a mistake of fact. In view of the use of this class of paper as money, it was considered that public policy required that, as between the drawee and good-faith holders, the drawee bank should be deemed the place of final settlement where all prior mistakes and forgeries should be corrected and settled once for all, and, if not then corrected, payment should be treated as final; that there must be a fixed and definite time and place to adjust and end these things as to innocent holders; and that that time and place should be the paying bank and the date of payment; and that, if not done then, the failure to do so must be deemed the constructive fault of the payee bank, which must take the consequences. See dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Snodgrass in People's Bank of Springfield v. Franklin Bank of Clarksville, 88 Tenn. 299, 6 L. R. A. 724.

The rule that, if a bank pays a check under the misconception that it has funds of the drawer, it cannot recover from a bona fide holder, but must look to the drawer alone for redress, is founded on much the same reasons. There is not as much force as may at first seem in the suggestion of practical objections to the doctrine. In large commercial centers, where vast numbers of checks have to be rapidly exchanged between banks, it is always done through and under the clearing-house rules, adopted by the banks for mutual convenience, by which checks paid in that way may be returned within a certain time, if it be found that they are not genuine or that the drawer had no funds. And the doctrine has no application to cases where, as is common in cities, a customer of a bank deposits checks purporting to be drawn on other banks. Entirely different principles apply to such cases. But while the general doctrine is too well established to be overruled or disregarded, yet it is undoubtedly true that the trend of the modern authorities is to impose upon it some limitations and modifications; so that it is not now always easy to definitely state when a case falls within the doctrine or comes within the general rule as to money paid by mistake. From what examination we have been able to make of the authorities, we have arrived at the conclusion that there are very few well-considered cases which go further than to hold that the bank may recover back money paid on a check to which the signature of one of its customers was forged, when there was a lack of good faith on part of the payee towards the bank, as when he knew the check was forged, or knew of circumstances casting suspicion on its genuineness not known to the bank, and which he did not communicate to it, or where the holder was negligent in not making due inquiry as to the validity of the check before he took it, and the drawee, having a right to presume that he had made such inquiry, was thereby excused from itself making inquiry before paying it. In the first case the holder is really a party to the fraud, and is not a good-faith holder. In the second case, he has, by his negligence, contributed to the consummation of the mistake on part of the drawee by misleading him.

There is no allegation that either of the defendants knew or suspected that the check was forged. So far as appears, they both acted in entire good faith. All that is claimed against either is negligence. It remains only to consider whether either is charged in the complaint with any act of negligence in failing to make proper inquiry as to the genuineness of the check, and which the plaintiff assumed, and had a right to assume, that they had made, so as to excuse it for not making the investigation as to the genuineness of its own customer's signature which it otherwise would have made. So far as the defendant bank is concerned, there is only one side to the question. When it was requested to cash a check purporting to be drawn by one not its customer, on another bank, payable to a person unknown to it, it took the precautions, which any prudent bank would have taken, to have the payee identified and the check indorsed by a responsible party, and thereby protect itself against loss in case the check was not honored when presented for payment. This is just what any bank would naturally do, and has a right to do, under such circumstances, instead of going in search of the maker of the check to ascertain from him if his signature is genuine, and then going to the drawee bank to ascertain if he has funds on deposit with which to meet it. It owned the plaintiff no duty to investigate as to the genuineness of the signature of its own customer, and the plaintiff had no right to assume that it had made such investigation. It seems to us that the same is true as to Boutell Bros. The distinction must be kept clearly in mind between their duty and responsibility to the defendant bank or any other bona fide indorsee of the check, and their duty and responsibility to the plaintiff bank, with reference to the genuineness of the signature of its own customer. By indorsing the check, Boutell Bros. undoubtedly guaranteed to the defendant bank the genuineness both of Osborne & Clark's signature and of Seymour's indorsement as the payee. That was the very purpose of their indorsement. And, if the indorsement of Seymour had proved to be forged, they would no doubt have been liable to plaintiff had it been thus led to pay the check to one not the owner of it; for by indorsing it they guaranteed to all persons, including plaintiff, the genuineness of the preceding indorsement. But upon the question of the genuineness of the signature of Osborne & Clark, the drawee's own customers, the case stands upon an entirely different footing. Not being the original payees of the check, the indorsement of Boutell Bros. constituted no guaranty or representation to the drawee that the signature of the drawer was genuine; and the plaintiff had no right to rely on it as such, or to assume that Boutell Bros. had investigated as to its genuineness. That was a matter which it devolved on the plaintiff to ascertain for itself when the check was presented. In fact, the complaint negatives the idea that the plaintiff acted on any such assumption; for it is alleged that it did examine the signature with due care and caution, that it was to all appearances genuine, and that it was not possible by any ordinary care or precaution to detect the forgery.

Our conclusion is that as to both demurrers the order appealed from must be affirmed.

Canty, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the foregoing opinion. Because error is gray with age is no reason why it should be respected or followed. It seems to me that the foregoing opinion is a mere apology for such error, and this is true of the opinion in most of the modern cases on the question here involved. I concede that it is good public policy to hold that a banker should know the signature of his depositor. It tends to greater vigilance on the part of the banker, and more prompt discovery of the forgery, which makes the business of forgery more dangerous and less successful. But it does not follow that this is the only principle involved in this kind of a case, or that it should overturn and exclude all other well-established principles applicable thereto. There is no stronger or better established principle of law or public policy than that which holds that no one shall be allowed to retain the consideration received by him on a forged instrument, however innocent he may be, unless he can invoke the aid of the doctrine of estoppel. Even when a person has been deceived by the forgery of his own signature, and has paid the forged obligation, he may recover back the money so paid, from an innocent holder. Welch v. Goodwin, 123 Mass. 71, 25 Am. Rep. 24; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 464, p. 768. This principle tends to cause greater vigilance on the part of every one about to take such paper, and to prevent him, when he has taken it, from suppressing his suspicions, and putting the paper off on some one else, instead of investigating the matter and pursuing the guilty parties. Why should the law in such a case offer a premium on attempting to put the paper off on the drawee bank? The money of a bank is not legitimate plunder, and a person receiving it through mistake and without consideration ought not to be entitled to retain it. The mere fact that a bank pays a forged check drawn upon it is no reason why it should lose its money. It was the absolute duty of the bank to know its depositor's signature, and detect the forgery, and it should suffer any loss caused by its failure to perform that duty; but there is no principle of law which says that, when such failure has caused no loss, the bank shall, as a mere penalty, forfeit the money so paid by it.

The transfer of negotiable paper by one holder to another is accompanied by an implied warranty that the paper is genuine. Brown v. Ames (Minn.) 61 N. W. Rep. 448. But, when a bank pays a check drawn upon it, there is no such implied warranty that the signature of the maker is genuine. On the contrary, it is the duty of the bank to ascertain, when the check is presented, whether or not the signature to it is genuine. It owes this duty not only to the innocent holder presenting the check, but also to all prior innocent holders. If it fails in this duty, it can only recover back the money so paid by it on the ground that it was paid and received by mutual mistake and without consideration, and that none of the successive innocent holders through whose hands the check passed will suffer any loss by reason of such failure if compelled to return the consideration received by him; that is, that none of such innocent holders will be in a worse position when he has returned such consideration than he would be if the check had not been paid by the bank. There is no reason why this rule should lead to multiplicity of actions, or result in conditions too complex for practical solution. When the bank brings suit against the last holder to whom it paid the check, he can give notice of the suit to the next prior holder of whom he received it, and who is liable over to him on such implied warranty, and thereby bind such prior holder by the result of the suit. See Love v. Gibson, 2 Fla. 598; Kip v. Brigham, 6 Johns. 158, 7 Johns. 168; People v. Judges of Monroe Common Pleas, 1 Wend. 19; Blasdale v. Babcock, 1 Johns. 517; Bigelow, Estoppel, 84.

I see no reason why the second last holder of the check cannot in like manner give notice of the suit to the third last holder of it, and thereby bind him by the result of that suit. And it seems to me that the defense will be entitled to plead and prove the existence of as many successive innocent prior holders as it can, and thereupon the burden should, perhaps, be thrown on the plaintiff bank to prove that none of these holders will be in a worse position when he has, by reason of the recovery of the bank, been compelled to return the consideration received by him, than he would be if the bank had never paid the check.

Rehearing denied.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Rebecca H. KILPATRICK et al., Appts.,
v.

Mayor etc., of BALTIMORE.

(.....Md.....)

A condition is not created by an habendum clause "to have and to hold . . . as and for a street, to be kept as a public highway," following a granting clause conveying absolutely a portion of a larger tract of land which a city was acquiring in accordance with a resolution directing its acquisition "for public use" when the entire property was immediately devoted to the uses of the public square which could not be done if the strip was devoted to street purposes and the opening of the street would be profitless both to the grantor and the public.

(March 27, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Baltimore in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of a strip of land which defendants claimed under a deed from plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harry M. Benninger, James S. Calwell, Thomas MacKensie, and John V. L. Findlay, for appellants:

The conveyance was for a special purpose, to wit, "as and for a street to be kept as a public highway," and that purpose being embodied in the deed as one of its conditions, the mayor and city council must have taken the title subject to the conditions.

Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 684, and note 4; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 575.

As it appears from the terms of the deed itself that there was a condition attached to the grant, it necessarily follows that the intention was not to grant a fee.

The granting clause by the words "do grant unto the mayor and city council of Baltimore and its successors," conveys to said city a fee-simple estate, and if the words in habendum "as and for a street to be kept as a public highway," are words of condition subsequent which, if operative and effective would create a base or defeasible fee upon a breach of which a forfeiture and reverter would occur in favor of the grantors, then these words occurring in the habendum would create a repugnancy between it and the estate conveyed in the granting clause, and be inoperative in so far as these words limited or diminished the fee-simple estate previously granted.

The words "as and for a street to be kept as a public highway," occurring in the habendum, do not in themselves create a condition subsequent.

A condition subsequent is never favored, because it works a forfeiture, and forfeitures, both in law and equity, are "odious."

4 Kent, Com. 125, 180, 132; Stanley v. Colt, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 119, 18 L. ed. 592; Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 295; Farnham v. Thompson, 34 Minn. 380; Earle v. Dawes, 8 Md. Ch. 280.

The fact that the consideration was nominal in the deed which it is claimed has words creating a condition subsequent, does not change the rules of law as to the construction of the words, but only makes a condition subsequent more readily implied.

Olcott v. Gabert, 86 Tex. 121.

The mere declaration of the uses to which the granted premises are to be applied does not ordinarily import a condition.

Where the use or purpose declared in the deed is not for the special benefit of the grantor, but for the public at large, the courts are not inclined to treat the words as creating a condition subsequent.

Olcott v. Gabert, Packard v. Ames, and Rawson v. Uxbridge School Dist. No. 5, supra; Greene v. O'Connor, 19 L. R. A. 262, 18 R. I. 49; Thornton v. Trammell, 39 Ga. 209; Paschall v. Glenn, 67 Md. 490.

In ascertaining whether the words "as and for a street to be kept as a public highway" create a condition subsequent, the intention of the grantors is controlling.

The resolution, the incapacity of the appellee to take the land in question for a street, but only for a part of a public square, under the express provisions of said resolution, the recitals in the other deed made three days later, and all the surrounding facts, conclusively show that it was not the intention of the grantors by the use of these words to create a condition subsequent.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, brought by the appellant to recover from the appellee a strip of land running through Perkins' Spring property in the city of Baltimore. The case was heard below upon an agreed statement of facts, and from the pro forma judgment thereupon rendered this appeal is taken.

On the 16th day of October, 1872, the mayor and city council of Baltimore passed a resolution authorizing and directing the city comptroller to lease "for public use" all that portion of the Perkins Spring property located within the bounds of Ogston, George, and Chatsworth streets (except a portion theretofore leased) "at a rate not to exceed four dollars and a-half per front foot, for the building lots contained within said bounds," with the right reserved "to purchase at six per cent, capitalized, at the convenience of the city." The land described in this resolution was conveyed to the city in separate parcels by two deeds, dated respectively the 11th day of January, 1873, and the 14th day of January of the same year. These deeds were submitted to and approved by the city solicitor at the same time, that is to say on the 4th of January. By the deed of the 14th day of January the grantors, first having set out the resolution above cited, lease to the city for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, with the right reserved to purchase the fee, all of the ground mentioned in the resolution, except so much thereof as constituted Clark street, which was granted by the deed of the 11th of January to the city "in fee simple." Clark street thus referred to did not, in fact, exist; it was only the strip of land running from Ogston to Chatsworth street, sixty feet wide, which the grantors, by deed of the 11th of January, had, in consideration of one dollar, granted unto the mayor and city council of Baltimore and its successors, with an habendum clause, as follows:

"To have and to hold the parcel of ground above described with the appurtenances aforesaid unto the mayor and city council of Baltimore, aforesaid, and its successors forever, as and for a street to be kept as a public highway." Upon the execution and delivery of these deeds, the city took possession of the property, and since then it has been used as a part of Perkins Spring square. It has expended large sums of money in improving it, by the construction of expensive paved ways for the persons using the square, and of a large mound of earth in the center, ornamented and embellished with receptacles for flowers. No ordinance or resolution was ever passed by the mayor and city council authorizing the purchase of the land mentioned in the declaration as a public highway, or accepting it as such; on the contrary if it should be used as a street such use would render the triangular parcel incapable of improvement as a public square, as provided by the ordinance or resolution of 1872. It is agreed by the parties that the court shall draw such inferences of law or fact from the "statement of facts and exhibits as may be right and proper, and all questions of law, as well as inferences that might have been made in the court below, shall be open for consideration and decision by this court."

Under these circumstances the appellant contends that the deed of the 11th of January, 1873, was made for the purpose of opening, and forever keeping open, Clark street from Ogston to Chateaworth as a public highway; that the words, "as and for a street to be kept as a public highway," found in the habendum, create a condition, and as the city has failed to use the land in accordance with this condition, a forfeiture has occurred, and the title has reverted to the grantors. To sustain this contention it obviously is necessary to determine that the words in themselves import a condition, or when taken in connection with the whole deed, that they show a clear and unmistakable intention on the part of the grantor to grant an estate on condition. Technical words are not absolutely essential to create a condition, nor, on the other hand, does their use necessarily raise one; such words may be controlled by the context of the instrument in which they are used, so that sometimes they work a limitation and condition, and sometimes a covenant or a trust only. Paschall v. Pasmore, 15 Pa. 295; Bacon v. Huntington, 14 Conn. 92; Worman v. Teagarden, 2 Ohio St. 380; Walters v. Bredin, 70 Pa. 235; Laberes v. Carleton, 58 Me. 211.

Conditions subsequent are not favored in law "because on breach of such conditions there is a forfeiture, and the law is adverse to forfeitures." 4 Kent, Com. 130; Stanley v. Colt, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 119, 18 L. ed. 502.

Therefore it is that a condition will not be raised by implication, from a mere declaration in the deed that the grant is made for a special and particular purpose, without being coupled with words appropriate to make such a condition. Packard v. Ames, 16 Gray, 327; Bigelow v. Barr, 4 Ohio, 358.

And as a further consequence of this rule, it has always been held that "in doubtful cases the disposition of the courts is, to construe language as creating a trust or covenant, rather than a condition. See Mr. Brantley's note to the case of Earle v. James, 3 Md. Ch. 230, and authorities there cited. Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 21 L. R. A. 58; Greene v. O'Connor, 18 R. I. 49, 19 L. R. A. 262; Rauson v. Uxbridge School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen, 128, 129, 68 Am. Dec. 670.

In the elaborate and able opinion delivered in the last cited case by Bigelow, Ch. J., the court said: "If it be doubtful whether a clause in a deed be a covenant or a condition, courts of law will always incline against the latter construction. Conditions are not to be raised readily by inference or argument. . . . We believe there is no authoritative sanction for the doctrine that a deed is to be construed a grant on a condition subsequent solely for the reason that it contains a clause declaring the purpose for which it is intended the granted premises shall be used, where such purpose will not inure specially to the benefit of the grantor and his assigns, but is in its nature general and public, and where there are no other words indicating an intent that the grant is to be void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled."

These principles which, so far as our researches have gone, seem to be of universal acceptance, are fully sustained by the decisions of this court. Without undertaking to review the cases in which questions of this nature have been considered, we deem it quite sufficient to refer to the case of Newbold v. Glenn, 67 Md. 490, in which Judge Robinson, speaking for the court, has succinctly stated the whole law. There, in pursuance of an ordinance of the city the trustees of the McDonough Educational Fund & Institute bought of Wolfarden a lot of ground as a site for the proposed McDonough Institute. The deed recited the ordinance, and conveyed the property to the city, "in trust for the uses and purposes, and subject to the trusts, limitations, powers, and provisions imposed, expressed, and declared in and by the ordinance." Subsequently the city sold the property to William W. Glenn and bought another, on which the buildings were erected. One of the questions involved was whether the city acquired an indefeasible fee-simple title, or only a fee on condition subsequent, that the property was to be used as a site for the institute, and on failure so to use it, there was a reverter to the grantor.

It was held, however, the words relied on to establish the condition were used only "for showing the purpose for which the property was bought and the character in which it was held, and not for the purpose of limiting the right of alienation." It was also held there was nothing "to justify the inference that the property was sold or conveyed on condition that it was to be used as a site for the McDonough Institute, and on failure thus to use it the title was to revert to the vendor . . . and if such had been the intention we must presume that it would have been expressed in clear and explicit terms or in terms at least from which such intention could be fairly inferred." The court also distinguished that case from those of Reed v. Stouffer, 56 Md. 236, and of Second Universalist Soc. of Baltimore v. Dugan, 65 Md. 460, in which it was held "on the express terms of the grant and the incapacity of the grantee to take upon any other conditions, that, upon the 'failure to use the property for the purposes in consideration of which it was conveyed the title reverted to the grantor.'"

Applying these principles to the case at bar, we cannot find anything in the deed of the 11th of January to justify the inference that the property was conveyed on the condition that it was to be used as a public highway and "on failure thus to use it, the title was to revert to the vendor." In the granting clause the property is conveyed abso-lately to the city and in the habendum are the words, "to have and to hold, etc., as and for a street to be kept as a public highway." These words do not ex proprio vigore import a condition, nor are they so connected with the grant itself, as in any manner to qualify the general terms there employed; and there is no such language to be found in the deed, from which when the context is taken into consideration, an intention to create a condition can be inferred. The lot was acquired by the city under the authority of a resolution, which directed a lease "for public use, with the right reserved to purchase."

It was part of the property included within what was called the Perkins Spring property, and inasmuch as the whole of the property was, immediately upon its acquisition, devoted by the city to the uses of a public square, it may reasonably be presumed that such was the "public use" had in view when the resolution was passed. Under these circumstances, it is inconceivable, and it would require the plainest terms to enable us to determine, that it was the intent of the deed that if the property was put to the public use contemplated by the resolution and not to the use of a public street, the city should lose its title and the property revert to the grantors. A glance at the plat with which we have been furnished will satisfy any one that to use this parcel of land as a street would be profitless both to the grantor and the public; and it is agreed by the parties that such use would render the property included in the resolution, "incapable of improvement as a public square as provided in the ordinance of 1872."

We are disposed to place but little importance upon the fact that the consideration in the deed is merely nominal. The whole of the Perkins Spring property (except a portion thereof) was transferred to the city by the same parties. The resolution authorized a lease at $4.50 per front foot of the building lots contained. Prior to the passage of the resolution Clark street did not exist. It is obvious that if Clark street be taken into account more front feet can be obtained than would otherwise be possible, and thus a larger price could be realized for the entire property. The transfer to the city of the Spring property, although accomplished by two deeds, ought to be regarded as one transaction, and the real consideration for the conveyances must be taken to be the aggregate amounts received from the entire property.

In view of all the facts of the case and the terms of the deed, we think the words relied on to create the condition are quite as consistent with an intent to repose a confidence in the authorities of the city, that they "would fulfill the purpose of the grant, so long as it was reasonable and practicable so to do, as they are with the intent to impose a condition which should compel it, on pain of forfeiture, to maintain the property as a public street, however inconvenient, impracticable or worthless it might become either to the vendor or vendee." "Language so equivocal cannot be construed as a condition subsequent without disregarding the cardinal principle of real property . . . that conditions subsequent which defeat an estate are not to be favored or raised by inference or implication." Rawson v. Uxbridge School Dist. No. 5, supra.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is taken from a pro forma order of the superior court of Baltimore city, on a case stated for the opinion and order of that court, in a proceeding instituted by the appellee to obtain the writ of mandamus to compel the appellant to pay to the appellee, under a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city, the sum of $100 for the treatment of John P. Moran, an habitual drunkard residing in said city. The sole object of this appeal being to obtain from this court a determination of the validity et non of the Act of the General Assembly of Maryland, chapter 247, passed January Session, 1894, entitled "An act to provide for the treatment and cure of habitual drunkards." The act by its first section provides that any inhabitant of this state, who is of kin to or a friend of an habitual drunkard, as defined in the fifth section of this act, may apply by petition to the circuit court of the county or the circuit court of Baltimore city, where such drunkard resides, for leave to send such drunkard at the expense of the county or city as the case may be, to an institution located in Maryland for the medical treatment of drunkenness, as said court may designate. The first section further provides that the petition shall be verified by the applicant and contain the name, age, and condition of the habitual drunkard and show that neither he nor his petitioning kin is financially able to incur the expense of his cure, and further that said petition shall contain the written agreement of said drunkard to take such treatment and obey the rules of the institution to which he may be sent. The 2d section provides that the court shall be satisfied of the truth of the facts stated in the petition before sending the drunkard to an institution, and that the charge for the treatment shall in no case exceed the sum of $100, and it then further provides that the court shall thereupon order the expense of such treatment to be paid out of the treasury of the county or the city of Baltimore, as the case may be, in the same manner as other claims for the administration of justice are paid. The 3d section has no direct bearing on this subject in controversy here. The 4th section provides that the officers of the institution to which a drunkard is sent shall become sworn officers, without compensation of the court sending the drunkard for treatment. The 5th section defines a drunkard to be "any person who has acquired the habit of using spirituous, malt, or fermented liquors, cocaine or other narcotics to such a degree as to deprive him or her of reasonable self-control." This statement gives substantially all the material facts necessary for the purposes of this controversy.

It is contended that the act is in conflict with the constitution of this state, for that the legislature has no power to compel the city of Baltimore, without its consent, to tax its citizens for the treatment of habitual drunkards at an inebriate asylum.

By the provisions of article 16, section 47, of the Code, whenever by petition under oath, any person shall be alleged to be a drunkard, incapable of taking care of himself or herself, or his or her property, any circuit court of this state and also the circuit court of Baltimore city, shall have the power, in its discretion, on such preliminary examination or inquiry as it may think proper to make ex parte, to issue a warrant to the sheriff of the county or city, to arrest and bring the person so charged before such court. Then follows the summons of a jury in like manner with the established practice in cases of lunatic paupers under article 59 of the Code. Under either article of the code the proceeding is ex parte, and the questions to be passed upon are submitted to the finding of a jury instead of the court. These two provisions of the code have been in force in this state for many years, and have been especially with respect to lunatic paupers of well-recognized service. The law now under consideration, in so far as it relates to the liberty of the drunkard, does not require the intervention of a jury, for the reason that he voluntarily and in advance agrees in writing that the court may send him to any institution in the state for the medical treatment of drunkenness. We are very clear that the law does not in the remotest possible sense curtail any right of the drunkard. Do the provisions of the law requiring the city to pay for the medical treatment of the drunkard improperly or injuriously affect any right of the city of Baltimore any more than the tax which is imposed for the maintenance of courts, civil and criminal, is found to be as well as other taxes are, an exaction for the benefit of the public good? We fail to recognize the force of this objection, especially in its application to the lunatic paupers of the state. The principle invoked has just the same force in its application to the condition of an habitual drunkard as to a lunatic pauper. The law is general in its application, and is intended alike for city and county.

The ninth section of article eleven of the Constitution declares that it "shall not be so construed, or taken as to make the political corporation of Baltimore independent of or free from the control which the general assembly of Maryland has over all such corporations in the state." This court in the Regent's Case, 9 Gill & J. 397, 31 Am. Dec. 72, says: "A public corporation is one that is created for political purposes with political powers, to be exercised for purposes connected with the public good in the administration of civil government; an instrument of the government subject to the control of the legislature, and its members officers of the government, for the administration or discharge of public duties, as in cases of cities, towns, etc." And, again, in the same case, folio 401, it says: "Public corporations are to be governed according to the laws of the land, and the government has the sole right, as trustee of the public interest, to inspect, regulate, control, and direct the corporation, its funds and franchises." Whilst it is not claimed that the legislature has absolute and unlimited control over the appellant, there can be no doubt as to the power of the legislature to require the payment by the city of a sum requisite to defray the expense of maintenance and medical treatment of habitual drunkards residing within the corporate limits and committed under the provisions of the law now under consideration.

If the legislature has authority, which we do not question, to treat habitual drunkards, as a class of citizens who are entitled to be restrained or medically cared for by placing them in institutions for treatment it would naturally follow that in so far as the law applies to the citizens of Baltimore, the expense of the treatment of its habitual drunkards ought reasonably be borne by it. It was held as already stated in the Regents Case, supra, that the government "has the sole right, as trustee of the public interest, to inspect, regulate, control, and direct the corporation, its funds and franchises." It is one of the gravest conditions of the century in which we live and of which legislators have been compelled to make observation, that the victims of the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants, narcotics, etc., have grown to be legion, not of healthy robust manhood, but of broken, debauched, and decrepit men, against whom and for whom as a class, public sentiment has a right to appeal to the legislature for protection. Lord Bacon has said; "That all the crimes on earth do not destroy so many of the human race, nor alienate so much property, as drunkenness." Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, says: "There is no justification for holding that the state, under the guise merely of police regulations, is here aiming to deprive the citizen of his constitutional rights; for we cannot shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety may be endangered by the use of intoxicating drinks; nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to every one, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism and crime existing in the country are in some degree, at least, traceable to this evil."

Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on the Limitations of Police Powers says: "It is the policy of some states, notably New York, to establish asylums for the inebriate, where habitual drunkards are received and subjected to a course of medical treatment, which is calculated to effect a cure of the disease of drinking, as it is claimed to be. A large part of human suffering is the almost direct result of drunkenness, and it is certainly to the interest of society to reduce this evil as much as possible. The establishment and maintenance of inebriate asylums can, therefore, be lawfully undertaken by the state."

We think the legislature was possessed of ample power to deal with the subject-matter of the law, and that in what they did they in no respect violated any provision of the constitution of the state or of the United States.

There is nothing in the contention that the title to the act violates article 8, section 29, of the Constitution, which provides that every law enacted by the general assembly shall embrace but one subject, which shall be described in its title. The title provides for the treatment and cure of habitual drunkards, and it is claimed that this contains more than one subject, and that in the provisions of the act nothing is said about "cure," but reference alone is made to the treatment of habitual drunkards. But we think the legislature must have been influenced by the conviction that the cure would in some instances, at least, follow the treatment, and that cure and treatment constitute but one subject. We entertain the same view.

In respect to the writ of mandamus, we think it properly issued as the remedy appropriate under the circumstances. It follows that the order must be affirmed.

1. A court cannot take judicial notice of the contents of a city ordinance.
2. Mere references to ordinances by numbers and dates is not sufficient to comply with the established rules of pleading.
3. An ordinance vesting in a committee the power to condemn property within a square selected as the site for a courthouse if unable to agree with the owners, and a mere delay in acquiring title after request and warning by a landowner, and after the city had acquired title to a considerable part of the square, gives no claim for damages because of the uncertainty of tenure and injury to business to the owner of a long lease of property on such square which is in use for a hotel, since the ordinance is not the beginning of condemnation proceedings.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's refusal to proceed to the assessment of the damages which it must pay for the acquisition for public use of plaintiff's interest in certain property in the city of Baltimore. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. S. Culbreth for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas G. Hayes and W. S. Bryan, Jr., for appellees.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from a judgment of the Baltimore city court sustaining a demurrer of the appellee, the defendant below, to the declaration. The appellant, who was the plaintiff below, alleges that he is the lessee "for a long term of years" of a property known as the Imperial Hotel, on the square bounded by Calvert, St. Paul, Fayette and

NOTE.—In connection with the above case, see Foster v. Scott (N. Y.) 18 L. R. A. 543, which holds that a statute denying compensation for a house built after filing a map of a proposed street but before commencing condemnation proceedings was unconstitutional.

Lexington streets, in the city of Baltimore, which square has been selected by the city authorities, under certain ordinances passed in pursuance of an act of the general assembly of Maryland for the erection of a new court-house, and that, although all interests except the plaintiff's in said square had been obtained for the purposes mentioned in the act of assembly and in the ordinances, "the building committee of the new court-house" neglected, delayed, and failed to complete the purchase or condemnation of his interest in said property from the first day of May, 1893, to the time of the institution of the suit, although repeatedly requested and warned so to do. He avers that he has been greatly damaged, injured, obstructed, and prejudiced in his business as hotel keeper, by reason of the delay in the use and enjoyment of his property.

The claim intended to be presented by the declaration is the right to recover damages for what is alleged to be an unreasonable delay in acquiring plaintiff's property after the passage of the ordinance selecting as a site for the new court-house the square which includes the said hotel property, notwithstanding the requests and warnings of the plaintiff.

It is contended, however, on the part of the city, that the declaration is technically defective in not setting out, at least, the legal import of the ordinances upon which appellant bases his right to recover. They are only referred to by numbers and dates, and not even the substance of them is given. The court cannot take judicial notice of their contents, and hence it is not informed by the declaration what duties are imposed or powers conferred by them. Without the provisions of the ordinances on which the plaintiff relies being before the court, it is impossible for it to determine whether they impose such duties on the defendant as to render it liable for failure to perform them. We do not think, therefore, that the references to said ordinances are sufficient to comply with the well-established rules of pleading adopted in this state.

But as we would have the power to remand the case, so that the declaration could be amended to meet our views as to mere matters of form, which we need not state more fully, we will determine the main question intended to be presented, as it has been fully argued and the ordinances have been, for the purposes of the argument, treated as if before us.

The appellee having been authorized by an act of assembly, passed Ordinance No. 100, approved October 7, 1892, by which the commissioners of finance were authorized and directed to issue bonds of the city to the amount of $6,000,000, from time to time, as the same might be required for the purposes therein mentioned.

One million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as might be required, of the proceeds of the sales of said bonds were directed to be used for the purchase of ground, erecting thereon and properly furnishing a new court-house and record office. By Ordinance No. 81, approved April 30, 1893, the square above mentioned was selected as the site, and the mayor, comptroller and register were directed to acquire title to a portion of the property included within the bounds of the square, on which John F. Carter held an option for the sum of $132,500, to be paid out of the $1,750,000. Ordinance No. 83, approved April 20, 1893, authorized the building committee of the new court-house (to be thereafter appointed), in case it could not agree with the owner or owners of any lot or portion of this square, or any interest therein, or if the owners were under age, etc., to condemn the same, and then minutely prescribed the course of proceeding in the event of condemnation. The second section of that ordinance limited the total amount to be expended by the building committee to $1,617,500, to be paid out of the sum appropriated for the new court-house, and directed the commissioners of finance to sell, from time to time, as the same were needed, as many of said bonds as should be required to supply the said sum.

Ordinance No. 108, approved May 1, 1893, named the building committee of the new court-house, and authorized them to advertise in Baltimore and other cities inviting the submission of drawings, plans, and specifications. Ordinance No. 187, approved May 25, 1893, further defined the duties and powers of the building committee.

It authorized them to employ a competent architect; gave them power to provide for the erection of the new court-house upon the site already selected, when it shall have been acquired, and to do all acts and make all contracts essential in their judgment to the best and most successful accomplishment and carrying out of the design of building the new court-house; provided that the full amount expended for all purposes should not exceed $1,617,500, which sum, it will be observed, is the difference between the total amount appropriated and the amount paid for the property held under the John F. Carter option.

The above are all the ordinances referred to in the declaration and cited in argument, and hence we need not refer to any others. It is apparent from an examination of them that it was contemplated to erect a large and expensive building. Considerable time was necessarily required to perfect the plans for the building, and the only money at the command of the building committee must be raised by the commissioners of finance from sales of the bonds authorized for the purpose. The members of the committee were only named in the ordinance approved the 1st day of May, 1893. The delay complained of by the plaintiff was from that date until a day not later than the 7th day of April, 1894, at which time the declaration was filed, although the record does not disclose whether the suit was instituted then or prior to that time. If the passage of the ordinances selecting the site, appointing the committee, etc., gave the plaintiff a cause of action, as contended by him, unless executed without any unreasonable delay, it would seem to be rather a severe construction of what is to be deemed unreasonable to require the committee, at the peril of rendering the city liable for damages, to acquire all the property necessary and perform all the other labor incident to the early part of their work within eleven months from their appointment.

We cannot assent to the doctrine sought to be established by the plaintiff that the mere passage of the ordinances, without any execution of them so far as the plaintiff is concerned, gives him a right to action. It may be true that the selection, as a site for the new court-house, of the square which includes the property in which plaintiff has an interest, may make his tenure uncertain and may affect his business to some extent, but if that be conceded, we do not think it follows that under the circumstances of this case the city is liable to him merely because it has not proceeded to acquire his interest. The determination on the part of the city authorities to adopt that particular site is not a taking of the plaintiff's property, nor is it even a declaration of their intention to take it in invitum, as long as he holds it. The building committee has no authority under these ordinances to condemn it without first making a proper effort to agree with him. It may be that his term will expire before the property is needed, or negotiations for a purchase, if fairly conducted on both sides, may result in an agreement and save the necessity of condemnation.

However this may be, passing the ordinances cited cannot properly be deemed a beginning of condemnation proceedings and no such proceedings can be instituted until some attempt to agree is made.

That is a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the building committee, as ordinance No. 83 only gives them the power to condemn in case they cannot agree with the owners, excepting those laboring under some disability, nonresidents, and unknown heirs.

We think it clear therefore that it cannot properly be said that these ordinances were the commencement of condemnation proceedings, but they only vest the power to condemn in the building committee and prescribe their mode of procedure.

As well might it be said that a charter of a railroad company authorizing it to construct a road between two given points and vesting it with the power of eminent domain, is to be treated as a commencement of such proceedings, because it authorizes the company to adopt them.

It is claimed, however, on the part of the appellant that the case of Baltimore v. Black, 56 Md. 383, which had been previously in this court as reported in [Black v. Baltimore], 50 Md. 235, 33 Am. Rep. 320, established the doctrine contended for by him. It may be true that the language of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court, both in 50 Md., and 56 Md., may give some ground for that contention if the facts of the case be not borne in mind. But the statement of facts in the opinion reported in 50 Md., shows that an ordinance had been passed on the 10th day of June, 1871, to condemn and open Pressman street, from Gilmore to Monroe street. On the 12th day of the same month, the commissioners for opening streets gave notice, as required by the City Code (1869), of their intention to meet on July 12, and proceed to execute the ordinance.

The Blacks owned land lying between Gilmore and Monroe streets, which would be divided by Pressman street, and claimed compensation for the whole of two lots of ground, a part of which was required for the bed of the street. They then surrendered the two lots to the city, and the street commissioners sold the parts thereof not included in the bed of the proposed street, under the provisions of the city code. No further action was taken in the premises until the 20th day of May, 1875, when the ordinance of June 10, 1871, was repealed, and the proposed improvement abandoned.

It was very properly held, under those circumstances, that an action would lie for damages caused by the unreasonable and unauthorized delay, provided some steps had been taken to put the city in default, such as remonstrances, complaints, or applications by the owners to the city authorities to proceed with the work or repeal the ordinance. In point of fact, the proceedings had not only been commenced, but nothing remained to be done but to pay the damages or abandon the work. Although it is held that the city can abandon such improvements, even after the assessment of damages, yet if an owner of property has been injured by an unauthorized delay, and the city has been made aware that he is not satisfied to let his title to the property remain in that unsettled condition, he is not without remedy. So although it is said in that opinion that when an ordinance for condemning and opening a street has been passed and remains unexecuted, or but partially carried into effect, the property owner cannot maintain an action for such alleged negligence on the part of the city, unless he has done something to put it in default, it is apparent that it was not intended to say that if he did take such action and the ordinance remained wholly unexecuted as to the particular property in controversy, it necessarily followed that an action would lie.

But the ordinances now being considered differ materially from the one before the court in the Black Case. In the latter the law provided that before the mayor and city council should pass any ordinance for the opening of a street, they should give sixty days' notice of the application for the passage of such ordinance in two daily newspapers published in the city of Baltimore. Then when the ordinance was passed the street commissioners (who were annually appointed as other city officers) were required to give thirty days' notice of the object of the ordinance under which they proposed to act and of the day, hour and place of the first meeting to execute the same.

The commissioners were then required to meet at the time and place named and proceed to award damages, assess benefits, etc. They were not vested with the power to negotiate with the owners and in case of failure to agree then to proceed to condemn, but they at once fixed the damages, subject of course to certain rights of appeal, etc.

In this case the building committee had not even been appointed when the site was determined upon, and as already stated their duty relative to the acquisition of the property was to purchase it, if they could at such a price as they deemed just and the appropriation would permit of, and in event of a failure to reach an agreement they could then proceed to condemn. They are vested with large discretion which the nature of their duties required.

We have thus devoted considerable space to the consideration of Black's Case as the counsel for the appellant earnestly and forcibly contended that it sustained the position taken by him. But if we gave the fullest and broadest meaning to the language there used, without applying and limiting it to the facts of the case which we must do, we would still be met with the marked difference between an ordinance for opening a street under the provision of the City Code of 1869 and the ordinances now before us, as above indicated.

Without prolonging this opinion by discussing Graff's Case, 10 Md. 544, and Norris's Case, 44 Md. 598, we need only to say that the property involved in them had been actually condemned and they do not in any wise conflict with the views herein expressed by us. On the contrary they and Musgrave's Case, 48 Md. 272, sustain the conclusion reached by us.

In Leisse v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co., 2 Mo. App. 110, so much relied on by the appellant, the company had filed its petition and had commenced condemnation proceedings. The facts of the hypothetical case therein stated by the learned judge who delivered that very able opinion, which is quoted in the brief of the appellant, would amount to bad faith on the part of the condemning company.

We do not mean to say that an owner of property cannot under any circumstances have relief unless the company or municipality has actually commenced condemnation proceedings. It may be possible that a case might occur which would show such a deliberate effort and determination to depreciate the value of property for the purpose of subsequently acquiring it by condemnation at a reduced and insufficient price as to render the company or municipality liable on the ground of fraud. If such case is ever presented it will be time enough to determine how far relief can be given, but in this case it is not alleged or intimated that the members of the building committee were not acting in perfectly good faith. We have found no authority which sustains the right of the property owner to recover damages under such circumstances as those before us.

The appellant has not been disturbed in his possession, and if the prospective use of the property for a new court-house has affected him injuriously, it is only of that character of loss that any one having an interest in property may sustain by reason of the provisions of law which require all persons to hold their property subject to be taken for public purposes or by those authorized to exercise the right of eminent domain for what are deemed to be at least quasi public purposes upon the payment or tender of just compensation.

If no ordinance selecting a site had been passed but the defendant had simply been authorized to erect a new court-house, and the city authorities and the prevailing sentiment of the community favored the use of this square for the purpose, by reason of its central locality, and the fact that the city already owned a considerable part of it, the plaintiff might suffer the same character of loss he now complains of, yet it would hardly be contended that the city would in such case be liable to him, however much he may have urged and insisted upon the authorities taking definite and final action. It would be in that as it is in this case damnum absque injuria.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed with costs to the appellees.
